Sir Henry J. Wood will succeed Dr. Karl Muck, who is interned as an alien enemy for the duration of the war.

Sir Henry became a conductor when only 20 years old. At 10 years of age he became deputy organist at St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, and gave recitals for a number of years.

n CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Dr. Muck's kind neighbors knew that he had a powerful wireless outfit in his home, in spite of Federal prohibition, but with characteristic neighborly kindness they refrained from mentioning it to the authorities.—Rochester hough the London Daily News that Sir Henry Joseph Wood has et accepted the offer to become con- or of the Boston Symphony Orches- , it is to be hoped he will do so. In gland he has long been rated as one the best orchestral leaders of the pe- od, nor need Americans accept him on faith, for he was cordially acclaimed in New York more than a decade ago when he came over to conduct some of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society. Having been born in 1870, he is still in the best vigor of his manhood, and his art of interpretation has had ample time to mature since he began, in 1895, to conduct the Promenade Concerts in the new Queen's Hall. At these concerts he demonstrated that, as Fuller Maitland has remarked, "good things well done will attract large audiences by their own inherent strength, notwithstanding all the advertising methods by which other compositions are forced down the throats of the public." In Boston and the cities visited by its orchestra he will appeal to audiences of the most cultivated hearers, and as his taste is catholic, there is no reason why his programmes should not appeal to everybody. As it was he who made Tchaikovsky and other Russians famous in London (his first wife was the daughter of a Russian princess), it is likely that Russian music will be specially featured by him. He may also be counted upon to make some of the best English music known here, and his record shows he does not neglect American composers.

POST
New York City
MAY 24 1918

m AMERICAN
dress: New York City
te

Wood to Lead Boston Symphony, Says London

LONDON, May 24.

SIR HENRY JOSEPH WOOD has accepted an offer to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to this morning's Daily Telegraph, which says he "may be relied upon to introduce to his new American public many works of the British composers."

Sir Henry will succeed Dr. Karl Muck, whose resignation as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was accepted on March 31, following his arrest at Boston as an enemy alien. Dr. Muck, the agitation against whom started at Providence, Rhode Island, on October 30 last, when he was accused of refusing a request to play "The Star Spangled Banner" at a concert, is now interned for the duration of the war.

Sir Henry was born in London on March 3, 1869, and when ten years old became deputy organist at St. Mary's, Aldermanbury. He became conductor in 1889 after giving organ recitals for several years. Since that time he has been constantly before the English public and in charge of some of the greatest orchestras of England. In addition he has directed the presentation of notable concerts and superintended numerous musical festivals, the last of which was the Parsifal tableaux given at the London Colisseum in 1913.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
ess: New York City
MAY 25 1918

ENGLISHMAN MAY SUCCEED DR. MUCK

Sir Henry Wood Has Accepted Boston Symphony Position, Says London Newspaper.

HE IS NOTED CONDUCTOR

May Introduce Works of His Fellow Countrymen to Musical Audiences Here.

The favorite musical pastime of nominating conductors to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, late of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and now in Fort Oglethorpe for the duration of the war, has spread to London. The Daily Telegraph has come forward with the announcement that Sir Henry Joseph Wood has been offered the position and that he has accepted it. However, the Daily News says that Sir Henry has the matter under consideration and will not make his decision until next week.

Since the reorganization of the orchestra shortly after the arrest of Dr. Muck, Sir Henry has been one of the favorite candidates for the position, which during the Muck regime carried with it a salary of $28,000 a year. But according to reports circulated from time to time, no less than three other musicians were asked to fill the post. Ossip Gabrilowitsch removed himself from the field by accepting the conductorship of the Detroit orchestra. Sergei Rachmaninoff was another and so was Arturo Toscanini. If all the rumors were true, the Boston Symphony issued engraved invitations and sent them broadcast.

Organist at Age of 10.

Sir Henry Wood is one of England's most noted musicians. He is 48 years old and was born in London. At the age of 10 he became a deputy organist at St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, and at 17 was made organist of St. John's, Fulham. He has conducted opera, and was the musical adviser for the Wagner concerts in 1913. He began his series of symphony concerts over twenty years ago, and has risen to high esteem with the London public. Many popular festivals were given under his direction.

The choice of an English conductor would remove the last taint of pro-Germanism from the Boston Symphony, which operated under a cloud ever since Dr. Muck refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner" at the concerts last Fall.

Would Play English Music.

The Daily Telegraph quotes Sir Henry as saying that he would introduce many works by English composers to American audiences. However, his record proves that he is no chauvinist in his tastes.

Meanwhile, with Rachmaninoff somewhere in Scandinavia, where he has fled to escape the Bolsheviki, and the temperamental Toscanini engrossed in war work in Italy, Sir Henry is the least remote of the possibilities

om HERALD
dress: New York City
te 25 1918

STILL CONSIDERING OFFER FROM BOSTON ORCHESTRA

[BY CABLE TO THE ASSOCIATED PRESS.]

LONDON, Friday.—Although the Daily Telegraph reports that Sir Henry Joseph Wood had accepted an offer to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Daily News quotes Sir Henry as saying he has not decided whether he would accept the offer. It adds that he will not reach a decision until next week.

Orchestra Committee Makes No Statement About New Conductor.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—Frederick P. Cabot, spokesman for the committee now handling the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is absent from Boston to-day, but his secretary, when asked regarding the reported appointment of Sir Henry Joseph Wood to succeed Dr. Karl Muck, declared that whenever the committee had any announcement to make it would send a statement to all the newspapers. This is the invariable reply made to any request for information. It was intimated that the report would simply be ignored by the committee until in its own good time it gets around to announcing to Boston and the entire country just what is to be done with what Major Henry W. Higginson, in his farewell address, termed, "the people's orchestra."

It appears that the post of conductor has been offered to Sir Henry Wood, and the general belief is that he will accept it.

EVENING WORLD
ress: New York City.
MAY 25 19

Sir Henry Wood, Toscanini and the Boston Orchestra

By Sylvester Rawling.

WHILE the announcement from London of the acceptance by Sir Henry Wood of the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck may be true, officially it is not confirmed. Up to yesterday the management had received no word from Sir Henry to justify it. That offers, more or less tentative, have been made both to him and to Arturo Toscanini, the distinguished Italian conductor, is well known. It is not so well known that Mr. Toscanini was almost, if not quite, willing to say yes! and to waive any demand for salary higher than that paid to Dr. Muck. Both the Englishman and the Italian, not to make comparisons, are at the head of the profession in their respective countries. Either would be welcomed by American music lovers. Mr. Toscanini is the better known, perhaps, because of the masterfulness he displayed in the years of his association with the Metropolitan Opera Company. But Sir Henry, too, showed the fineness of his mettle to those of us with not too short memories when he was a "guest" conductor here some years ago. Upon whichever the mantle shall fall there will be cause for content, and the lucky man will have the satisfaction of holding under his direction the finest orchestra extant.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAY 26 1918

SIR HENRY WOOD, BRITON, TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Announcement Comes from London That Famous Conductor of Queen's Hall Orchestra Will Succeed Dr. Karl Muck.

Modernist by Inclination and Conviction.

While the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fails to confirm or deny the report that Sir Henry Wood, conductor of the Queen's Hall Orchestra of London, has been tendered the position as conductor of the Boston Symphony, replacing Dr. Karl Muck, the announcement to that effect has come from London. This announcement further says, that Sir Henry has accepted the place. There is little doubt that in due time it will be cofirmed on this side of the water.

A number of names have been connected with the new conductorship, most notable of which were Rahkmaninov, the Russian, and Toscanini, the Italian, but it is apparent that neither of these men was found available, and consequently the new Boston management has turned to the English conductor, undoubtedly the most eminent Anglo-Saxon man in the field.

If nothing unforeseen happens, Sir Henry, next Autumn, will come to his new orchestra, and his new public in the prime of his age, ability and reputation. He is in his forty-ninth year, and is said to be as robust of body as he is of mind. So far as he was trained at all in the art of conducting, he was instructed by Mottl, the ilustrious leader of Carlsruhe, Baireuth and Munich.

In much larger measure Sir Henry has learned by doing, especially through a long and turbulent apprenticeship in the early nineties with various short-lived, itinerant British opera companies. Since 1895—that is to say, for twenty-three years—he has been conductor of symphony and choral concerts and of little else. As such he assembled and trained the Queen's Hall Orchestra in London until it has become the ablest and the most noted orchestra of Great Britain.

With the Queen's Hall Orchestra, Sir Henry is accustomed to undertake eight or ten symphony concerts in series through a season; a similar concert every Sunday afternoon, from November through May; instrumental concerts with eminent pianists, violinists or singers; occasional festivals; and an annual series of promenade concerts, with lighter programs, every evening from the middle of August to the middle of October.

Obviously ,then, Sir Henry will not come unprepared for the hundred-odd concerts that fill the yearly schedule of the Boston Symphony. As choral conductor he has worked chiefly in the "festivals" of provincial cities, but occasionally he has brought his festival choruses to London and, in such exacting music as Bach's or Beethoven's masses, proved his command of the whole range of choral tone and choral expression.

Sir Henry Wood, by inclination and conviction is said to be an ardent modernist. No European conductor outside Petrograd or Moscow plays so much Russian music as he; while, beyond any other leader, he has cultivated not only the Russian "nationalist" composers, Rimsky-Korsakov and Musorgsky, but the "eccentrics," like Skribin and the whole new generation of Russian writers, like Prokofiev and Rebikov, whose music is virtually unknown to the United States.

Sir Henry Wood

The leader of Queen's Hall Orchestra, London, has been chosen to succeed Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has accepted the position, a report from London says.

Sir Henry likewise has ben as zealous with the unacademic Parisians—Debussy and d'Indy, Ravel, Ducasse, Faure and Schmitt. With the Germans he has held firmly to Wagner, Strauss and Mahler; and, while under pressure from war-time animus, he has of late dropped the music of living Germans and Austrians from his program, he has stoutly and honorably insisted upon frequent Wagner.

If Sir Henry comes to America we shall probably hear not a little of the music by English composers as yet virtually unknown to the United States. To American composers he has been occasionally hospitable, notably to Mr. Loeffler. With all the zest for the moderns and ultra-moderns, he is in no-wise neglectful of the classics and semi-classics. Beethoven and Brahms, Schumann and Schubert, Liszt and Saint-Saens, all enjoy becoming places in Sir Henry's program and he is said to spare no pains with them. Yet it is in the music of his own time that his sense of vivid detail and large effect, his energies of modulation, progress, climax, his ardor for rhythm, color, power, most shine.

EVENING WORLD
ess: New York City.
28 191

Sir Henry Won't Lead Boston Orchestra; Colored People Sing

By Sylvester Rawling.

SIR HENRY WOOD has declined the offer of the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck. The news came by cable from London to-day. Sir Henry prefers to remain in England, where his reputation has been established through years of hard work and achievement. Efforts probably will be revived to secure the services of Arturo Toscanini. The distinguished Italian conductor, it is understood, will not be averse to considering a definite proposition. So far there has been no suggestion of an American for the place.

n TELEGRAM
ress: New York City.

Sir Henry Wood Rejects Boston Orchestra Offer

LONDON, Tuesday.—Sir Henry Joseph Wood has decided not to accept the offer to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will remain in London.

om EAGLE
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
te 1918

A NEW ORCHESTRA LEADER.

There will be wide interest in Brooklyn in the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured as its leader to replace the interned Muck Sir Henry Wood, who has been for nearly thirty years a leading and much of the time the leading conductor of orchestral music in England. His nationality insures the sympathetic attitude of American audiences toward him, while his long and varied experience gives promise of a thoroughly competent leadership of the organization whose continuance has seemed to be in doubt. His selection will probably make it easier to replace the alien players who must be dropped. There should be musicians in London able to make good that defection.

Sir Henry Wood has been heard in New York, being one of the "guest conductors" imported by the Philharmonic some years ago, but he is almost unknown here. We are sure from the program of his London concerts that Sir Henry has a catholic taste and that his concerts here will give the best music from many sources. As to the quality of the performances, we must wait until the new conductor and the remade orchestra have grown accustomed to each other. Those who are familiar with London concerts merely through reading critical accounts of them will expect from the new conductor thorough competence and much earnestness, rather than a high inspirational quality or a strong impression of personality, such as was radiated by Toscanini and Mahler, but the critical notices may have carried a wrong impression to strangers. At any rate, we know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will continue to give concerts in Brooklyn and through the country and that it will be subject to no more disturbances like that which came from the Germanism of Dr. Muck. That is cause for rejoicing for all lovers of music.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAY 26 '

Music in the Home

(The editor of this department will be pleased to answer questions regarding talking machines, player-pianos and their music.)

MAGGIE TEYTE, whose Columbia records are so justly popular, has been publishing a few reminiscences of the late Claude Debussy. She had the rare privilege while in Paris of preparing the role of Melisande in Debussy's most famous work, the opera "Pelleas and Melisande," under the direction of the composer. She thus became very well acquainted with this singularly lonely individual. "He was the most taciturn man I have ever met," says Maggie Teyte in Musical America, "and the most nervous. The one thing he hated above all others was to hear some one else play his own music. I recall once at a concert of his works in Paris that the first violinist came off the stage in high spirits after the playing of Debussy's Quartet. 'Was it not fine; was it not beautifully played?' he demanded of the people standing 'back stage.' Debussy overheard him and withered the unfortunate man with a look. 'You played like pigs,' he said scornfully, and strode away, leaving the hapless player covered with shame and confusion." This recalls Beethoven's brusque question, asked of a famous musician who had been improvising at the keyboard for half an hour: "When is the music going to begin?"

Yet Debussy could be generous—or at least just—in his treatment of artists who departed from his own ideas as to the correct interpretation of a passage, when the innovation proved good. "Once I recall, I sang a passage slightly different from the way in which it was indicated. He looked up quickly, thought a moment, and then said, 'You are right, quite right! that is the way you should sing it,' and passed on without further comment." If Debussy was morose, and went out of his way to be unpleasant, it must be remembered in extenuation that he was a sick man, the victim of a gnawing and painful disease. In this respect, of course, he was like many others of our great composers and musicians. Weber was a consumptive, and so was Chopin, both dying of the disease in the "fatal thirties." Beethoven went deaf, and in his later years suffered horribly from dropsy. Bellini went insane, and so did Schumann. Hugo Wolf, the song writer, also became a raving lunatic after much sickness. Richard Wagner lived a fairly long life, but suffered much from gastric trouble. Sir Arthur Sullivan wrote some of his liveliest comic operas while enduring similar tortures, and it is said that most of "H. M. S. Pinafore" was composed in bed, between spasms of acute suffering. Lest you should imagine that all musicians are weaklings, however, we may remind you that Haydn, Handel, Rossini, Dvorak, Gluck, Brahms and many others lived robustly. Manuel Garcia, the most famous vocal teacher who ever lived, contrived to keep alive for 106 years, virtually all of it devoted to music. The hale and hearty Johann Sebastian Bach, the "father of modern music," was also the father of twenty-one children.

MAGGIE TEYTE

So Major Higginson has given up the control of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded and has fostered since 1881. Few people know that Henry Lee Higginson is himself an excellent musician and spent many years abroad studying the art. Unfortunately, or, perhaps, fortunately, an injury to his left arm made it impossible for him to play the piano, and he came back to America determined to make enough money to start a symphony orchestra on a permanent basis modeled on those he had heard in Europe, especially in Vienna. The civil war interrupted his plans, and he took a valiant and patriotic part in the fighting. He came out of it impoverished with a young wife to support. The outlook for his dream orchestra was not promising. However, he was fortunate and sagacious in his business affairs, and soon rich enough to start the orchestra which now ranks among the finest of the world. Those who have criticised Higginson for his support of Karl Muck in the recent troubles would do well to ponder Higginson's services to his country and to music. A tenacious loyalty to his co-workers, and to his ideals, is characteristic of the man, but his fundamental loyalty to his country is even deeper. He has now resigned his official connection with the Symphony Orchestra he founded and financed for so many years, and the choice of a successor to Karl Muck will devolve upon a board of directors. May they choose as wisely as Higginson has done in the past.

One of the leading makers of player-rolls is responsible for the statement that there are now more rolls sold of the music of Chopin, Liszt and Rubinstein than of the popular ragtime numbers. This could not have been said a decade ago, but it is not hard to believe. The truth is that one of the great advantages of the player-piano is that it gives you something to do besides listen. In the average popular number there is really very little to be done except pump. The music of itself does not call for much expression, and only a well-trained musician of exceptional gifts can so play it as to make it seem better than it actually is. No doubt a Paderewski or a Godowsky could so play a jazz rag and make it sound like real music—at least to the uninitiated. Careful phrasing, variety of expression and variety of touch can do much to add interest to almost any piece of music. It is doubtful, however, if an amateur could do as much, still less a player-pianist without musical training other than that got by casual playing. Good music, on the other hand, almost "plays itself"—that is, it suggests so many possibilities of expressive playing that anybody with a naturally musical turn of mind can make it sound interesting. At least, he can have a great deal of pleasure trying to do so.

This is especially the case where the piece has a title to suggest the poetic idea back of the piece. Nevin's "A Day in Venice," for instance, offers a little group of pieces, each one with an idea that anybody can readily grasp. Any intelligent music lover can readily find ways of giving each piece approximately the right expression. Mendelssohn's "Songs Without Words" almost all suggest their own interpretation—the "Spring Song," "Consolation," the "Duet," the "Barcarolle"—each offers opportunities that appeal to the imagination. On the other hand there is nothing more difficult than to make a dull piece sound interesting. Only well-trained interpretive powers and a disciplined imagination can do this. In a good piece of music one has only to meet the obvious wishes of the composer; in a bad piece, one has to supply something that the composer lacks.

Moreover, a sustained diet of ragtime gets very tiresome, like a sustained diet of candy. Probably most people who invest in a player-piano glut themselves with ragtime to start with. Either they develop a taste for better things, or their musical nature having early run its course, they cease playing the piano altogether. More usually, of course, they develop a taste for better things, for far more people are inherently musical than is generally supposed. We are apt to forget that music is perhaps the oldest form of entertainment there is, and tho modern life offers many distractions that keep some of us from developing our musical proclivities, yet once given an opportunity a man will take to music much as he takes to gardening or farming—thru strong inherited tendencies.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date

133

THE UNDECIDED CONDUCTORSHIP.

After the question of conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has kept the musical world atremble since the sensational retirement of Dr. Muck, was apparently closed by the engagement of Sir Henry Wood, the eminent London conductor, it is thrown open again by the announcement that Sir Henry has decided not to accept the Boston offer, but to remain with his own orchestra in London. His decision is regrettable not only because Sir Henry is a brilliant and progressive conductor who could be trusted to keep the Boston orchestra at its present pitch of virtuosity and whose influence here, as in London, would surely be on the side of musical advance, but because on the supreme issue of our time, God or the kaiser, Sir Henry is unassailably sound.

No reason has yet been given out for his decision to remain in London. It is to be hoped the determining cause has nothing to do with a sinister rumor current here that the American gentlemen now controlling the destinies of the Boston orchestra refuse to purge it of unnaturalized Germans and Austrians, a condition that would certainly prevent Sir Henry or Signor Toscanini or M. Chevillard from accepting the leadership. If the orchestra is to be properly Americanized, Signor Toscanini is indisputably the most commendable candidate for the position aside from Sir Henry.

To the disgrace of musicianship in America, Signor Toscanini has been the victim of a subtle and poisonous campaign of calumny ever since the retirement of Dr. Muck became probable. The same elements that a few years ago proclaimed him the greatest of symphonic directors have been busily spreading the word that though a great conductor of opera he is not at home in symphonic music, a judgment quite at variance with the records of fact and critical opinion, and these elements have had the active support of others—secretly enemy—which seek to deny the competence of any symphonic conductor who is not a German or a Russian of German sympathies.

They have further magnified an irritability of temper, in which Signor Toscanini is not alone among musicians, into the real reason for his separation from the operatic institution of which he was the chief artistic ornament, entirely befogging the true issues and ignoring the well known fact that Signor Toscanini, aside from his musical genius, is a man of wide culture and signal charm, and the practical certainty that with such an orchestra as the Boston at his disposal he would not disclose infirmities of temper that a very angel might develop amid the intrigues and annoyances of an opera house.

Aside from Sir Henry Wood and Signor Toscanini, M. Chevillard of Paris and Willem Mengelberg of Amsterdam remain the men most seriously talked of in relation to the Boston conductorship. The Dutchman is a conductor of recognized ability who would probably prosper in Boston provided his sympathies are with the allies, as those of the eminent Russian composer, conductor, and pianist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, now actually in Boston, are said not to be. M. Chevillard stands with Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company at the head of living French conductors. He too would fill the place worthily, in spite of any campaign of carefully dissembled calumny the pro-Boche elements in our music world might bring against him as they have against Signor Toscanini. But it is a certainty that neither Wood nor Toscanini nor Chevillard would stand for an unpurged orchestra and the embarrassments that could not but result from such an anomalous state of affairs in a country engaged in such a war as the United States and her allies are now waging.

Herald May 29

SYMPHONY PLAYERS ARE FORMING UNION

Trustees of Orchestra Ask Only Free Hand When Vacancies Occur

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is being unionized. The members themselves took the initiative, believing that the present hour of reorganization is a fitting time for such a step. It is said that virtually all the present members of the orchestra are willing to join the union.

The new trustees, according to members of the organization, are disposed neither to further nor resist the unionization of the orchestra, and insist only upon assurances that unionization shall in no way be detrimental to the established standards and prestige of the orchestra, and that they or the conductor shall have a free hand in the choice of players when vacancies are to be filled.

Traveler May 31

CONFERENCE HELD ON ORCHESTRA PLANS

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—F. C. Kingman, president of the Musicians Mutual Relief Society, left his office this afternoon to hold a conference with Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Joseph Weber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, on matters relating to the possible unionization of the Symphony Orchestra.

It is known that certain members of the orchestra have signified their intention of joining the union, whether they retain their posts or not. One of them, Emil Ferir, the viola player, has already joined, and another, Andre Maquarre, the flutist, is said to have applied for membership.

On the other hand, it is known that a number of the members have already signed contracts with the trustees to play next winter. Among these, it is said, are certain players in the string section of the orchestra. It is said that if present plans of the trustees work out as they have been presented to the men, the organization will continue on practically the former basis of membership, with a guarantee fund assuring salaries.

Herald May 31

JUSTIN GODART VISITS BOSTON

Comes to Thank America for Its Relief Work in France.

GUEST OF F. H. PRINCE AT POP CONCERT

Justin Godart, formerly under secretary of state to the French minister of war, formerly vice-president of the Chamber of Deputies and until last February in charge of the medical branch of the French army, arrived in Boston early last evening, and later, with his party, was the guest of Frederick H. Prince at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall.

The distinguished Frenchman is accompanied by two officers of the French medical corps, Maj. Edouard Rist and Maj. Locard. Other guests last evening were Col. Azan, M. Flamande, the French consul in Boston, who will entertain the visitors here; Asa P. French, Prof. Mercier of Harvard, Prof. Barrett Wendell and William C. Endicott. On arrival of the party at the hall the orchestra played "The Marseillaise," with the audience standing and warmly applauding.

M. Godart's mission to this country is to bring the official thanks of the French government to the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus and other similar organizations for the splendid work they are doing in France. The French statesman will make several public appearances here. He will explain in his addresses what an imense work has been accomplished by the French military health department during the last three years, and to what extent success has been due to the co-operation of Americans. M. Godart is a lawyer and received his LL. D. at the University of Lyons. He created the first labor bureau in France and proved his devotion to the interests and welfare of the working classes. He organized the medical service on the French front, in the French expeditionary force in Italy and also in the French army in Salonica. He won the war cross at Craonne in 1917, while visiting advanced posts under artillery fire.

Monitor June 1

MUSIC

The Pop Concerts

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—The people who attend the pop concerts, given by an orchestra of Boston Symphony men in Symphony Hall the first weeks of every summer, are observed to have become more deeply interested in the music in the past half-dozen years than they used to be, to the outcome that today there is little difference in artistic seriousness between the pop listeners and the regular symphony concert listeners of the winter. A sign of the state of affairs is the desire of the public for the best possible quality of interpretation. In former pop seasons, the audiences gave the question of conducting little heed. Certain members of the orchestra who had exceptional talent as players were accepted as fit for directing the summer programs. But of late, a man of proved and regular standing as an orchestra leader has been demanded.

From wanting authoritative interpretation, the public has gradually shown a wish to hear a stronger type of selection, though there is no indication yet of an interest in anything but short pieces. As the attention and taste of the audience has improved, the tendency for groups to usurp the concerts for noisy reunions has diminished. The special nights put emphasis on music rather than on celebration. Nights of this sort that are presently coming off are a French night on the evening of Tuesday, June 4, when works by French composers will be presented; and later, a Russian night and an opera night, when pieces by Russian composers and numbers taken from the opera repertory will be played.

The program announced for tonight, Mr. Jacchia conducting, is as follows:

"Entrance of the Gladiators," Fucik; waltz, "Jolly Fellows," Vollstedt; moment musical, Schubert; fantasia, "Othello," Verdi; overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; tarantelle, Jacchia; romanza, Cella; second Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; "The Star-Spangled Banner"; selection, "Little Nemo," Herbert; "March of the Little Lead Soldiers," Pierné; entr'acte valse, Hellmesberger; ouverture, "1812," Tschaikowsky.

Monitor June 1

ORCHESTRA DENIED ENTRANCE TO UNION

Boston Symphony Men Kept From Joining Local by Importation Rule—Messrs. Cabot, Weber and Kingman Confer

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—Players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who as a body expressed a desire to join the Musicians' Protective Association, the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians, are at present denied the privilege, because the board of trustees which has taken charge of the affairs of the orchestra does not assent to union requirements regarding the importation of performers from Europe. Information of this state of affairs transpired last night in the discussions of the men upon the conclusion of a conference which was held between Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the Symphony board of trustees, Joseph N. Weber, president of the American federation, and F. C. Kingman, president of the Boston local.

Some time ago, members of the orchestra consulted Mr. Kingman in regard to the possibility of their joining the union, and brought about a meeting between him and Mr. Cabot, at which the question of terms of admission were discussed. Mr. Kingman is said to have set forth union rules—first, as barring general importation of orchestral players from Europe; second as requiring the employment, when possible, of American performers; and third, as insisting upon United States citizenship for all union men.

In order that these points might be authoritatively answered for, Mr. Weber was called from New York yesterday. He is said to have affirmed Mr. Kingman's position in all particulars. Mr. Cabot, in his turn, representing the trustees, is said to have held out on the matter of the choice of players; and, accordingly, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to continue for the present, at least, as a non-union organization.

Arrangements have been made, it is said, whereby the orchestra continues its summer concert in Symphony Hall with an advanced rate of payment for some of the players. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only institution of its kind in the United States that does not belong to the American Federation of Musicians.

Among the orchestras that are affiliated with the federation are the Philharmonic Society of New York, the New York Symphony Society, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. When vacancies have to be filled in these organizations the union rules are always applied.

These rules, as Mr. Weber is said to have explained at the conference yesterday afternoon, require that when a vacancy occurs the members of the local to which the orchestra immediately belongs must first be canvassed. If no player here is found suitable, then members of other locals may be considered. But only under exceptional cases, when all possibility of the right American player being found has to be abandoned, may a player be brought from Europe.

Record June 12

POPS CONDUCTOR SAYS AMERICANS WILL GET HEARING

AGIDE JACCHIA

The Italian conductor of the Pops who has put much fire and "pep" into the concerts. He says the shutting off of the foreign market gives American composers their greatest opportunities. He will play American compositions at the Pops if work merits performance.

Monitor June 7

GERMANS DROPPED FROM ORCHESTRA

Monitor

Trustees of Boston Symphony May Call on French Band to Fill Some of Places Vacated By Enemy Aliens

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—Eighteen Germans who belonged last year to the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been dropped from membership; and hereafter no musicians who are counted by the United States Government as alien enemies are to take part in the concerts of the organization, according to W. H. Brennan, who has charge of the orchestra's affairs at Symphony Hall. Among those who are dismissed, it is understood, is Ernst Schmidt, violinist and assistant conductor, who directed the concerts in Boston this spring after Karl Muck, the conductor, was arrested by officials of the United States Department of Justice, and sent to an internment camp. Others of the 18 are said to be in large measure from the string department of the orchestra.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is reported, are now filling the vacancies caused by the removal of the German members, and they have already signed contracts, it is said, with a number of the musicians who played in Boston this week at Symphony Hall in the French military band, directed by Captain Parès.

Ever since the former sustainer, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, and the former manager, C. A. Ellis, retired from active participation in the policies of the orchestra, and the board of trustees was appointed, it has been known that efforts to retain alien enemies as members would no longer be persisted in. At the same time it became clear that every effort would be made to keep the orchestra as cosmopolitan as war conditions would permit. A few weeks ago the trustees showed clearly that they intended to make the whole world of musicians, as far as possible, their field of choice, when they refused to accept unionization of the orchestra, along with the union's strict rule against importations. Now they have reasserted their stand by indicating that none but actual enemy aliens will be barred from membership, and that men of any nationality but German will be eligible.

Under this scheme, the trustees could engage an artist like the oboe player, Mr. Speyer, who distinguished himself as soloist in Symphony Hall the other night, without a moment's formality.

The few Austrians in the orchestra, of whom Anton Witek, the concertmaster has been mentioned as one, are understood to be outside the category of enemy aliens and will, therefore, it is said, be retained. Only those players, in fact, who would cause difficulty for the orchestra in entering the cities of the five monthly tours, of which Washington, D. C., is one, are to be dropped.

JACCHIA ON LOOKOUT FOR NATIVE TALENT

Glad to Give Americans Hearing at Pops—Making Programs

By Tamar Lane

Now is the chance for American composers to do big things in the musical world if they are to do big things at all, according to Agide Jacchia, conductor of Pops. With the war shutting off from overseas to a great extent the supply of music that has heretofore constituted the greater portion of our musical programs, Mr. Jacchia believes that a golden opportunity is presented local talent to have their works produced and win world recognition.

Mr. Jacchia had just finished a rehearsal at Symphony Hall which evidently had pleased him, and he was in a talkative mood.

"I cannot say exactly why America has produced no great composers up to the present time, in fact I never heard any one who could tell just why," said Mr. Jacchia, in a broad Italian accent, and with typical Latin shrugs and gestures, "but I think it is mostly because Americans have never had the proper teaching. Due to another case of German propaganda the great majority of American music students have had German tutoring. They have made a mistake in doing so. For symphony playing, yes, I would say that they should go to Germany; but for opera composition they should go to Italy. America has no great teachers of composition and, therefore, the American students lack the fire and inspiration to do big things."

This is Mr. Jacchia's second year as conductor of the Pops and the splendid programs which have been charming music lovers hereabouts are the result of a careful study of his patronage. Speaking of his experiences with the Pops, Mr. Jacchia related several interesting incidents and facts regarding Boston's musical taste.

"When I first came to Boston to conduct the Pops," he said, "I was told that Boston preferred popular airs and to assure the Pops of success a good portion of the program should consist of these. I differed with this idea, but being in a strange community I tried it out. After a short time, however, I found that Boston did not prefer popular airs, but good music from the standard operas and even on occasion movements from popular symphonies. Another thing I was told was that patrons of the Pops only came there to talk and enjoy themselves at the tables. I could not believe this and said that if such was the case I would not conduct the Pops for a minute. It was not true, however, for I have found that the patrons really appreciate good music and come to listen. During my two years at the Pops I have never heard the least bit of talking during the playing. Usually it is so quiet that you could hear a pin drop.

"The only reason I can give for the failure of opera in Boston," said Mr. Jacchia in answer to my question, "is that Boston prefers symphonic music. There are no people in the world who delight more in symphony than here."

Mr. Jacchia, by the way, is very proud of the Pops and its aggregation of players. He says that it is easily the largest and finest of its kind in the world. Since the beginning of the season over 500 pieces have been played. Last year 40 concerts were given, but this year there will be 54.

According to Mr. Jacchia, the war has so far had no great effect on music at the Pops. All German music has, of course, been dropped, excepting a few pieces from Wagner's early works written when he was copying the Italian style.

"There are a few persons who have written me asking that all German music be dropped, but the majority of music lovers do not care so long as they have good music. To keep up with the times I have included a few martial and patriotic airs, such as "Keep the Home Fires Burning" and "Over There," that ordinarily I would give no place on the program, as I think they do not deserve to be played in Symphony Hall. At the present time, however, they brighten up the spirits of the audience."

Mr. Jacchia believes in giving a program of varied appeal, and not repeating the same old airs too frequently, even though they be popular. To this end he has made it a practice of including a few new selections each week, and has found that the audience welcomes the change. He also said that he would be one of the first to give the works of American composers a place on the program if he came across any that were worthy of it, but from the way he spoke Mr. Jacchia is doubtful whether America will produce any great composers in the near future.

Herald May 29

SYMPHONY PLAYERS ARE FORMING UNION

Trustees of Orchestra Ask Only Free Hand When Vacancies Occur

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is being unionized. The members themselves took the initiative, believing that the present hour of reorganization is a fitting time for such a step. It is said that virtually all the present members of the orchestra are willing to join the union.

The new trustees, according to members of the organization, are disposed neither to further nor resist the unionization of the orchestra, and insist only upon assurances that unionization shall in no way be detrimental to the established standards and prestige of the orchestra, and that they or the conductor shall have a free hand in the choice of players when vacancies are to be filled.

Traveler May 31

CONFERENCE HELD ON ORCHESTRA PLANS

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—F. C. Kingman, president of the Musicians Mutual Relief Society, left his office this afternoon to hold a conference with Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Joseph Weber, president of the American Federation of Musicians, on matters relating to the possible unionization of the Symphony Orchestra.

It is known that certain members of the orchestra have signified their intention of joining the union, whether they retain their posts or not. One of them, Emil Ferir, the viola player, has already joined, and another, Andre Maquarre, the flutist, is said to have applied for membership.

On the other hand, it is known that a number of the members have already signed contracts with the trustees to play next winter. Among these, it is said, are certain players in the string section of the orchestra. It is said that if present plans of the trustees work out as they have been presented to the men, the organization will continue on practically the former basis of membership, with a guarantee fund assuring salaries.

Herald May 31

JUSTIN GODART VISITS BOSTON

Comes to Thank America for Its Relief Work in France.

GUEST OF F. H. PRINCE AT POP CONCERT

Justin Godart, formerly under secretary of state to the French minister of war, formerly vice-president of the Chamber of Deputies and until last February in charge of the medical branch of the French army, arrived in Boston early last evening, and later, with his party, was the guest of Frederick H. Prince at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall.

The distinguished Frenchman is accompanied by two officers of the French medical corps, Maj. Edouard Rist and Maj. Locard. Other guests last evening were Col. Azan, M. Flamande, the French consul in Boston, who will entertain the visitors here; Asa P. French, Prof. Mercier of Harvard, Prof. Barrett Wendell and William C. Endicott. On arrival of the party at the hall the orchestra played "The Marseillaise," with the audience standing and warmly applauding.

M. Godart's mission to this country is to bring the official thanks of the French government to the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus and other similar organizations for the splendid work they are doing in France. The French statesman will make several public appearances here. He will explain in his addresses what an imense work has been accomplished by the French military health department during the last three years, and to what extent success has been due to the co-operation of Americans. M. Godart is a lawyer and received his LL. D. at the University of Lyons. He created the first labor bureau in France and proved his devotion to the interests and welfare of the working classes. He organized the medical service on the French front, in the French expeditionary force in Italy and also in the French army in Salonica. He won the war cross at Craonne in 1917, while visiting advanced posts under artillery fire.

Monitor June 1

MUSIC

The Pop Concerts

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—The people who attend the pop concerts, given by an orchestra of Boston Symphony men in Symphony Hall the first weeks of every summer, are observed to have become more deeply interested in the music in the past half-dozen years than they used to be, to the outcome that today there is little difference in artistic seriousness between the pop listeners and the regular symphony concert listeners of the winter. A sign of the state of affairs is the desire of the public for the best possible quality of interpretation. In former pop seasons, the audiences gave the question of conducting little heed. Certain members of the orchestra who had exceptional talent as players were accepted as fit for directing the summer programs. But of late, a man of proved and regular standing as an orchestra leader has been demanded.

From wanting authoritative interpretation, the public has gradually shown a wish to hear a stronger type of selection, though there is no indication yet of an interest in anything but short pieces. As the attention and taste of the audience has improved, the tendency for groups to usurp the concerts for noisy reunions has diminished. The special nights put emphasis on music rather than on celebration. Nights of this sort that are presently coming off are a French night on the evening of Tuesday, June 4, when works by French composers will be presented; and later, a Russian night and an opera night, when pieces by Russian composers and numbers taken from the opera repertory will be played.

The program announced for tonight, Mr. Jacchia conducting, is as follows:

"Entrance of the Gladiators," Fucik; waltz, "Jolly Fellows," Vollstedt; moment musical, Schubert; fantasia, "Othello," Verdi; overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; tarantelle, Jacchia; romanza, Cella; second Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; "The Star-Spangled Banner"; selection, "Little Nemo," Herbert; "March of the Little Lead Soldiers," Pierné; entr'acte valse, Hellmesberger; ouverture, "1812," Tschaikowsky.

Monitor June 1

ORCHESTRA DENIED ENTRANCE TO UNION

Boston Symphony Men Kept From Joining Local by Importation Rule—Messrs. Cabot, Weber and Kingman Confer

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—Players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who as a body expressed a desire to join the Musicians' Protective Association, the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians, are at present denied the privilege, because the board of trustees which has taken charge of the affairs of the orchestra does not assent to union requirements regarding the importation of performers from Europe. Information of this state of affairs transpired last night in the discussions of the men upon the conclusion of a conference which was held between Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the Symphony board of trustees, Joseph N. Weber, president of the American federation, and F. C. Kingman, president of the Boston local.

Some time ago, members of the orchestra consulted Mr. Kingman in regard to the possibility of their joining the union, and brought about a meeting between him and Mr. Cabot, at which the question of terms of admission were discussed. Mr. Kingman is said to have set forth union rules—first, as barring general importation of orchestral players from Europe; second as requiring the employment, when possible, of American performers; and third, as insisting upon United States citizenship for all union men.

In order that these points might be authoritatively answered for, Mr. Weber was called from New York yesterday. He is said to have affirmed Mr. Kingman's position in all particulars. Mr. Cabot, in his turn, representing the trustees, is said to have held out on the matter of the choice of players; and, accordingly, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to continue for the present, at least, as a non-union organization.

Arrangements have been made, it is said, whereby the orchestra continues its summer concert in Symphony Hall with an advanced rate of payment for some of the players. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only institution of its kind in the United States that does not belong to the American Federation of Musicians.

Among the orchestras that are affiliated with the federation are the Philharmonic Society of New York, the New York Symphony Society, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. When vacancies have to be filled in these organizations the union rules are always applied.

These rules, as Mr. Weber is said to have explained at the conference yesterday afternoon, require that when a vacancy occurs the members of the local to which the orchestra immediately belongs must first be canvassed. If no player here is found suitable, then members of other locals may be considered. But only under exceptional cases, when all possibility of the right American player being found has to be abandoned, may a player be brought from Europe.

Record June 12

POPS CONDUCTOR SAYS AMERICANS WILL GET HEARING

AGIDE JACCHIA

The Italian conductor of the Pops who has put much fire and "pep" into the concerts. He says the shutting off of the foreign market gives American composers their greatest opportunities. He will play American compositions at the Pops if work merits performance.

Monitor June 21

GERMANS DRO[illegible] FROM ORCHE[illegible]

Trustees of Boston Sy[illegible] May Call on French [illegible] Fill Some of Places [illegible] By Enemy Aliens

Specially for The Christian Science [illegible]

BOSTON, Mass.—Eighteen Ge[illegible] who belonged last year to the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra have [illegible] dropped from membership; and [illegible] after no musicians who are co[illegible] by the United States Governme[illegible] alien enemies are to take part i[illegible] concerts of the organization, ac[illegible] ing to W. H. Brennan, who has ch[illegible] of the orchestra's affairs at Symp[illegible] Hall. Among those who are dismi[illegible] it is understood, is Ernst Sch[illegible] violinist and assistant conductor [illegible] directed the concerts in Boston [illegible] spring after Karl Muck, the condu[illegible] was arrested by officials of the U[illegible] States Department of Justice, and [illegible] to an internment camp. Others o[illegible] 18 are said to be in large me[illegible] from the string department o[illegible] orchestra.

The trustees of the Boston S[illegible] phony Orchestra, it is reported, a[illegible] now filling the vacancies caused b[illegible] the removal of the German members, and they have already signed contracts, it is said, with a number of the musicians who played in Boston this week at Symphony Hall in the French military band, directed [illegible] Captain Parès.

Ever since the former susta[illegible] Maj. Henry L. Higginson, and the [illegible] mer manager, C. A. Ellis, retired [illegible] active participation in the policies [illegible] the orchestra, and the board of tr[illegible] tees was appointed, it has been kno[illegible] that efforts to retain alien enemies [illegible] members would no longer be p[illegible] sisted in. At the same time it becam[illegible] clear that every effort would be ma[illegible] to keep the orchestra as cosmopolita[illegible] as war conditions would permit. A few weeks ago the trustees showed clearly that they intended to make the whole world of musicians, as far as possible, their field of choice, when they refused to accept unionization of the orchestra, along with the union's strict rule against importations. Now they have reasserted their stand by indicating that none but actual enemy aliens will be barred from membership, and that men of any nationality but German will be eligible.

Under this scheme, the trustees could engage an artist like the oboe player, Mr. Spever, who was, therefore, it is said, be retained. Only those players, in fact, who would cause difficulty for the orchestra in entering the cities of the five monthly tours, of which Washington, D. C., is one, are to be dropped.

JACCHIA ON LOOKOUT FOR NATIVE TALENT

Glad to Give Americans Hearing at Pops—Making Programs

By Tamar Lane

Now is the chance for American composers to do big things in the musical world if they are to do big things at all, according to Agide Jacchia, conductor of Pops. With the war shutting off from overseas to a great extent the supply of music that has heretofore constituted the greater portion of our musical programs, Mr. Jacchia believes that a golden opportunity is presented local talent to have their works produced and win world recognition.

Mr. Jacchia had just finished a rehearsal at Symphony Hall which evidently had pleased him, and he was in a talkative mood.

"I cannot say exactly why America has produced no great composers up to the present time, in fact I never heard any one who could tell just why," said Mr. Jacchia, in a broad Italian accent, and with typical Latin shrugs and gestures, "but I think it is mostly because Americans have never had the proper teaching. Due to another case of German propaganda the great majority of American music students have had German tutoring. They have made a mistake in doing so. For symphony playing, yes, I would say that they should go to Germany; but for opera composition they should go to Italy. America has no great teachers of composition and, therefore, the American students lack the fire and inspiration to do big things."

This is Mr. Jacchia's second year as conductor of the Pops and the splendid programs which have been charming music lovers hereabouts are the result of a careful study of his patronage. Speaking of his experiences with the Pops, Mr. Jacchia related several interesting incidents and facts regarding Boston's musical taste.

"When I first came to Boston to conduct the Pops," he said, "I was told that Boston preferred popular airs and to assure the Pops of success a good portion of the program should consist of these. I differed with this idea, but being in a strange community, I tried it out. After a short time, however, I found that Boston did not prefer popular airs, but good music from the standard operas and even on occasion movements from popular symphonies. Another thing I was told was that patrons of the Pops only came there to talk and enjoy themselves at the tables. I could not believe this and said that if such was the case I would not conduct the Pops for a minute. It was not true, however, for I have found that the patrons really appreciate good music and come to listen. During my two years at the Pops I have never heard the least bit of talking during the playing. Usually it is so quiet that you could hear a pin drop.

"The only reason I can give for the failure of opera in Boston," said Mr. Jacchia in answer to my question, "is that Boston prefers symphonic music. There are no people in the world who delight more in symphony than here."

Mr. Jacchia, by the way, is very proud of the Pops and its aggregation of players. He says that it is easily the largest and finest of its kind in the world. Since the beginning of the season over 500 pieces have been played. Last year 40 concerts were given, but this year there will be 54.

According to Mr. Jacchia, the war has so far had no great effect on music at the Pops. All German music has, of course, been dropped, excepting a few pieces from Wagner's early works written when he was copying the Italian style.

"There are a few persons who have written me asking that all German music be dropped, but the majority of music lovers do not care so long as they have good music. To keep up with the times I have included a few martial and patriotic airs, such as "Keep the Home Fires Burning" and "Over There," that ordinarily I would give no place on the program, as I think they do not deserve to be played in Symphony Hall. At the present time, however, they brighten up the spirits of the audience."

Mr. Jacchia believes in giving a program of varied appeal, and not repeating the same old airs too frequently, even though they be popular. To this end he has made it a practice of including a few new selections each week, and has found that the audience welcomes the change. He also said that he would be one of the first to give the works of American composers a place on the program if he came across any that were worthy of it, but from the way he spoke Mr. Jacchia is doubtful whether America will produce any great composers in the near future.

Herald June 19 — Globe June 19 — Advertiser June 19 — Record June 19 — Herald June 22 135

FRENCH CAPTURE POPS AUDIENCE

Band of 60 Is Led by the Former Director of the Garde Republicaine

CONCERT TONIGHT FOR THE SOLDIERS

Those who went to the "Pops" last night and heard the French Military band had a memorable experience. The visitors played the second part of the program, and at the close there was nobody who doubted the statement made by Ambulance Driver William H. Kenney, a comrade of these bandsmen, in introducing them, that the French government, in selecting the personnel of this band of 60 players, had chosen those whom it deemed the best performers in France on their particular instruments. Neither was it hard to credit his further statement that 28 of these men were first-prize men of the Paris Conservatory, of which they are graduates.

Their leader, Capt. Gabriel Pares, formerly conducted the Garde Republicaine Band of Paris, with which he has twice visited this country, once to play at St Louis and the other time at San Francisco.

Clarinetist Is Favorite

Lalo's "Le Roi d'ys" was No. 5, with which the French musicians took up the program, and the clarinet of Leon Leroy reputed the world's greatest performe on this instrument, could be plainly heard through the whole volume o melody. M. Leroy was a member o the New York Symphony Orchestra a the beginning of the war, and went home to enlist. This number was deemed worthy of an encore and "Marche Gas conne," by Lacombe, was the response

In fact, the program arranged for the visiting bandsmen amounted practically to a Symphony program, Lalo and Bizet being among those whose compositions are frequently chosen for the Symphony concerts.

Last night Lalo's "Rapsodie Norvegienne" and Bizet's "L'Arlesienne No. 2" were selected. The oboe was clearly heard in the "Rapsodie," and after the final number by the Frenchmen, before the honors to the national airs, Louis Speyer, in response to the mighty encore call, stepped to the front and gave an oboe solo, ably supported by his comrades, and it was only when they struck up "La Marseillaise" that the audience let him go. The first flute was the characteristic of part (a) of "L'Arlesienne," the French horns of part (b) the farandole (c) was a favorite number that the Symphony Orchestra often plays at the "Pops."

Tonight the visitors will give a concert at Mechanics Hall for the benefit of the Foyer du Soldat, which Driver Kenney explained was a Y. M. C. A. and K. of C. in one for the benefit of French soldiers.

SUPERB FRENCH BAND CHEERED AT THE 'POPS'

Contains 28 First Prize Conservatory Men

All Have Seen Actual Service—Many Wear Croix de Guerre

The concert military band of 75 French musicians under the direction of Capt Gabriel Pares, now visiting America by the authority of the French Government, was guest at the "Pop" concert last night at Symphony Hall. Conductor Jacchia and his Symphony players gave the first division of the usual program, then at 9 left the stage to the distinguished visitors who entertained the audience until nearly 10:30. Then, after stirring performances of "The Marseillaise" and "The Star Spangled Banner," to insistent and furious applause, Louis Speyer, the highly gifted young soloist, gave true pleasure in Guillaud's first concerto by his polished phrasing and the tonal beauty of his playing.

After the members of the band had taken their seats, to constant applause, Wm. H. Kenney of the American Ambulance and president of the Emerson College of Oratory, spoke out of his personal knowledge from service at the front, of the band's membership, the rank of the players and their experience at the front.

There are 28 first prize men from the Paris Conservatory. The most skilled musicians from 20 regimental bands were chosen for this ensemble, representing also the orchestras of the Opera, the Opera Comique and the famous Guarde Republicaine Band. Curiously, Capt Pares' father was a member of the long distinguished French organization bearing that name, and with it visited Boston at Patrick Gilmore's invitation for his second great Peace Jubilee in 1872. A now somewhat faded picture of the band, taken on the Common at that time and still in the possession of the Symphony Hall management, was the source of much interest last evening to the visiting French conductor.

Mr Kenney said also that three of the men had served over a year in German prison camps, for the French military bandsmen are also stretcher bearers whose duty it is to find and bear to safety the wounded whenever and wherever they fall. Many of the players have themselves been wounded. One of the men was discharged after he had been gassed three times.

Owing to delayed baggage the overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" displaced that to Massenet's "Phedre." There was a Norwegian Rhapsody by Lalo, and to close the group, Bizet's second "L'Arlesienne" suite. Preceding came one of the features of the evening. Georges Mager, who already had shown the fine quality of his art as first Fleugel horn, displayed an excellent tenor voice, and sang with fine spirit a composition by Henri Fevrier, remembered as the composer of "Monna Vanna," written to a text, "Aux Morts Pour la Patrie," by Charles Peguy, who gave his life in the battle of the Marne in September, 1914. The audience, standing, vociferously demanded a repetition.

It is necessary but to speak of the superb qualities of this band assembled by the French Government, and sent to America under the veteran conductor, M Pares. There is that rich, distinctive tonal quality, blended of varied and beautiful timbres. The section of woodwinds and reeds, from flutes and clarinets with our old friend Leon Le Roy of the New York Symphony in the first chair, to the excellent English horn, the bassoons and saxophones, is admirably balanced and composed. The brasses, while using trombones of smaller bells than we, are mellow, gaining in quality by the use of a trio of Fleugel horns, unfortunately a neglected instrument in this country.

The precision with which these men play, the fine sense of proportion, the evidences of routine and knowledge of style are at once apparent. While strengthening yet more securely the bond between France and America at this time, this superb organization should stimulate yet greater improvement in our own military bands.

FRENCH MILITARY BAND AT SYMPHONY

Stirring War Numbers, Both Instrumental and Vocal, Enthuse Audience

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

It was a wildly enthusiastic night in Symphony Hall yesterday, with France and French music dominating the occasion. The band which is now touring America under Captain Gabriel Pares is one which should be heard by everybody interested in military music. Its special effects, its remarkable and sonorous tone colors, should be a lesson to many of our band-masters.

It is not the actual Garde Republicaine band as we remember it in Paris, not the celebrated organization which as long ago as 1872 came to Boston and won an artistic triumph, but it is nevertheless a fine specimen of the Gallic military music, and M. Pares having been for years the director of the great Garde Republicaine band, brings to us all the best effects, all the fine nuances of the school.

Much effect is made by saxophone work, which the French make more prominent than other nations. The use of contrabasses is always a good touch to the foundation of such music, but in the old Garde Republicaine we recall a couple of Sarussophones, a deep double-reed brass instrument, which gave the effect of a contra-basson and added greatly to the bass part. The trombones were another marvellous point of last night's performance. We think that some of these are of a narrower bore than some of our native instruments and have therefore a more incisive quality.

The oboe work was another striking feature. The French make the oboe far more prominent than other nations do in military music, and as they possess especially excellent wood-wind players, the effect is striking. Altogether we are disposed to consider the French the masters of the world in military music, and last night was an evidence of that fact. When Captain Pares was ordered by the French Government to make up a band for an American tour, he chose men from many different organizations, generally veterans of the war, and some of them famous artists. Even the man at the kettle-drums last night, for example, was a Paris Conservatoire first prize pianist.

But the flute, the piccolo, the saxophone all exhibited soloists of high rank, and at the end there came a soloist, M. Speyer, upon the oboe, who fairly rivalled our own great M. Longy. The concert of the French band (part two of the program) began with Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'ys," which had some exquisite points. Not only was the ensemble perfect, but the clarinettes and saxophones, which replace the strings in a military band score, gave a tone coloring which was very beautiful.

A fine effect was made by the second Suite Arlesienne, by Bizet, less well known than his first, but winding up most brilliantly with the boisterous Farandole, with the old Breton "Noel" melody, once in a charming canon, intertwined. In all this the directorial work of M. Pares was a study and a lesson to every musical auditor. He is a great master in his school.

The most vehement war number was vocal, by Fevrier, and sung by M. Georges Mager. The words of this stirring work were by M. Charles Pegny, killed subsequently at the battle of the Marne. M. Mager had a broad voice of baritone timbre, but of tenor range, and gave the noble song in a most worthy manner.

He was, of course, wildly encored. Everything was encored in this remarkable concert, and when the audience was not cheering they were rising to their feet to do visible homage to the veterans, and when the French band had played the "Marseillaise" twice over, and then bust into the "Star Spangled Banner" there was a frenzy of enthusiasm such as the sedate Symphony Hall had never heard before.

We are sorry that space forbids mention of the excellent performance of many French works by M. Agide Jacchia and the regular orchestra, but this time it is "Place aux Guerriers!"

SUPERB PLAYING BY FRENCHMEN AT POP CONCERT

Record June 19

Wild Enthusiasm for Musicians Who Have Served at Front

By J. V. Clark

The military band, Gabriel Pares, conductor, which the French Government has sent to this country, made its first Boston appearance last evening in Symphony Hall in the Pops series to an audience that filled every inch of the great auditorium. There was wild enthusiasm.

Many Bostonians have already heard the many members of this band for, as W. H. Kenney of the American Ambulance Service, who introduced the band, said, the band contained famous members of the orchestras of the Opera and Opera Comique, Paris, and the bands which give the delightful concerts at the Tuilleries and at Versailles, concerts enjoyed by thousands of traveling Bostonians in the days before the war.

It was not only the virtuosity of the musicians which the throng applauded. These Frenchmen are war heroes as well as musicians. In the band are 28 first-prize men from the Paris Conservatory. Many of the men have been wounded fighting for France and liberty. Many have been gassed, some have served terms in German prisons, many have been stretcher bearers, and all have seen service at the front. In making up the band the French Government selected war veterans who had great reputations as musicians and drew from 28 French bands to make up the present organization.

The playing of the band was almost beyond reproach. It would be hard to say wherein the band most excelled. There were times when it seemed as if the cornet section was the finest we have ever heard. The playing of this section was marked by almost unbelievable clarity and brilliancy. The trombones were not given as big a section as in some bands. Apparently their bore was smaller than the bore used in trombones in local bands.

On the other hand, the saxaphone was emphasized. The French like this instrument especially as an instrument for ensemble playing. The woodwinds were irreproachable. Two men in this section must be singled out for special mention. One is Lewis Speyer, who played an oboe solo, which almost equalled the playing of our Mr. Longy. The other is Leon Leroy, formerly with the New York Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Leroy played no solo number, but his exquisite phrasing and tone was discernible at various times throughout the evening. Mr. Pares uses two-stringed instruments in his band of 65. They are bass viols.

The greatness of the band consists both in the brilliancy of its individual players and its wonderful balance. The band played with enormous volume of tone and yet with the most delicate nuances.

The failure of certain instruments in arriving caused the substitution of Lalo's "Le Rio d'ys" for Massenet's "Phedre" overture for the first number. Bizet's second "L'Arlesienne" suite, less popular than the first and Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsody. Georges Mager, who plays the Fleugel horn, sang "Aux Morts pour la Patrie" a song, text by Charles Peguy, who gave his life for the Allied cause at the battle of the Marne, music by Fevrier, composer of "Monna Vanna," which Miss Garden and Mr. Muratore used to sing here. Mr. Speyer, as previously stated, played an oboe solo, and the band concluded its part of the program with the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner" and "The Marseillaise." Wild applause caused the repetition of both of these patriotic numbers.

The band, which will give a second performance at Mechanics Hall this evening, made a profound impression. This evening's performance will be at popular prices and will benefit the Foyer de Soldat, a French institution somewhat resembling our Y. M. C. A. and K. of C.

The guests last evening gave only the section of the Pops program, the first and third being given by the regular Pops orchestra under Mr. Jacchia. As if to show that they feared no comparison, Mr. Jacchia and his men played with special fire. The playing of the "Mignon" overture, which immediately followed the program of the French band, was one in which any orchestra and any orchestral conductor might take pride.

The evening was a notable one in all respects. Boston heard a great military band. Better still, Boston saw 65 artists who, when France was endangered, left their playing and their teaching and went to the front and fought the invader. Boston paid a great tribute to the visitors last evening a[illegible] will honor them again

'POP OF POPS' STIRS INTEREST

Herald 6/22

Thrift Stamps and Concert as an Extra Proves Popular Plan

MUSICIANS REGARD IT DUTY TO PLAY

Tickets for the thrift stamp concert, the "Pop of Pops," which is to be given tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall, sold briskly all day yesterday. Purchasers seemed more interested in the thrift stamps, which they received to the full value of the price of the tickets, examined them closely and moved away with expressions of satisfaction. It was an unusual experience to buy concert tickets, receive the tickets and their full value in young government war bonds as well.

There is more patriotism than appears on the surface in the arrangements for the concert. To many members of the orchestra, all of whom have volunteered their services, it entails a considerable sacrifice, for many of them have remunerative engagements for Sunday nights. Conductor Agide Jacchia himself responded with enthusiasm when Robert S. Weeks, who is in charge of the affair, asked him if he would conduct the concert.

He said:

"It will be not only my pleasure, but I regard it as a duty to do this. I am an Italian and I realize what devoted aid the United States has brought to the allies. I am always ready to do my part for the great cause for which we are fighting. And now that the Italian army is so gallantly blocking the Austrian advance it gives me even greater pleasure to be able to do this."

Conductor Jacchia has arranged a program which he thinks is appropriate to the occasion, and which is so popular in character that it will appeal to all music lovers. It includes the national hymns of France, Great Britain, Italy and the United States—and not a German composer is represented.

There will be no dignitaries on the stage, but a number are expected to occupy seats at tables, all of which will have produced revenue for the stamp drive. Lt.-Gov. Calvin Coolidge will represent the state; Mayor Peters, the city. Rear Admiral Spencer S. Wood and family will be there as well as Brig.-Gen. Ruckman.

$10,000 at Fish Pier

At a meeting yesterday afternoon at the Boston Chamber of Commerce a drive was started for $6,000,000 in pledges in $1000 lots in Boston during the coming week. State Director Robert F. Herrick urged the buying of the limit by those who have the means, in order that the average may reach $20 per capita. John R. Macomber allotted the 6000 sales equally amonb the 12 districts of the city. Col. W. A. Gaston classed buying stamps as a duty that no person able to meet could decently avoid.

A sunrise rally at the Fish pier, South Boston, yesterday, netted pledges of $10,000. Boston pledges up to last night totalled 61,246 out of 1,000,000 wanted. In Worcester county, Ashburnham, Hopedale, New Braintree, Paxton and Winchendon have raised their assigned quotas.

There will be an interesting rally at Filene's at 1 P. M. today at which Lt. Katherine McMahon, who served in France with the Harvard unit, will make an address. Sergt. Creed will also speak. On Monday the Code automatic gun, loaned to the war savings committee by Mr. Sharp of the Atlantic Fleet Corporation, will be hauled through the streets of the business district, attended by a guard of marines and Sailor Ryan. The latter will make several speeches.

Speakers for the stamps today will include: Mrs. Lewis Kennedy Morse, Administration Cottage, Boston Common, 12:15 P. M.; W. W. Dearborn, Peerless Knitting Mills, Riverside recreation grounds, 3 P. M.; Sapper Pinfold, Beverly Common, 4-5 P. M.; Charles F. Weed, Dedham Common, 6:30 P. M.; F. S. Childs, Natick Common, 7 P. M.; D. Maggi, Framingham, this evening; Judge John F. Brennan, Beacon Theatre; Thomas L. Walsh, Bijou; C. Claflin Davis, Boston Theatre; O. S. Marshall, Park Theatre; Coxswain Jack Hyde, "Pops"; Sailor Ryan, Shubert; Damon E. Hall, Tremont Theatre.

Herald June 19

FRENCH CAPTURE POPS AUDIENCE

Band of 60 Is Led by the Former Director of the Garde Republicaine

CONCERT TONIGHT FOR THE SOLDIERS

Those who went to the "Pops" last night and heard the French Military band had a memorable experience. The visitors played the second part of the program, and at the close there was nobody who doubted the statement made by Ambulance Driver William H. Kenney, a comrade of these bandsmen, in introducing them, that the French government, in selecting the personnel of this band of 60 players, had chosen those whom it deemed the best performers in France on their particular instruments. Neither was it hard to credit his further statement that 28 of these men were first-prize men of the Paris Conservatory, of which they are graduates.

Their leader, Capt. Gabriel Pares, formerly conducted the Garde Republicaine Band of Paris, with which he has twice visited this country, once to play at St Louis and the other time at San Francisco.

Clarinetist Is Favorite

Lalo's "Le Roi d'ys" was No. 5, with which the French musicians took up the program, and the clarinet of Leon Leroy, reputed the world's greatest performer on this instrument, could be plainly heard through the whole volume of melody. M. Leroy was a member of the New York Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the war, and went home to enlist. This number was deemed worthy of an encore and "Marche Gasconne," by Lacombe, was the response.

In fact, the program arranged for the visiting bandsmen amounted practically to a Symphony program, Lalo and Bizet being among those whose compositions are frequently chosen for the Symphony concerts.

Last night Lalo's "Rapsodie Norvegienne" and Bizet's "L'Arlesienne No. 2" were selected. The oboe was clearly heard in the "Rapsodie," and after the final number by the Frenchmen, before the honors to the national airs, Louis Speyer, in response to the mighty encore call, stepped to the front and gave an oboe solo, ably supported by his comrades, and it was only when they struck up "La Marseillaise" that the audience let him go. The first flute was the characteristic of part (a) of "L'Arlesienne," the French horns of part (b) the farandole (c) was a favorite number that the Symphony Orchestra often plays at the "Pops."

Tonight the visitors will give a concert at Mechanics Hall for the benefit of the Foyer du Soldat, which Driver Kenney explained was a Y. M. C. A. and K. of C. in one for the benefit of French soldiers.

Globe June 19

SUPERB FRENCH BAND CHEERED AT THE 'POPS'

Contains 28 First Prize Conservatory Men

All Have Seen Actual Service—Many Wear Croix de Guerre

The concert military band of 75 French musicians under the direction of Capt Gabriel Pares, now visiting America by the authority of the French Government, was guest at the "Pop" concert last night at Symphony Hall. Conductor Jacchia and his Symphony players gave the first division of the usual program, then at 9 left the stage to the distinguished visitors who entertained the audience until nearly 10:30. Then, after stirring performances of "The Marseillaise" and "The Star Spangled Banner," to insistent and furious applause, Louis Speyer, the highly gifted young soloist, gave true pleasure in Guillaud's first concerto by his polished phrasing and the tonal beauty of his playing.

After the members of the band had taken their seats, to constant applause, Wm. H. Kenney of the American Ambulance and president of the Emerson College of Oratory, spoke out of his personal knowledge from service at the front, of the band's membership, the rank of the players and their experience at the front.

There are 28 first prize men from the Paris Conservatory. The most skilled musicians from 20 regimental bands were chosen for this ensemble, representing also the orchestras of the Opera, the Opera Comique and the famous Guarde Republicaine Band. Curiously, Capt Pares' father was a member of the long distinguished French organization bearing that name, and with it visited Boston at Patrick Gilmore's invitation for his second great Peace Jubilee in 1872. A now somewhat faded picture of the band, taken on the Common at that time and still in the possession of the Symphony Hall management, was the source of much interest last evening to the visiting French conductor.

Mr Kenney said also that three of the men had served over a year in German prison camps, for the French military bandsmen are also stretcher bearers whose duty it is to find and bear to safety the wounded whenever and wherever they fall. Many of the players have themselves been wounded. One of the men was discharged after he had been gassed three times.

Owing to delayed baggage the overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" displaced that to Massenet's "Phedre." There was a Norwegian Rhapsody by Lalo, and to close the group, Bizet's second "L'Arlesienne" suite. Preceding came one of the features of the evening. Georges Mager, who already had shown the fine quality of his art as first Fleugel horn, displayed an excellent tenor voice, and sang with fine spirit a composition by Henri Fevrier, remembered as the composer of "Monna Vanna," written to a text, "Aux Morts Pour la Patrie," by Charles Peguy, who gave his life in the battle of the Marne in September, 1914. The audience, standing, vociferously demanded a repetition.

It is necessary but to speak of the superb qualities of this band assembled by the French Government, and sent to America under the veteran conductor, M Pares. There is that rich, distinctive tonal quality, blended of varied and beautiful timbres. The section of woodwinds and reeds, from flutes and clarinets with our old friend Leon Le Roy of the New York Symphony in the first chair, to the excellent English horn, the bassoons and saxophones, is admirably balanced and composed. The brasses, while using trombones of smaller bells than we, are mellow, gaining in quality by the use of a trio of Fleugel horns, unfortunately a neglected instrument in this country.

The precision with which these men play, the fine sense of proportion, the evidences of routine and knowledge of style are at once apparent. While strengthening yet more securely the bond between France and America at this time, this superb organization should stimulate yet greater improvement in our own military bands.

Advertiser June 19

FRENCH MILITARY BAND AT SYMPHONY

Stirring War Numbers, Both Instrumental and Vocal, Enthuse Audience

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

It was a wildly enthusiastic night in Symphony Hall yesterday, with France and French music dominating the occasion. The band which is now touring America under Captain Gabriel Pares is one which should be heard by everybody interested in military music. Its special effects, its remarkable and sonorous tone colors, should be a lesson to many of our band-masters.

It is not the actual Garde Republicaine band as we remember it in Paris, not the celebrated organization which as long ago as 1872 came to Boston and won an artistic triumph, but it is nevertheless a fine specimen of the Gallic military music, and M. Pares having been for years the director of the great Garde Republicaine band, brings to us all the best effects, all the fine nuances of the school.

Much effect is made by saxophone work, which the French make more prominent than other nations. The use of contrabasses is always a good touch to the foundation of such music, but in the old Garde Republicaine we recall a couple of Sarussophones, a deep double-reed brass instrument, which gave the effect of a contra-basson and added greatly to the bass part. The trombones were another marvellous point of last night's performance. We think that some of these are of a narrower bore than some of our native instruments and have therefore a more incisive quality.

The oboe work was another striking feature. The French make the oboe far more prominent than other nations do in military music, and as they possess especially excellent wood-wind players, the effect is striking. Altogether we are disposed to consider the French the masters of the world in military music, and last night was an evidence of that fact. When Captain Pares was ordered by the French Government to make up a band for an American tour, he chose men from many different organizations, generally veterans of the war, and some of them famous artists. Even the man at the kettle-drums last night, for example, was a Paris Conservatoire first prize pianist.

But the flute, the piccolo, the saxophone all exhibited soloists of high rank, and at the end there came a soloist, M. Speyer, upon the oboe, who fairly rivalled our own great M. Longy. The concert of the French band (part two of the program) began with Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'ys," which had some exquisite points. Not only was the ensemble perfect, but the clarinettes and saxophones, which replace the strings in a military band score, gave a tone coloring which was very beautiful.

A fine effect was made by the second Suite Arlesienne, by Bizet, less well known than his first, but winding up most brilliantly with the boisterous Farandole, with the old Breton "Noel" melody, once in a charming canon, intertwined. In all this the directorial work of M. Pares was a study and a lesson to every musical auditor. He is a great master in his school.

The most vehement war number was vocal, by Fevrier, and sung by M. Georges Mager. The words of this stirring work were by M. Charles Pegny, killed subsequently at the battle of the Marne. M. Mager had a broad voice of baritone timbre, but of tenor range, and gave the noble song in a most worthy manner.

He was, of course, wildly encored. Everything was encored in this remarkable concert, and when the audience was not cheering they were rising to their feet to do visible homage to the veterans, and when the French band had played the "Marseillaise" twice over, and then bust into the "Star Spangled Banner" there was a frenzy of enthusiasm such as the sedate Symphony Hall had never heard before.

We are sorry that space forbids mention of the excellent performance of many French works by M. Agide Jacchia and the regular orchestra, but this time it is "Place aux Guerriers!"

Record June 19

SUPERB PLAYING BY FRENCHMEN AT POP CONCERT

Record June 19

Wild Enthusiasm for Musicians Who Have Served at Front

By J. V. Clark

The military band, Gabriel Pares, conductor, which the French Government has sent to this country, made its first Boston appearance last evening in Symphony Hall in the Pops series to an audience that filled every inch of the great auditorium. There was wild enthusiasm.

Many Bostonians have already heard the many members of this band for, as W. H. Kenney of the American Ambulance Service, who introduced the band, said, the band contained famous members of the orchestras of the Opera and Opera Comique, Paris, and the bands which give the delightful concerts at the Tuilleries and at Versailles, concerts enjoyed by thousands of traveling Bostonians in the days before the war.

It was not only the virtuosity of the musicians which the throng applauded. These Frenchmen are war heroes as well as musicians. In the band are 28 first-prize men from the Paris Conservatory. Many of the men have been wounded fighting for France and liberty. Many have been gassed, some have served terms in German prisons, many have been stretcher bearers, and all have seen service at the front. In making up the band the French Government selected war veterans who had great reputations as musicians and drew from 28 French bands to make up the present organization.

The playing of the band was almost beyond reproach. It would be hard to say wherein the band most excelled. There were times when it seemed as if the cornet section was the finest we have ever heard. The playing of this section was marked by almost unbelievable clarity and brilliancy. The trombones were not given as big a section as in some bands. Apparently their bore was smaller than the bore used in trombones in local bands.

On the other hand, the saxaphone was emphasized. The French like this instrument especially as an instrument for ensemble playing. The woodwinds were irreproachable. Two men in this section must be singled out for special mention. One is Lewis Speyer, who played an oboe solo, which almost equalled the playing of our Mr. Longy. The other is Leon Leroy, formerly with the New York Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Leroy played no solo number, but his exquisite phrasing and tone was discernible at various times throughout the evening. Mr. Pares uses two-stringed instruments in his band of 65. They are bass viols.

The greatness of the band consists both in the brilliancy of its individual players and its wonderful balance. The band played with enormous volume of tone and yet with the most delicate nuances.

The failure of certain instruments in arriving caused the substitution of Lalo's "Le Rio d'ys" for Massenet's "Phedre" overture for the first number. Bizet's second "L'Arlesienne" suite, less popular than the first and Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsody. Georges Mager, who plays the Fleugel horn, sang "Aux Morts pour la Patrie" a song, text by Charles Peguy, who gave his life for the Allied cause at the battle of the Marne, music by Fevrier, composer of "Monna Vanna," which Miss Garden and Mr. Muratore used to sing here. Mr. Speyer, as previously stated, played an oboe solo, and the band concluded its part of the program with the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner" and "The Marseillaise." Wild applause caused the repetition of both of these patriotic numbers.

The band, which will give a second performance at Mechanics Hall this evening, made a profound impression. This evening's performance will be at popular prices and will benefit the Foyer de Soldat, a French institution somewhat resembling our Y. M. C. A. and K. of C.

The guests last evening gave only the section of the Pops program, the first and third being given by the regular Pops orchestra under Mr. Jacchia. As if to show that they feared no comparison, Mr. Jacchia and his men played with special fire. The playing of the "Mignon" overture, which immediately followed the program of the French band, was one in which any orchestra and any orchestral conductor might take pride.

The evening was a notable one in all respects. Boston heard a great military band. Better still, Boston saw 65 artists who, when France was endangered, left their playing and their teaching and went to the front and fought the invader. Boston paid a great tribute to the visitors last evening a[illegible] to honor them again [illegible]

Herald June 22 135

'POP OF POPS' STIRS INTEREST

Herald 6/22

Thrift Stamps and Concert as an Extra Proves Popular Plan

MUSICIANS REGARD IT DUTY TO PLAY

Tickets for the thrift stamp concert, the "Pop of Pops," which is to be given tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall, sold briskly all day yesterday. Purchasers seemed more interested in the thrift stamps, which they received to the full value of the price of the tickets, examined them closely and moved away with expressions of satisfaction. It was an unusual experience to buy concert tickets, receive the tickets and their full value in young government war bonds as well.

There is more patriotism than appears on the surface in the arrangements for the concert. To many members of the orchestra, all of whom have volunteered their services, it entails a considerable sacrifice, for many of them have remunerative engagements for Sunday nights. Conductor Agide Jacchia himself responded with enthusiasm when Robert S. Weeks, who is in charge of the affair, asked him if he would conduct the concert.

He said:

"It will be not only my pleasure, but I regard it as a duty to do this. I am an Italian and I realize what devoted aid the United States has brought to the allies. I am always ready to do my part for the great cause for which we are fighting. And now that the Italian army is so gallantly blocking the Austrian advance it gives me even greater pleasure to be able to do this."

Conductor Jacchia has arranged a program which he thinks is appropriate to the occasion, and which is so popular in character that it will appeal to all music lovers. It includes the national hymns of France, Great Britain, Italy and the United States—and not a German composer is represented.

There will be no dignitaries on the stage, but a number are expected to occupy seats at tables, all of which will have produced revenue for the stamp drive. Lt.-Gov. Calvin Coolidge will represent the state; Mayor Peters, the city. Rear Admiral Spencer S. Wood and family will be there as well as Brig.-Gen. Ruckman.

$10,000 at Fish Pier

At a meeting yesterday afternoon at the Boston Chamber of Commerce a drive was started for $6,000,000 in pledges in $1000 lots in Boston during the coming week. State Director Robert F. Herrick urged the buying of the limit by those who have the means, in order that the average may reach $20 per capita. John R. Macomber allotted the 6000 sales equally among the 12 districts of the city. Col. W. A. Gaston classed buying stamps as a duty that no person able to meet could decently avoid.

A sunrise rally at the Fish pier, South Boston, yesterday, netted pledges of $10,000. Boston pledges up to last night totalled 61,246 out of 1,000,000 wanted. In Worcester county, Ashburnham, Hopedale, New Braintree, Paxton and Winchendon have raised their assigned quotas.

There will be an interesting rally at Filene's at 1 P. M. today at which Lt. Katherine McMahon, who served in France with the Harvard unit, will make an address. Sergt. Creed will also speak. On Monday the Code automatic gun, loaned to the war savings committee by Mr. Sharp of the Atlantic Fleet Corporation, will be hauled through the streets of the business district, attended by a guard of marines and Sailor Ryan. The latter will make several speeches.

Speakers for the stamps today will include: Mrs. Lewis Kennedy Morse, Administration Cottage, Boston Common, 12:15 P. M.; W. W. Dearborn, Peerless Knitting Mills, Riverside recreation grounds, 3 P. M.; Sapper Pinfold, Beverly Common, 4-5 P. M.; Charles F. Weed, Dedham Common, 6:30 P. M.; F. S. Childs, Natick Common, 7 P. M.; D. Maggi, Framingham, this evening; Judge John F. Brennan, Beacon Theatre; Thomas L. Walsh, Bijou; C. Claflin Davis, Boston Theatre; O. S. Marshall, Park Theatre; Coxswain Jack Hyde, "Pops"; Sailor Ryan, Shubert; Damon E. Hall, Tremont Theatre.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

TRIBUNE
New York City
JUN 6 - 1918

THEORETIC AND APPLIED PATRIOTISM AND MUSIC

The Nationalism of Our Orchestra Conductors a Test of Leadership Since the Internment of Dr. Muck—Sir Henry Wood Acceptable, If Willing

By H. E. Krehbiel

IF, AS has been said and then unsaid, Sir Henry Wood has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the problem set by the internment of Dr. Muck has been solved in a manner equally agreeable to the mere patriot and the mere music lover. To the music lover who is also filled with a lively sense of patriotism such a solution would be more than agreeable: it would be a cause for sincere rejoicing, which could be greater only if an equally capable American had been chosen for the position. Such a man, however, does not seem to be in sight, and if the managing committee of the orchestra must needs go abroad for their conductor it will be a comforting and reassuring circumstance if they make choice from a people whose loyalty to the cause in which America is enlisted is absolutely free from suspicion. This would not have been the case with any other one of the men whose names and merits were canvassed in connection with the post except Signor Toscanini. This great artist would, no doubt, have been enthusiastically received everywhere, but especially in New York, where he would also have repaired the defection which will probably result from the controversy which embittered the closing days of last season. But Signor Toscanini's greatest admirers here had grave doubts as to whether he is constitutionally and temperamentally fitted for the onerous task which a fundamentally wrong system of concert-giving has forced upon the symphonic organizations of Boston and New York.

Such work as Signor Toscanini did in preparing the concerts which he gave at the Metropolitan Opera House, when he amazed the knowing with his performances of Beethoven's D minor symphony and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," would be impossible were he obliged to conduct over a hundred concerts in six months; and if [illegible] not be satisfied with anything short of the best. His habit, too, of memorizing thoroughly every score to which he gives a public reading would ruin the mind of even a musical Morphy. Let us be glad that so sincere an artist was not tempted into the dangerous experiment.

Russian Could Not Be Found

The committee into whose hands Major Higginson surrendered the task which he performed so long and so well made a strenuous endeavor to secure the services of Mr. Rachmaninoff, but was, we believe, unable to locate him owing to the disturbed state of everything in what once was Russia. Mr. Rachmaninoff made a deep impression upon the musical people of America who came in contact with him during his visit to this country, and there would have been no reason as yet apparent to question his loyalty to the cause of America and her allies in the war against Germany and her cohorts. This cannot be said about some of the others with Slavic names who were mentioned privately and in the public prints as candidates for the place. A vote of the people of Seal Harbor, Me., would scarcely have offered a position of patriotic trust to either Mr. Stokowski (had his conduct toward the Cincinnati Orchestra not debarred him from consideration) nor Mr. Gabrilowitsch, to whom Detroit has offered a berth, accompanied by the proclamation—all the more vulgar if it is true—that he is to receive the largest salary ever paid to a musical conductor in America. Both of these gentlemen are now advertising their loyalty to America and American ideals, but they have not invited inquiry among their associates as to their private sentiments.

The manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra, in announcing a series of concerts in New York next season, tells us that Mr. Stokowski was born in London of a Polish father and an Irish mother, but this is far from being even presumptive evidence of an hereditary hatred of Teuto-Austrian aims in the present war or sympathy with this country in its efforts to nullify those aims. When a devoted admirer in New York presented him with a house as a gift he chose Munich as its site, not New York or Philadelphia. Mr. Stokowski is said to have "announced his intention of becoming a citizen of this country" immediately after coming to America in 1905, and it is added that "in due time this intention was realized," which is a somewhat vague statement concerning his naturalization, though it is more than we have heard about Mr. Gabrilowitsch, who found a hospitable asylum here after being compelled to leave his home in Bavaria after the outbreak of the war.

How much and what kind of Russian is he? or—what is more to the purpose in the present crisis—what kind of American is he? Cincinnati, having seen to it that the conductor of her orchestra was interned in Fort Oglethorpe, called in M. Ysaye, a patriotic Belgian and sufferer from the war, to succeed him and thereby set an excellent example which might well be followed by other organizations of its kind.

The Dependence Upon Foreigners

It is a lamentable circumstance that the orchestras of the United States should seem almost wholly to be dependent upon foreigners as conductors, and the fact that some of these men are now making loud protestations of devotion to our country's ideals offers nothing in the way of extenuation for their conduct in the past. There are men in every rank of life and every profession ready to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee" when "thrift may follow fawning." Is Mr. Stock an American citizen? Is Mr. Oberhoffer? Is Mr. Hertz? Is Mr. Bodanzky? The first has been with us thirty years. All but the last have lived through a period in which Germany conducted an insidious campaign to establish imperium in imperio here; by the federation of German societies, sending royal messages, medals and flags to German military veterans, exchanging professorships with our universities, founding Germanistic societies, establishing a museum at Harvard by direct imperial gift, and finally by sending the Kaiser's brother as an imperial ambassador to weld together all the agencies designed to disintegrate American nationalism.

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH — KARL MUCK — LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI

The time for musicians who came to America to get what their fatherlands would not give them to declare their allegiance to the United States was then; they cannot do it now without suspicion. Their purpose to hold on to fat contracts and line their purses is too obvious. If we cannot have conductors of native birth let us at least have Britons, Frenchmen, Italians or Belgians. The tenure of loyalty in the other countries, even Russia, is too unstable.

The Attitude on Germanic Music

The question is one of living men and their national affiliations, not one of the source of an art. The public mind seems to be sadly muddled as to the attitude which our concert and operatic institutions ought to adopt toward German music and German musicians. There has been little if any effort to differentiate between an art and its practitioners, between an expression of the beautiful, which because of its nature is guiltless or incapable of political sentiments now abhorred by nearly all the nations of the earth, the masters who created it with neither knowledge nor premonition that the people to whom they belonged would revert to moral savagery after their death and the practitioners who are living under that savagery and upholding it. Yet to make such a distinction ought to be instinctive in every intelligent child. To banish Wagner's dramas from the stage can as little serve the cause for which the wealth, life and honor of our nation are pledged as to bedaub the statues of Goethe and Schiller, as was done at Chicago and Baltimore. Are not such acts foolish and futile follies of which we should be ashamed? We set up a statue of Heine in New York largely as a protest against the attitude of the German Emperor, who will not tolerate a memorial of that uncompromising democrat in Berlin. Why should we seek to dishonor the symbols of our former veneration for the genius of Goethe, who refused to hate France and its literature even while Germany was seeking to throw off the Napoleonic yoke, and of Schiller, who hymned Freedom in what is now called the "Ode to Joy" which Beethoven, a hater of German political institutions and lover of the British constitution, helped to make immortal?

Opera and the Political Beliefs

Why should Wagner's dramas have been banished from the Metropolitan repertory? Because of the political beliefs of the composer? Assuredly not, for he was a revolutionary against the monarchical state while living and after death left no preachments which can bring comfort and justification to the would-be destroyers of the political ideals for which Americans are fighting and dying. He wrote a silly lampoon on the French government after the Franco-Prussian War, but its banality avenged its composition on his fame. He wrote a march to glorify William I, but his political reputation wrought its rejection at the function for which he had designed it. He also wrote a march to celebrate the centenary of the Declaration of American Independence, though with it he garnered as little artistic glory as he had with his foolish French farce.

Should Wagner's dramas be banished from our stage because of the doctrines which they inculcate? The world has learned to smile at Wagner as a philosophical poet. Even the redoubtable Shaw breaks down in the elucidation of the doctrines of socialism assumed to underlie "The Ring of the Nibelung" when he reaches the last drama of the tetralogy; wherefore he proclaims "Götterdämmerung" mere opera and poor opera at that. But the underlying purpose of "The Ring" is to teach that selfish egoism expressed in terms of brute force must give way to a new dispensation of justice and love; the selfish will of Wotan is broken by the willing and unselfish self-sacrifice of Brünnhilde. Are not these principles exemplified in the great conflict raging to-day? The brutal reign of the Hun must give way to the dominion of righteousness. Shall we quarrel with that ideal? Or with the basic conception in "Tannhäuser" that salvation comes to humanity through the love of pure womanhood? Then must we condemn the uplifting fable of Alkestis and empty our vessels of contumely on Euripides and Gluck. Is there aught of political or moral obliquity in "Parsifal," whose fundamental thought is that it is the enlightenment which comes to humanity through pity and compassion which brings salvation? How do we feel toward Belgium, which interposed its dead body between the Hunnish wave and civilization? Or Serbia? Or Armenia? "Die Meistersinger"? That comedy has no other than an artistic purpose—to illustrate the conflict between the creative and regulative impulses in art, between radicalism and conservatism, romanticism and classicism rightly understood. "Lohengrin"? Alas, for proud Elsa and her prototype, Psyche! The Knight of the Grail ought not to have stayed up so late to apostrophize the balmy zephyrs and odors on his wedding night. But he came in chivalric pity to rescue a damsel in distress. Is there harm in the contemplation of his dilatoriness?

The Attitude of the Public Toward Germanic Music; Its Dead Composers and Living Practitioners' Creative Spirit in Their Music Crushed

Creative Spirit in Their Music Crushed

The man Wagner then cannot be to us the rock of offence, nor can the ethical aims of his creations. What remains? Only the language of his vocal music, which has become hateful to us because of the nation that uses it as a vernacular. Because of this hatred we have suffered the loss of not only Wagner's dramas but the music of the songs of Schubert, Schumann, Franz, Brahms and other masters of German lyricism—the music of composers who wrote before the materialism created by German imperialism had crushed the creative spirit out of German music. Let it not be forgotten that the days of Germany's greatness in literature and music were antecedent to her political greatness. The soil of Prussianism has produced nothing in art. The last truly great composer who lived down into the days of the empire in the line of succession to Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann was Brahms, and he was the son of the once free city of Hamburg, as his predecessors were sons of the people of their petty states. The Great Dead owed nothing to Germany united under the yoke of Prussia—neither the poets who were destroyed by the monarchs whom they had compelled to emancipate themselves nor the composers who sang in blissful carelessness of the political conditions which surrounded them. Beethoven only loomed up in his time as a democrat willing to remain estranged from his native Rhineland, chafing under the bonds which held him in Vienna, damning the régime which gave him of its bounty and admiring the English and their constitution. "You have heads on your shoulders in England," said he to an English visitor, and on his death-bed he called for a reading of the entire speech of Canning, advocating recognition of the independence of the South American republics. But we must not listen even to Beethoven's celebration of conjugal love and fidelity because "Fidelio" has German words.

Opera in English and in Italian

We heard "Martha" and "Die Zauberflöte" last season, but they were sung in Italian; we heard Liszt's "Saint Elisabeth," but it was sung in English; an older generation of opera lovers learned to admire "Lohengrin," sung in Italian. Why might not all of Wagner's dramas and those of other German composers be saved for us by the same device? It is simple, and so long as the German tongue is hateful to our ears it will suffice. There is talk at the Metropolitan of reviving "Oberon," probably because it can be sung to the English text for which the music was composed. Weber will thus be saved from contumely, as Flotow, Liszt and Mozart were last season; though the management will, perhaps, discreetly conceal the fact if Wüllner's recitatives are used. Spoken dialogue is not effective in the Metropolitan Opera House.

Putting aside the question of language, however, it was sound and sensible, as well as proper and practical, to put a taboo upon enemy aliens in our opera house for the simple reason that by retaining and remunerating them we were putting money into their hands which will eventually be turned into aid and comfort for Germany and her allies. In a sense it is merely a part of the commercial warfare which must accompany and follow the murderous struggle now going on in Europe. If it involves a sacrifice of artistic excellence now, which we do not believe, it will in the end bring us profit in the recognition and development of our own resources. The last season of opera at the Metropolitan Opera House saw the end of the old and the beginning of a new era. The just claims of our native talent, creative and re-creative, are to be met—their just claims, not the demands of opinionated arrogance. There is no danger that the supply of non-German operas, singers and orchestral players will be so exhausted that we shall be thrown back upon blatant and pretentious mediocrity in any field. No more danger than that we shall continue to be dependent, or think we are dependent, on the music of living German composers. That also may righteously pass under taboo. We ought not to pay royalties to the composers who belong to enemy nations. Neither ought we to steal their products, for we are not Prussianized and, pray God, never shall be. The simple expedient is to exclude from our repertories and concert lists all works which yield emoluments to German composers or German publishers. The artistic loss will not be great, for the masters of German music are dwelling where royalties are unknown and happily and happily unneeded. But let us not starve our souls to feed a futile grudge.

EVENING MAIL
New York City

With the Musicians

By SIGMUND SPAETH.

THE new directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are showing no inclination to hurry in their appointment of a successor to Dr. Muck. Sir Henry Wood, of London, was offered the place, but declined it, and it is now generally admitted that the Russian, Rachmaninoff, also refused to become a Bostonian.

One name has not yet been mentioned in connection with the Boston orchestra, yet it seems a logical one for consideration. The name is Pablo Casals.

The great Spanish 'cellist is well known as a conductor abroad, having led the Colonne orchestra in Paris, the Madrid and Barcelona symphony orchestras and an orchestra at Lucerne. His musicianship has been placed by such distinguished authorities as Ysaye, Kreisler and Huneker above that of any living artist.

Casals has conducted only once in America, when he led a small orchestra at a concert given by his wife, Susan Metcalf Casals, also appearing as her accompanist at the piano. But his popularity as a musician is already firmly established, and as an orchestral conductor of Lati nblood he would attract not only great numbers of American music lovers, but also the large following which he has among the cultivated South Americans living in the United States.

From every point of view Boston would be wise in considering Pablo Casals as a possible leader for its world-famous symphony orchestra.

n MORNING TELEGRAPH
ress: New York City
JUN 7 1918

Tormenting Interned Enemies.

The uneasiness of the Kaiser over reports of the cruel and unusual treatment extended to interned Germans in American prisons may be increased when he learns that Herr Doktor Karl Muck, sometime leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but now confined in the military bull-pen at Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, has been not only permitted but encouraged to organize an orchestra of nearly fifty pieces played by inmates of that bastile. It is also reported that the new Muck Symphony Orchestra is allowed or obliged to play every time the warden says so, and Musical America is perturbed to the extent of saying: "It is not yet reported that attendance at the Muck prison symphonic concerts is to be made compulsory, but some of us can wish our Teuton malefactors no bitterer punishment than to be compelled to endure some of the programs that Muck used to inflict on meek and long-suffering New York audiences."

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

m AMERICAN
dress: New York City.
JUN 9 - 1918
te

MONTEUX MAY DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Metropolitan Conductor Is Now Favorite Choice of Board of Trustees as Successor to Dr. Muck with Hub Organization

By MAX SMITH.

NOW that all rumors regarding the engagement of Sir Henry Wood as Dr. Muck's successor have been silenced by the English conductor's complete refusal to abandon his activities in London, the new board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Association ought to spare no effort in trying to procure the services of Arturo Toscanini, for surely no other conductor comparable with him is available here or abroad. But, lo! another story has emerged in the meantime from the mysterious shadows of gossipland. According to the whispering intimations of some wise persons, the big men of the Hub have been flirting of late with Pierre Monteux, amiable wielder of the baton during the past season in the Metropolitan Opera House and erstwhile expert in choreographic persuasions for the Ballet Russe.

This latest yarn, it must be confessed with all due respect for Monsieur Monteux, seems to be beyond the bounds of credibility nor does it meet with approval in the temple of music on Broadway, where, as far as can be ascertained, there is no disposition at present to find a substitute for the French leader. It is true that as artist and man Monsieur Monteux has won many friends in New York. He is not only a musician in the best sense of the word, but a gentleman through and through. But while these characteristics would be very acceptable in the Hub, no doubt for did not reports of Toscanini's "artistic temperament" weigh heavily in the scales against the Italian maestro in that centre of culture?—the people of Boston presumably are fully informed of Pierre Monteux's record as conductor of opera, ballet and symphony, and recognize that he hardly won't be able to hold his own in the line of those who sustained the tradition of Colonel Higginson's splendid orchestra through so many years.

Apart from the absurd fear that Arturo Toscanini, high-strung as he is, might be an uncomfortable man to deal with and upset the equanimity of the orchestra and its board of directors, no legitimate argument can be brought against the engagement of the Italian. There was a time, it is true, when shortsighted and prejudiced men, ignoring the fact that practically all great wielders of the baton, such as Hans Richter, Artur Nikisch and Gustav Mahler, to mention a few examples, have been equally successful in the domain of operatic and symphonic music, ventured to insist that outside of lyric drama Toscanini would be disappointing. All misgivings in regard to the scope of his powers were dispelled effectually, however, on April 13, 1913, when he conducted in the Metropolitan Opera House before one of the most brilliant audiences that had ever foregathered there, a programme embracing Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Beethoven's choral symphony.

If the directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, perchance, have any doubt of Toscanini's superlative ability as a symphonic conductor, let them only consider the paeans of praise which his performance of the above mentioned works evoked even from those who had not been altogether favorably disposed toward the maestro.

Here, in part, is what W. H. Henderson wrote:

"Too much is said about Mr. Toscanini's 'genius' and not enough about his scholarship, his profound comprehension of orchestral tone values and his skill in adjusting them, his experience in the art of getting at results with combinations of vocal and instrumental masses, his indefatigable industry and his unflagging enthusiasm. Much of Mr. Toscanini's 'genius' is of the old type—'an infinite capacity for taking pains.'

"The qualities just enumerated stood out in brilliant prominence last night, and brought about one of the most admirable performances of the ninth symphony within the memory of the oldest music lover. In the first place, let it be recorded that Mr. Toscanini's tempi were not always wise. This was so in the scherzo and still more so in the slow movement, which lost much of its nobility and repose, but in spite of the quick movement of these tempi, the conductor found places for nuances of delicacy and significance. There was, above all things, no caprice in the use of dimmuendi and crescendi, of quickening and retarding the speed. Continence in nuance was the characteristic of the reading, and every modification had reason and a message.

"The performance was noteworthy for its exquisite clarity. The tonal balance, the crispness of rhythm and the exposition of every necessary passage of counterpoint were achievements of the highest art. Above and beyond all was the reverence which the great conductor showed for the spirit of the work. It was, on the whole, a dignified and temperamental reading; one which instantly claimed and to which will be accorded, at least a comparison with those of the great conductors of previous performances. It was the interpretation of a sound musician of catholic taste, gifted with imagination and real temperament."

Regarding "Till Eulenspiegel" Mr Henderson was no less laudatory. "It was a superb performance by reason of the vigorous and masterly grasp of the work by the conductor. Humor, gayety, sentiment and tragedy—insofar as the last lends itself to satire—were in the reading. No other performance of this composition within the memory of the Sun's observer surpassed it in brilliancy of style, in symmetry of plan. It was the production of a great conductor working in a field wholly sympathetic."

In the opinion of Richard Aldrich, Toscanini "revealed in the fullest measure the qualities of the great symphonic conductor. He showed that he had a profound understanding of the widely differing character of the three compositions that made up the programme."

Of the Beetthoven symphony the critic of the Times wrote as follows:

"Mr. Toscanini met in an unusual degree Wagner's criterion of the 'melos,' of keeping unbroken the essentially melodic line that underlies it. The orchestra sang throughout; and in all the nuances of the performance the melodic line was not interrupted; nor in all the plastic shaping of phrase was the symmetry of the larger proportions or the organic unity of the whole lost sight of. It was rhythmically of extraordinary vitality. It was a conservative reading without exaggerations or excesses. There were subtle and significant modulations of tempo, but never of a disturbing sort. It was devoted to the exposition of Beethoven, and not of Mr. Toscanini, and it rose in heights of eloquence without the intrusion of the conductor's personality. * * * It was recognized as a remarkable performance, and a profoundly impressive one. And one of its obvious results was to prompt the wish that a way might be found for Mr. Toscanini to conduct more symphonic concerts for the New York public."

T. KELLY Co.
ESTABLISHED 1863
"It's Easy to Pay the Kelly Way"
Long Credit
Easy Payments
A comfortably furnished home is the best kind of economy. Good furniture gives good service, makes the home a pleasant place to live in and increases the happiness and efficiency of every one in it. FURNISH YOUR HOME COMFORTABLY by our EASY, CONVENIENT PAYMENT plan. Every article marked in plain figures.
4-Piece Period Bedroom Suites in Bird's-Eye Maple, Golden Oak, American Walnut or Mahogany, ranging in prices from..... $125 to $250
T. KELLY CO. 263 Sixth Avenue, Near 17th St. 104-106 W. 17th St
Out-of-town deliveries made by our motor trucks.

LEGRAM
New York City.

ENEMY MUSIC.

Among other things it is suggested that we put a ban on German music. To head off argument it may as well be stated right here that there is no desire among Americans to become as mean and brutal as the Hun, but it is time we exercised a little common sense.

Why fatten the alien enemy's purse, flatter his vanity, advance his propaganda and his vile cause and insult our own people by tolerating German music?

Why accept the purely German dictum that German music is the best on earth?

Why encourage Captain von Papen in his expressed and written belief that we are "bloedsinnege"—"idiotic Yankees?"

Bands at Camp Wadsworth, Spartanburg, S. C., found rehearsing German marches were stopped and works of Hun composers forbidden, not by the camp authorities but by the band leaders.

Outside of compositions by English, French and Italian musicians we should like to know whether there are any more stirring or any better marches than those of our own Lieutenant John Philip Sousa?

Why German, therefore?

Another thing, any one hearing the French Military Band with its fine soloists at Carnegie Hall last Thursday must admit the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Karl Muck never will be missed.

By the way, see that Dr. Muck is whiling away the time in the pleasant internment camp he was sent to organizing another symphony orchestra. Stop it. We need laborers. Let Dr. Muck work. An American in Germany who did what Washington admits Dr. Muck did in this spy-cursed country of ours would not be alive to-day.

Harking back to French music, if any additional marches are needed let our bandsmen, for one, learn the march the French Military Band closed their concert with and get some drummers like those Captain Gabriel Pares has in his celebrated organization.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

Stransky, Goritz, Bodanzky.

Editor Globe:—Congratulations on the excellent letter in The Globe on June 5, entitled "The Philharmonic Conductor." The protest by your American correspondent against the retention in office at $25,000 a year of Josef Stransky, Austrian subject, an intimate friend of the unlamented Doktor Karl Muck and the lamentable Ambassador Bernstorff, comes at the suitable moment when the German U-boats are sinking unarmed American ships off the Atlantic coast.

In fact, there is a brilliant irony in this piratical visit by the Germans and the tenderness with which we caress the representatives of Teutonic Kultur within our gates. All last week we had Otto Goritz, staunch supporter of the Lusitania sinking, disporting himself as "Gast Kunstler" at the German Theatre in Irving place. On Tuesday night Artur Bodanzky, Austrian subject, was acclaimed rapturously at the concert in Carnegie Hall.

Stransky, Goritz, and Bodanzky! How these public appearances in New York of enemy aliens will rejoice the illustrious autocracies in Berlin and Vienna! What will our allies think in Paris, London, and Rome when the American public permits the exaltation of and homage to three musicians, all of them so inextricably bound to the nefarious spirit of the central empires which seeks to crush freedom from the face of the

WORLD
ess: New York City

Casals for Symphony Conductor.

To the Editor of The World:

We have recently read with interest that Gabrilowitsch, the renowned pianist, has been engaged as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of Detroit. In the mean time we are informed that the Boston Symphony Society is looking for a leader for its orchestra. As one of the attendants of its concerts since its early days, when Gericke held the baton. I am writing to ask why a man well known to the music-loving public of America and acknowledged to be one of the best musicians living, should not be chosen to fill the place. I refer to the renowned cellist, Pablo Casals, who is said to be the greatest interpreter of Bach and other composers of classical music.

He has conducted many orchestras and choral societies in Europe, among them "Les Concerts Colonne" of Paris, France's most famous symphony society; the Madrid Symphony Orchestra, the Barcelona Symphony and a symphony orchestra in Lucerne.

No German or Austrian leader would be persona grata to American audiences at this time, but Mr. Casals, coming from Spain, a neutral country, would not only be most acceptable to Bostonians and New Yorkers but would also have a very large following of cultured South Americans who spend a great deal of time in the United States.

I need only quote a few words of praise from some of the leading musicians and critics to support what I have said. Ysaye proclaimed Casals to be "the greatest interpretative artist I have ever heard." Kreisler pronounced him "the greatest musician who has ever drawn the bow." James Huneker declared, "He is simply a remarkable artist, a musician born, who on any instrument, from an organ to a fine-tooth comb, would reveal his temperament."

Will you not ask your readers to express their opinions in regard to my suggestions?

(MRS. FREDERICK) MAUD NATHAN.

New York, June 5.

PRESS
ress Philadelphia, Pa.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Decisions of great moment in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has blazed new trail at various points in the development of American music, are in process of being made. At the end of its last season, following the stormy period in which Dr. Muck involved the organization, Major Higginson, of Boston, its founder and patron, let loose the reins of government and the orchestra automatically passed out of the first phase of its existence. His announcement made known the fact that hereafter the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be conducted as most other similar organizations in the country are, as a corporate enterprise with the inevitable deficit defrayed by a group of guarantors instead of by one individual.

It is now made known that the new administration of the orchestra is gradually weeding out those players who shared with the former conductor a pro-German view of the world's affairs. At the same time the news comes that Sir Henry Wood, of London, who had been invited to become the conductor of the reconstituted organization, had declined the honor on the plea that he did not wish to leave his country at this time.

The de-Germanizing process will presumably have the happy effect of restoring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to that good will on the part of the public which it had lost through Dr. Muck's attitude, which had seemed to be reflected by some portion of the membership of the body.

It is a subject for interesting speculation whether the present would not be a propitious time, in view of the declination of Sir Henry Wood, to still further Americanize this famous institution by securing as conductor some one who, whether American-born or not, has been identified with our musical life to some degree and who would possess a sympathetic viewpoint the task of guiding the orchestra into paths consonant with American ideals and American musical aspirations. If we are ever to have a national school of music of our own it will be formed by the gradual evolution from purely European influences such as would be illustrated in the change suggested.

The Boston Symphony guards jealously its very high standards of performance, and it is eminently proper that it should. At the same time

From POST
Address New York City
Date

Casals as Conductor.

To the Editor of The Evening Post:

Sir: We have recently read with interest that Gabrilowitsch, the renowned pianist, has been engaged as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of Detroit. In the meantime we are informed that the Boston Symphony Society is looking for a leader for its orchestra. As one of the attendants of its concerts since its early days, when Gericke held the bâton, I am writing to ask why a man well known to the music-loving public of America, and acknowledged to be one of the best musicians living, should not be chosen to fill the place? I refer to the renowned 'cellist, Pablo Casals, who is said to be the greatest living interpreter of Bach and other composers of classical music.

He has conducted many orchestras and choral societies in Europe, among them Les Concerts Colonne, of Paris, France's most famous symphony society; the Madrid Symphony Orchestra, the Barcelona Symphony, and a symphony orchestra in Lucerne.

No German or Austrian leader would be persona grata to American audiences at this time, but Mr. Casals, coming from Spain, a neutral country, would not only be most acceptable to Bostonians and New Yorkers, but would also have a very large following of cultured South Americans who spend a great deal of time in the United States.

I need only quote a few words of praise from some of the leading musicians and critics to support what I have said: Ysaye proclaimed Casals to be "the greatest interpretative artist I have ever heard." Kreisler pronounced him "the greatest musician who has ever drawn the bow." James Huneker declared: "He is simply a remarkable artist, a musician born, who on any instrument from an organ to a fine-tooth comb would reveal his temperament."

Will you not ask your readers to express their opinions in regard to my suggestion?

MAUD NATHAN.

New York, June 6.

The Boston Post June 26 - 1918

SYMPHONY'S NEW LEADER, SIR HENRY WOOD, WAS A GENIUS AS A CHILD

Famous English Orchestral Conductor Won't Allow Tuning Up Fiddles in Public—Comes From Musical English Family—A Composer in Youth—Nearly Became a Painter

Sir Henry J. Wood, who, it is reported, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season.

Henry J. Wood at the age of 10.

The man who won't allow a single fiddle to be scraped in public has been asked to come to Boston to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Dr. Karl Muck, lately interned as an alien enemy.

He is an Englishman—Sir Henry J. Wood.

Beyond dispute Sir Henry J. Wood is England's greatest conductor. He has raised the famous Queen's Hall Orchestra to its high rank and has also won a great reputation on the continent.

But he won't allow his musicians to scrape their fiddles in public before the opening of a concert. All tuning must be done off-stage. When Sir Henry is holding the baton the orchestra assembles half an hour before a concert, each musician tunes his instrument, which has to "pass" the conductor before being taken on the platform. In this way the public is spared that familiar scraping and hooting which only a Fiji Islander would consider the best thing in the programme, and the orchestra starts the concert, at least, with a uniform standard of accurate tuning.

Sir Henry Wood in action.

Which fact in itself is not sufficient for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to seek the services of this distinguished musician. He has hundreds of other attractive qualities.

In the first place, he comes from a family of musicians. Sir Henry is a Londoner born and is 48 years old. He was the only child of his parents, who were both natives of England, although his mother was of Welsh origin. To this Celtic strain he probably owes his striking physiognomy—the warm dusky coloring, the vivacious play of feature and vehemence of gesture which distinguish him from the average type of Englishman.

As beforementioned, his musical gift was inherited from both sides of the family. His father, besides being a good amateur 'cellist, was for 25 years solo tenor at the Church of St. Sepulchre, in London. Sir Henry's mother was a charming singer, and to her the conductor is indebted for his early musical education.

His father was proud of his accomplishments, but it was his mother who helped him patiently through all the initial difficulties which—even for a highly-gifted child—beset the first steps of musical knowledge. She, too, it was who first awoke his keen interest in music, and especially in singing. In this, as in many other matters, she influenced him deeply.

[illegible] of the fund[illegible] the age of six years [illegible] take part in the music [illegible] classical masters, such as [illegible] ydn.

[illegible]oy he showed as much aptitude [illegible] as for piano, and at 10 often [illegible] as deputy organist of St. Mary, Aldermanbury. At 17 he was appointed organist and choirmaster of St. John's at Fulham.

The youth studied for six terms at the Royal Academy of Music, where he won four medals.

Almost before he was in his teens he took part, at least two or three nights a week, in chamber music at home. He first came before the public as an organist. The recitals of "Master Henry Wood" were a feature of the Fishmongers' Exhibition in 1883 and the Inventions' Exhibition of 1885. A year or [illegible] later he began to be in demand as an accompanist.

From 1885 to 1890 he served his apprenticeship, giving numerous organ recitals and accompanying at many important concerts.

While still a boy Henry J. Wood's nights were busy with composition, and about 1888 his name appeared freely in programmes as a song [illegible]. He next tried his hand at light operas, cantatas and oratorio, and several of his works were performed about this time in London and the British provinces.

It was always Henry J. Wood's ambition to be a "professional" conductor—a specialist in his own line. His first experience as a conductor was gained during a four months' tour with the Arthur Rousbey Opera Company, beginning in September, 1889.

The autumn of 1890 brought a better chance of winning distinction in this line, for he was engaged by Sir Arthur Sullivan and Mr. D'Oyly Carte to superintend the rehearsals of "Ivanhoe," produced at the new Royal English Opera House (now the Palace Theatre) in March, 1891.

From then on his activities as conductor for a time may be briefly summarized as follows:

1891—Carl Rosa Opera Company.
1892—Leslie Crotty and Georgina Burns Opera Company.
1893—Signor Lago's Italian Opera season.
1894—Farewell concert tour of Marie Roze.
1894—Avenue Theatre.
1895—Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts.
1897—Queen's Hall Symphony Concerts.
1897—Queen's Hall Choral Society Concerts.
1897—Queen's Hall Sunday Orchestral Concerts.
1898—Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society.
1899—Founded Nottingham City Orchestra.
1899—London Musical Festival.
1900—Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society.
1901—Wagner Festival Concerts, Albert Hall.
1901-2—Queen's Hall Saturday Symphony Concerts, Crystal Palace.
1904-5—Provincial tours.
1905—Queen's Hall Orchestra.
1906—Royal Albert Hall Sunday Afternoon Orchestral Concerts.
1907—Birmingham Symphony Concerts.
1902-5-8-11—Sheffield Festivals.
1904-6-8-10-12 — Westmoreland Festivals (Kendal).
1908—London Philharmonic Concerts.
1908-11—Norwich Festivals.
1911-12-13—Cardiff Orchestral Concerts.
1910-11-12—Gentlemen's Concerts, Manchester.
1912—Birmingham Festival.
1912—Shakspere's England, Earl's Court, Historical Concerts.
1910-11-12—Brand Lane's Concerts, Manchester.
1913—Parsifal Tableaux, London Coliseum.
1913-18—Queen's Hall Orchestra.

Wanted to Be Painter

Until he was 17 years old, Henry Wood had set his mind on becoming a great painter. Even today he is devoted to the art of sketching and a fine afternoon sometimes finds him rushing off to the country to indulge in his hobby.

Sir Henry, however, has little time for sketching nowadays. His motto is "Rehearse! rehearse! rehearse!" and, [illegible] he often [illegible] But he has always been [illegible] worker, and when at 19 he [illegible] Rousbey Opera Company as conductor he frequently worked 12 hours a day for two guineas a week. What is more, he kept up this laborious and unlucrative life for four years.

Sir Henry was knighted in 1911, on New Year's Day, in the first batch of titles bestowed by King George V. He had been in America for a short visit in 1903, when he conducted the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, making a remarkably favorable impression.

It is not unlikely that Sir Henry feels some affection for America, for his orchestra was financed by Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Speyer, wealthy Americans, when no one else in England would run the risk. Sir Henry had 2000 standing every week-day night for 12 weeks running each season and he has said that not once in his career has he ever had to rap his baton for silence in that great standing crowd.

Sir Henry has been married twice. His first wife was Princess Olga Ourousoff of Podolia, Russia. She fell in love with him because he was the only man she had met who could interpret Russian music. They were married in 1898. The Princess died in 1909. In 1911 he was married to Miss Muriel Greatrex, the daughter of an English major. He has two daughters.

SIR HENRY WOOD ONCE HEARD SYMPHONY HERE

Sir Henry Wood, on his last visit to Boston, in January, 1904, attended a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he is now reported to have been chosen to lead during the coming season. Sir Henry was on his way to assume his duties as conductor of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society of New York, and stopped off here to listen to the Boston Orchestra, which was at that time conducted by Mr. Gericke.

TRIBUTE TO WOOD WHEN HE WAS MADE A KNIGHT

When Sir Henry Wood was knighted by King George V., the Pall Mall Gazette paid him the following tribute:

"It has been rightly earned, no less by the gifted conductor's special talent as such than by his sympathy and willingness to hold out a helping hand to many a young composer who has had the inestimable advantage of obtaining the first public test of his music's worth."

Advertiser May 26 - 19[illegible]

CLASS WOOD WITH BEST LEADERS

Sir Henry Would Be Great Acquisition for Symphony Orchestra

ENGLISH KNIGHT MAY BECOME CONDUCTOR

Has Won Laurels in Every Branch of Music Leadership

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston breathes easier. One of the greatest conductors of Europe has been offered the position of leader of our Symphony Orchestra. For the first time the German succession is broken and an English knight may take the baton.

Sir Henry J. Wood has won laurels in every branch of musical conductorship. A barren biography would be out of place here, but it is sufficient to state that he began his career as deputy organist in a London church at ten years of age. He was born in London, March 3, 1870, his father being an Englishman, his mother Welsh. The father was a good violoncellist and was for 25 years solo tenor at St. Sepulchre's.

The son studied at the Royal Academy of Music, in London, his chief teachers being Ebenezer Prout, the contrapuntist, and Manuel Garcia, the veteran vocalist. Before he was 17 years of age he had given public organ recitals and became regular organist of a large London church.

CONDUCTOR AT 19.

At this time he also gave good promise in composition and had written masses and even larger works, such as oratorio and cantata. But when he decided to become a conductor he sternly cut off this part of his work. He began conducting in 1889, when he was but 19 years of age, and his first leadership was entirely in the domain of opera. His work in opera was continuous and very brilliant.

His direction of Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onegin" first brought him in contact with Russian music, which he afterwards took under his special protection in London.

During this period he was also prominent as a vocal teacher, and he is the author of an important book on the management of the breath in singing.

In 1894 we find him at Bayreuth winning the friendship of Felix Mottl and appointed adviser for the Wagner concerts at Queen's Hall, London. In 1895 his connection with the promenade concerts began, and he at once began to give the public much higher music than was until then deemed practicable in popular concerts. He is one of the best of program makers and has achieved absolute triumphs all the way from Bach to Rimski-Korsakoff.

Occasional opera came into the career again, as for example the conducting of Stanford's "Shamus O'Brien," in which he was decidedly successful. But the general trend was now towards the highest orchestral ideal, and symphony concerts, Sunday concerts and great musical festivals followed each other rapidly.

It would be too long a list to give here to enumerate the many large festivals which Sir Henry Wood has conducted. Sheffield, London, Norwich, Birmingham and other cities, furnished occasion year after year for the growth of this eminent musician. His first wife also became associated with him in his work. She was Olga, the only daughter of Princess Ourossov of Podolia, who was one of his vocal pupils, and became a famous singer. She died in 1909. He subsequently married again, a Miss Greatrex.

CREATED TWO ORCHESTRAS.

He practically created two orchestras. He trained the Queen's Hall Band to a wonderful degree of perfection, when, in 1902, most of his musicians seceded and formed a co-operative orchestra—the London Symphony Orchestra, which Richter, in the Encyclopedia Britannica glibly classed as the best orchestra in the world.

If it was so, it was because of Sir Henry Wood's training. But he immediately got another set of musicians together and proceeded to build another equally great organization, which has continued down to the present.

We have classed him as a great program maker. His concerts in their breadth of scope remind of that broadest of musical leaders, Theodore Thomas. He made London to love Tschaikowsky, he fought the battle of Richard Strauss and Wagner, he helped the modern English school.

He is a choral expert of highest rank, and this will mean that our wonderful choral concerts of last season will not only not cease but may be advanced, if he undertakes them.

He is a superb drill-master. This means that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not deteriorate as a musical organization, if he becomes its conductor. The men will find in Sir Henry a replica of Gericke, plus modernity and enthusiasm of interpretation.

One instance of his attention to detail may show this. In one of the festival performances of Bach's B minor Mass, the most difficult choral work of the present, he published a book of 108 pages of minute explanation to the chorus, a monument of painstaking fidelity to an ideal.

He has appeared as "guest-conductor" in both Berlin and New York, but these performances of course gave no inkling of what he could do with an orchestra which he had trained continuously. One would think that this was quite enough for one man to achieve, but in his leisure moments

Page 2, Column 5.

Classes Wood with Best Musicians

Continued from First Page.

Sir Henry J. Wood is a good painter.

We wonder whether he would introduce here his favorite plan of setting the orchestra. He generally has all the violins at his right, the violas, cellos and contrabasses at his left, the wood-wind in the centre and the brasses back of them. It is quite possible that we may prepare for this.

In appearance Sir Henry is a rather thick-set, black-bearded and mustachioed man of forty-eight, with a very firm beat in conducting, with considerable emphasis on the down beats.

The combination of broad catholic tastes, of elasticity and enthusiasm of interpretation, and of thorough routine work, is indeed a rare one, but it exists in Sir Henry J. Wood. Boston is fortunate in the choice and let us hope the acceptance, of committee and conductors. Science teaches us that Wood is a good conductor, and our future musical experience will confirm this physical fact, if the "party of the second part" arrives.

SIR HENRY J. WOOD, who has been offered the position of conductor of Symphony Orchestra.

Transcript May 28

Globe May 28

Herald May 28

Advertiser June 22

Globe June 22

139

A POP FOR THE RED CROSS

$2700 for the Current Fund and an Uncommonly Lively Evening at Symphony Hall with a Men's Chorus and an Assisting Audience in War Songs as Well as the Usual Orchestra

COLONEL NEWCOME, had he visited Symphony Hall last evening, would have thought himself in the "Cave of Harmony" — a "Cave of Harmony" even livelier than he and Clive found the original, by reason of much martial singing, a roaring enthusiasm for war that occasionally rocked the hall, and speeches by two fire-breathing soldier boys that would have sent the good colonel into transports of joy. The Pops, in committee of the whole, constituted themselves a town meeting inclined toward song, with an auction to enliven the proceedings, and the town band to play a few lively airs. In the long history of the Pops this was the first Pop Concert given by the audience. Nominally in honor of the Red Cross, the evening was rather an honor to the audience. Enthusiasm, first for the cause of the great organization of mercy, and then for the larger cause of purging our troubled footstool of its military marauders, poured from the purse as freely as it issued from the lungs. It was a spirited evening. Colonel Newcome would have been more than pleased.

Since the band itself, except as it abetted the healthy human willingness to sing, was crowded into the background, it may be dismissed with casual remark. Yet with a sense of playing to ears uncommonly alert, it played with vastly more than the routine spirit. Before the martial fever swept the hall, Mr. Jacchia put his men through the pretty paces of Mr. Paderewski's Minuet, and the novel overture by a South American. Familiar strains from "Butterfly" recalled the crowd for a moment to the fact of music. And a truly brilliant performance of the finale to Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony revived the tradition of the orchestra, even after Mr. Townsend's chorus had spread the virus of a yearning to sing. After that the audience took the stage.

Even so, three novelties towered notably from the town meeting character of the concert. Mr. Hadley's "Angelus" was roundly applauded for reasons other than that its composer happens to be an American. He stood to hearty approval because his airs were poetically conceived and as poetically played. Mr. Townsend offered proof that "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" may gain in dignity and power, wrested from association with a less worthy old ditty, and set to measures that play the imagination of a poet musician over its solemnity. And in Mr. Converse's music to a poem by Madison Cawein, the public has had given it, if it wishes, a song of loyalty and purpose a little less forbidding and ceremonial but not less fervent than Mrs. Ward's pæan to freedom.

Otherwise the crowded hall rang with popular ditty and high spirits that often escaped music altogether and broke into cheers. Sergeant Creed from the front, and Private Halligan from the camp, lit the fires of patriotism with their appeals for the Red Cross budget. Posters were put on the block, and the auction of a jeweled purse fetched not more bursts of laughter than bids of money. Colonel Newcome would most surely have bid it in at a handsome figure, but only to present it in as handsome a manner, and with much gallant hesitation, to the most interested and spirited lady bidder, whom he had purposely defeated. Even without his inspiring presence and infectious good nature, a round sum of money was realized for the Red Cross, and hours of gayety for those who gave it—in all $2741.60, divided between the sale of tickets ($1000); contributions from the audience ($1418.35) and contributions from the orchestra and the managerial staff ($323.25).

Minor items of American news report the impending trial of a new comedy, "David's Adventure," from the pen of A. E. Thomas; the making of a new musical play in which Joseph Santley is to be starred; and a round of the vaudeville theatres by the Sisters Herne—Miss Chrystal and Miss Julie seldom seen together on any stage.

Transcript May 28

NEWS OF MUSIC

Sir Henry Wood Finally Declines the Boston Orchestra—Mr. Campanini's Cantor—The Flourishing Busoni

WORD comes from London this morning that, in spite of general anticipation to the contrary, Sir Henry Wood has declined the proffered conductorship of the Boston Orchestra, preferring to continue his work in London. The more the pity. If, as presumption goes, Mr. Toscanini is also unwilling to take the post, the field narrows to Mr. Rakhmaninov, who, being penniless and jobless, would hardly refuse it, and to one or two Parisians of no such rank in conducting as the Italian, the Russian and the Englishman.

Fragments of operas, French, Italian, Russian and German, fill Mr. Jacchia's programme for the Pop Concert this evening—among them the Overture to "Tannhäuser," unheard at Symphony Hall since last October and the Polonaise from Chaikovsky's "Eugen Onègin," an infrequent piece anywhere. The full list is:

Prelude, "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini
Meditation, "Thais"	Massenet
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Walpurgis Night Music, "Faust"	Gounod
Delilah's Air, "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saëns
Intermezzo, "I Pagliacci"	Leoncavallo
Overture, "Tannhäuser"	Wagner
Selection, "La Bohème"	Puccini
Polonaise, "Eugen Onègin"	Chaikovsky
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni

MORE THAN $4000 IS RAISED AT CONCERT

Benefit for Red Cross Fund at Symphony Hall

Sergt Creed and Private Halligan Appeal for Money

The Pop concert Red Cross Night in Symphony Hall, last night, arranged by Maj Henry L. Higginson in conjunction with the Metropolitan Chapter, proved both popular and successful, more than $4000 being turned over to the Red Cross at the close of the performance.

Sergt Edward Creed, son of Judge Creed, and private Christopher Halligan of Dorchester, now at Camp Devens, appealed for contributions during the intermissions with telling results. Several complete sets of Red Cross posters and a jewel-studded gold purse were auctioned off by private Halligan and Charles Pierce of the Red Cross committee for sums aggregating more than $1500.

More than 40 girls of the Red Cross assisted in taking contributions. In addition to contributions by the audience of $1418.35, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and staff made gifts amounting to $323.25. The proceeds from the sale of seats turned over to the Red Cross totalled $1000.

At intervals, Mr Jacchia and the orchestra gave way to a large chorus of men recruited and directed by Stephen Townsend, which helped the big audience to get acquainted with some new war songs, some of them written by soldiers, and all bristling with the patriotic challenge, the humor and slang, the red-blooded virility of true war spirit.

Mr Townsend persisted in his invitations until he had a good number of the 3000 or more people leaving their cigars, drinks, ice cream or pretzels long enough to be with him in Lieut Gitz-Rice's "We Stopped Them at the Marne," "I Want to Go Home," and 'Keep Your Head Down, Fritzie Boy," the solo parts of which had been sung by John W. Peirce.

Frederick S. Converse conducted his chorus "Under the Stars and Stripes," which, with Charles Bennett as soloist, aroused great enthusiasm. "Pack Up Your Troubles in Your Old Kit Bag," with Ralph Brown singing the verses, was a favorite, but the whirlwind demonstration was reserved for the group for everybody in good earnest—"Keep the Home Fires Burning," "A Long, Long Trail," and the immortal "Over There," the singing of which beggars description.

Mr Jacchia, choosing an "Allied" program, had found Gomez' "Il Guarany" overture for Brazil, a Paderewski Minuet for Poland, Enesco's Rhapsody for Rumania, with more familiar music to represent France, Italy and England.

With Lieut Sousa, Mr Converse and Victor Herbert as his American associates, Henry Hadley contributed his "Angelus," a wholly grateful piece of tone painting, bringing warm acknowledgment from the audience which was received in person by the composer.

POP CONCERT ADDS $2741 TO RED CROSS FUND

Symphony Hall hung out the "S. R." sign when the doors opened last night for the special Pops concert, which netted $2741.60 for the Red Cross War Fund. Long before the opening hour the sidewalk before the entrances was packed with an eager crowd, which, attracted by the military program and the Red Cross posters, begged for tickets when no tickets were available.

Such an enthusiastic audience has not been seen at the Pops for many a day. The entire floor was given over to reserved tables, and when the first note of "God Save the King" sounded, the whole house rose in a body and sang with the orchestra.

A male chorus of 100 voices from the Boston Symphony Chorus and the Apollo Club, conducted by Stephen Townsend, sang three songs written by Lieut. Gitz Rice of the 1st Canadian Contingent, the audience joining in vigorously. They were: "We Stopped Them at the Marne," "I Want to go Home," and "Keep Your Head Down Fritzie Boy," the last two written at Ypres. Other well-known war songs put the audience into a patriotic mood, and the response to the appeals of the Red Cross girls was hearty.

Following "La Marseillaise," Sergt. "Eddie" Creed of the 101st Infantry and Priv. Halligan of the headquarters troop, 76th Division, made rousing appeals for aid for the Red Cross and held a brisk auction where they disposed of various contributed articles.

From the sale of tickets $1000 was taken in; contribution by the audience, $1418.35; contributions from the orchestra and staff, $323.25. In addition, over $1500 was realized from the auction of a jewel-studded gold purse and Red Cross posters.

POPS AUDIENCE AIDS RED CROSS

Maj. Higginson Forwards $2741.60 as Proceeds of Concert

$1500 MORE REALIZED FROM AUCTION SALE

Last night was Red Cross night at the "Pops" and Symphony Hall was crowded as it seldom is, even at these popular music festivals, and war songs gave color to the program that was appreciated by the highly patriotic audience.

Three songs, the words and music of which were written by Lt. Gitz Rice of the 1st Canadian contingent, were sung by a male chorus conducted by Stephen Townsend, and the audience joined in them with hearty fervor. They were: "We Stopped Them at the Marne," "I Want to Go Home," and "Keep Your Head Down, Fritzie Boy," the two latter having been written at Ypres. The more familiar "Keep the Home Fires Burning," "A Long, Long Trail" and "Over There" were sung later, the program being punctuated with "God Save the King," the Garibaldi hymn, and "La Marseillaise," with "The Star Spangled Banner" reserved for the finale.

After the French national hymn Sergt. Edward B. Creed of the 101st and Priv. Halligan of the headquarters troop, 76th division, made stirring appeals for funds for the Red Cross, auctioning off articles which had been contributed for sale. These appeals have been made on other evenings recently at the "Pops" and their effect upon the audience has been almost magical. Young women, attired in Red Cross costume, passed the soldiers' headdresses about the floor and received the offerings, which often took on a character of generosity that might have been almost termed princely.

Maj. Higginson, after the concert, sent the proceeds of the evening's entertainment to Edwin S. Webster, chairman of the metropolitan Boston committee for the campaign, with the following letter:

"With the approval of your committee the Pop concert at Symphony Hall tonight, Monday, May 27, was given for the benefit of the second Red Cross war fund. I enclose cheque of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for $2741.60 which represents profit from sale of tickets, contributions by the audience, and by members of the orchestra and the staff at Symphony Hall. This cheque does not include moneys collected for the Red Cross at the Pop concerts on Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings of last week.

The proceeds from the sale of tickets netted $1000; contributions by the audience amounted to $1418.35; and contributions by members of the orchestra and staff were $323.25.

In addition more than $1500 was realized by auctioning a jewel-studded gold purse and Red Cross posters.

SYMPHONY ENGAGES FRENCH VETERANS

Five Members of Famous Band, All War Heroes, to Play in Orchestra Here

One of the immediate and most pleasing results of the memorable visit of the French Military Band this week has been the engagement by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of five of its members, all of whom are regarded as very distinguished musicians.

As is generally known, all the members of this French Military Band are veterans. Just before they left France they were informed by the Minister of Fine Arts that the French government felt that they had done their bit in the war, and that if any of them was successful in securing an engagement in America, permission would be given to him to remain in the United States following the close of the tour of the French band, which is set for the end of August.

Some of the soloists of the band, which is of extraordinary calibre, created a profound impression by their playing. This is only to be expected, as no less than twenty-eight of them hold first prizes from the Paris Conservatoire.

Knowing the quality of these musicians, the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra felt the time favorable to do some recruiting, with the result that contracts have been signed by five of the bandsmen. These are Abdon Lauc, bassoon; Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernand Thillois, violinist, and Georges Miquelle, violoncello.

Herald June 22

SYMPHONY SIGN FRENCH PLAYERS

Five Members of Militar Band Engaged by the Orchestra

SOLOISTS MADE GOOD IMPRESSION HERI

Five members of the great French Military Band, which has been playing an engagement in Boston and vicinity this week, have been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their contracts to start when the band ends its present tour in August. They are Abdon Laus, bassoon ;Emil Stievenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernand Thillois, violin, and George Miquelle, violoncello.

Just before these men left France they were informed by the minister of fine arts that the French government felt that they had done their share in the fight against the Germans, and that the men could consider themselves free to accept engagements in America at the close of their tour. Some of the soloists created a deep impression here, which is no more than might be expected, as 28 of them hold first prizes from the Paris Conservatoire.

All Fine Players

M. Speyer roused great admiration for his tone and technique in a solo he played at Symphony Hall Tuesday night. He won his conservatoire prize in 1911 and has played with the Colonne and Opera Comique orchestras; the Champs Elysees Theatre and the Vichy and Deauville casinos.

Stevenard is said to be the greatest master of the bass clarinet in Europe. He has written a school for the bass clarinet, is professor in Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum and has been a member of the Lamoureux and Opera Comique orchestras. He was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

M. Laus is a protege of the famous Pierre Monteux. Besides other famous organizations he has played in the Paris opera and the classical concerts at Pau. He is a first prize man.

M. Thillois received second prize at the Conservatoire in 1912. He was called away immediately for his two years military service. Then came the war, and he served with the fighters until this spring.

M. Miquelle is regarded as having unusual talent as a 'cellist. He is a first prize man, and was a soloist at the Concerts' Wurmser in Paris.

SYMPHONY GETS FIVE FROM FRENCH BAND

Artists Will Return Here After American Tour

To Replace Alien Enemy Musicians, It Is Rumored

After serving their country valiantly through three years of war, five premier musicians of France are to become members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This announcement was made last night by the trustees of the orchestra, who, while Capt Pares' French band was here this week, took the opportunity to secure recruits for the orchestra.

All members of the band are war veterans. Just before they left France they were informed that the French Government felt they had done their duty in the war and that if any were successful in obtaining engagements in America, permission would be given for them to remain in the United States.

Some of the soloists of the band created a profound impression. No less than 28 of them hold first prizes from the Paris Conservatoire.

Symphony Orchestra contracts have been signed by the following bandsmen: Abdon Laus, bassoon; Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernand Thillois, violin, and Georges Miquelle, violoncello.

M Speyer took a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1911 and has played with the Colonne Orchestra and the Opera Comique Orchestra; the Theatre des Champs-Elysees and the Casions at Vichy and Deauville.

M Stievenard has the reputation of being the greatest master of the bass clarinet in France. He was a first-prize winner at the Paris Conservatoire, has been a member of the Lamoureux and Opera Comique Orchestras and is a professor at Vincent dIndy's Schola Cantorum. He has written a study for the bass clarinet that is a standard work. M Stievenard was wounded at the battle of Yser.

M Laus is a first-prize man. He has played at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees and Ballet Russe, in the Concerts Sechiari at Paris, in the Paris Opera and the classical concerts at Pau.

M Thillois, the new violinist, received second prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1912. He was called away immediately for his military service of two years. Then came the war and he served continuously until this Spring. He has played in the Concerts Sechiari in Paris and in Nantes.

M Miquelle is regarded as a most unusually talented 'cellist. He was a first-prize winner at the Paris Conservatoire; a soloist in the Concerts Wurmser in Paris and was a member of the Colonne Orchestra.

These musicians will come to Boston to assume their new duties about Sept 1 or as soon as they complete their present tour with Capt Pares, it is understood.

It is rumored that a number of alien enemy members of the Symphony Orchestra have been released and that it is the aim of the trustees to replace them with the pick of the world's musicians who come from friendly or neutral coun-

Transcript May 28

Globe May 28

Herald May 28

Advertiser June 22

Globe June 22

139

...that ... Symphony ...eriorate as a ...if he becomes ...en will find in ...of Gevaert, plus ...usiasm of in-

...attention to de- ...In one of the ...es of Bach's B ...st difficult choral ..., he published a ...f minute explana- ...a monument of ...to an ideal. ...as "guest-conduc- ...n and New York, ...nces of course gave ...he could do with ...if he had trained ...would think that ...ough for one man ...his leisure moments

...Column 5.

...ood with ...t Musicians

...om First Page.

...d is a good painter. ...ether he would in- ...favorite plan of set- ...a. He generally has ...his right, the violas, ...abasses at his left, ...n the centre and the ...hem. It is quite pos- ...y prepare for this. ...Sir Henry is a rather ...-bearded and mus- ...forty-eight, with a ...in conducting, with ...phasis on the down

...on of broad catholic ...city and enthusiasm ...n, and of thorough ...s indeed a rare one. ...Sir Henry J. Wood. ...ate in the choice and ...acceptance, of com- ...ctors. Science teaches ...is a good conductor, ...e musical experience ...s physical fact, if the ...econd part" arrives.

...RY J. WOOD, who ...en offered the posi- ...onductor of Sym- ...hestra.

A POP FOR THE RED CROSS

$2700 for the Current Fund and an Uncommonly Lively Evening at Symphony Hall with a Men's Chorus and an Assisting Audience in War Songs as Well as the Usual Orchestra

COLONEL NEWCOME, had he visited Symphony Hall last evening, would have thought himself in the "Cave of Harmony" — a "Cave of Harmony" even livelier than he and Clive found the original, by reason of much martial singing, a roaring enthusiasm for war that occasionally rocked the hall, and speeches by two fire-breathing soldier boys that would have sent the good colonel into transports of joy. The Pops, in committee of the whole, constituted themselves a town meeting inclined toward song, with an auction to enliven the proceedings, and the town band to play a few lively airs. In the long history of the Pops this was the first Pop Concert given by the audience. Nominally in honor of the Red Cross, the evening was rather an honor to the audience. Enthusiasm, first for the cause of the great organization of mercy, and then for the larger cause of purging our troubled footstool of its military marauders, poured from the purse as freely as it issued from the lungs. It was a spirited evening. Colonel Newcome would have been more than pleased.

Since the band itself, except as it abetted the healthy human willingness to sing, was crowded into the background, it may be dismissed with casual remark. Yet with a sense of playing to ears uncommonly alert, it played with vastly more than the routine spirit. Before the martial fever swept the hall, Mr. Jacchia put his men through the pretty paces of Mr. Paderewski's Minuet, and the novel overture by a South American. Familiar strains from "Butterfly" recalled the crowd for a moment to the fact of music. And a truly brilliant performance of the finale to Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony revived the tradition of the orchestra, even after Mr. Townsend's chorus had spread the virus of a yearning to sing. After that the audience took the stage.

Even so, three novelties towered notably from the town meeting character of the concert. Mr. Hadley's "Angelus" was roundly applauded for reasons other than that its composer happens to be an American. He stood to hearty approval because his airs were poetically conceived and as poetically played. Mr. Townsend offered proof that "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" may gain in dignity and power, wrested from association with a less worthy old ditty, and set to measures that play the imagination of a poet musician over its solemnity. And in Mr. Converse's music to a poem by Madison Cawein, the public has had given it, if it wishes, a song of loyalty and purpose a little less forbidding and ceremonial but not less fervent than Mrs. Ward's pæan to freedom.

Otherwise the crowded hall rang with popular ditty and high spirits that often escaped music altogether and broke into cheers. Sergeant Creed from the front, and Private Halligan from the camp, lit the fires of patriotism with their appeals for the Red Cross budget. Posters were put on the block, and the auction of a jeweled purse fetched not more bursts of laughter than bids of money. Colonel Newcome would most surely have bid it in at a handsome figure, but only to present it in as handsome a manner, and with much gallant hesitation, to the most interested and spirited lady bidder, whom he had purposely defeated. Even without his inspiring presence and infectious good nature, a round sum of money was realized for the Red Cross, and hours of gayety for those who gave it—in all $2741.60, divided between the sale of tickets ($1000), contributions from the audience ($1418.35) and contributions from the orchestra and the managerial staff ($323.35).

Minor items of American news re... the impending trial of a new com... "David's Adventure," from the pe... A. E. Thomas; the making of a new ...cal play in which Joseph Santley is ...starred; and a round of the vau... theatres by the Sisters Herne—Miss ...tal and Miss Julie seldom seen toge... any stage.

Transcript May 28

NEWS OF MUSIC

Sir Henry Wood Finally Declines the Boston Orchestra—Mr. Campanini's Cantor—The Flourishing Busoni

WORD comes from London this morning that, in spite of general anticipation to the contrary, Sir Henry Wood has declined the proffered conductorship of the Boston Orchestra, preferring to continue his work in London. The more the pity. If, as presumption goes, Mr. Toscanini is also unwilling to take the post, the field narrows to Mr. Rakhmaninov, who, being penniless and jobless, would hardly refuse it, and to one or two Parisians of no such rank in conducting as the Italian, the Russian and the Englishman.

Fragments of operas, French, Italian, Russian and German, fill Mr. Jacchia's programme for the Pop Concert this evening among them the Overture to "Tannhäuser" unheard at Symphony Hall since October and the Polonaise from Chaikovsky's "Eugen Onègin," an infrequent guest anywhere. The full list is:

"Carmen"	Bizet
"William Tell"	Rossini
"Thais"	Massenet
"Aida"	Verdi
Night Music, "Faust"	Gounod
Air, "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saëns
"I Pagliacci"	Leoncavallo
"Tannhäuser"	Wagner
"La Bohème"	Puccini
"Eugen Onègin"	Chaikovsky
"Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni

MORE THAN $4000 IS RAISED AT CONCERT

Benefit for Red Cross Fund at Symphony Hall

Sergt Creed and Private Halligan Appeal for Money

The Pop concert Red Cross Night in Symphony Hall, last night, arranged by Maj Henry L. Higginson in conjunction with the Metropolitan Chapter, proved both popular and successful, more than $4000 being turned over to the Red Cross at the close of the performance.

Sergt Edward Creed, son of Judge Creed, and private Christopher Halligan of Dorchester, now at Camp Devens, appealed for contributions during the intermissions with telling results. Several complete sets of Red Cross posters and a jewel-studded gold purse were auctioned off by private Halligan and Charles Pierce of the Red Cross committee for sums aggregating more than $1500.

More than 40 girls of the Red Cross assisted in taking contributions. In addition to contributions by the audience of $1418.35, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and staff made gifts amounting to $323.25. The proceeds from the sale of seats turned over to the Red Cross totalled $1000.

At intervals, Mr Jacchia and the orchestra gave way to a large chorus of men recruited and directed by Stephen Townsend, which helped the big audience to get acquainted with some new war songs, some of them written by soldiers, and all bristling with the patriotic challenge, the humor and slang, the red-blooded virility of true war spirit.

Mr Townsend persisted in his invitations until he had a good number of the 3000 or more people leaving their cigars, drinks, ice cream or pretzels long enough to be with him in Lieut Gitz-Rice's "We Stopped Them at the Marne," "I Want to Go Home," and 'Keep Your Head Down, Fritzie Boy," the solo parts of which had been sung by John W. Peirce.

Frederick S. Converse conducted his chorus "Under the Stars and Stripes," which, with Charles Bennett as soloist, aroused great enthusiasm. "Pack Up Your Troubles in Your Old Kit Bag," with Ralph Brown singing the verses, was a favorite, but the whirlwind demonstration was reserved for the group for everybody in good earnest—"Keep the Home Fires Burning," "A Long, Long Trail," and the immortal "Over There," the singing of which beggars description.

Mr Jacchia, choosing an "Allied" program, had found Gomez' "Il Guarany" overture for Brazil, a Paderewski Minuet for Poland, Enesco's Rhapsody for Rumania, with more familiar music to represent France, Italy and England.

With Lieut Sousa, Mr Converse and Victor Herbert as his American associates, Henry Hadley contributed his "Angelus," a wholly grateful piece of tone painting, bringing warm acknowledgment from the audience which was received in person by the composer.

POPS AUDIENCE AIDS RED CROSS

Maj. Higginson Forwards $2741.60 as Proceeds of Concert

$1500 MORE REALIZED FROM AUCTION SALE

Last night was Red Cross night at the "Pops" and Symphony Hall was crowded as it seldom is, even at these popular music festivals, and war songs gave color to the program that was appreciated by the highly patriotic audience.

Three songs, the words and music of which were written by Lt. Gitz Rice of the 1st Canadian contingent, were sung by a male chorus conducted by Stephen Townsend, and the audience joined in them with hearty fervor. They were: "We Stopped Them at the Marne," "I Want to Go Home," and "Keep Your Head Down, Fritzie Boy," the two latter having been written at Ypres. The more familiar "Keep the Home Fires Burning," "A Long, Long Trail" and "Over There" were sung later, the program being punctuated with "God Save the King," the Garibaldi hymn, and "La Marseillaise," with "The Star Spangled Banner" reserved for the finale.

After the French national hymn Sergt. Edward B. Creed of the 101st and Priv. Halligan of the headquarters troop, 76th division, made stirring appeals for funds for the Red Cross, auctioning off articles which had been contributed for sale. These appeals have been made on other evenings recently at the "Pops" and their effect upon the audience has been almost magical. Young women, attired in Red Cross costume, passed the soldiers' headdresses about the floor and received the offerings, which often took on a character of generosity that might have been almost termed princely.

Maj. Higginson, after the concert, sent the proceeds of the evening's entertainment to Edwin S. Webster, chairman of the metropolitan Boston committee for the campaign, with the following letter:

"With the approval of your committee the Pop concert at Symphony Hall tonight, Monday, May 27, was given for the benefit of the second Red Cross war fund. I enclose cheque of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for $2741.60 which represents profit from sale of tickets, contributions by the audience, and by members of the orchestra and the staff at Symphony Hall. This cheque does not include moneys collected for the Red Cross at the Pop concerts on Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings of last week.

The proceeds from the sale of tickets netted $1000; contributions by the audience amounted to $1418.35; and contributions by members of the orchestra and staff were $323.25.

In addition more than $1500 was realized by auctioning a jewel-studded gold purse and Red Cross posters.

POP CONCERT ADDS $2741 TO RED CROSS FUND

Symphony Hall hung out the "S. R. O." sign when the doors opened last night for the special Pops concert, which netted $2741.60 for the Red Cross War Fund. Long before the opening hour the sidewalk before the entrances was packed with an eager crowd, which, attracted by the military program and the Red Cross posters, begged for tickets when no tickets were available.

Such an enthusiastic audience has not been seen at the Pops for many a day. The entire floor was given over to reserved tables, and when the first note of "God Save the King" sounded, the whole house rose in a body and sang with the orchestra.

A male chorus of 100 voices from the Boston Symphony Chorus and the Apollo Club, conducted by Stephen Townsend, sang three songs written by Lieut. Gitz Rice of the 1st Canadian Contingent, the audience joining in vigorously. They were: "We Stopped Them at the Marne," "I Want to go Home," and "Keep Your Head Down Fritzie Boy," the last two written at Ypres. Other well-known war songs put the audience into a patriotic mood, and the response to the appeals of the Red Cross girls was hearty.

Following "La Marseillaise," Sergt. "Eddie" Creed of the 101st Infantry and Priv. Halligan of the headquarters troop, 76th Division, made rousing appeals for aid for the Red Cross and held a brisk auction where they disposed of various contributed articles.

From the sale of tickets $1000 was taken in; contribution by the audience, $1418.35; contributions from the orchestra and staff, $323.25. In addition, over $1500 was realized from the auction of a jewel-studded gold purse and Red Cross posters.

SYMPHONY ENGAGES FRENCH VETERANS

Five Members of Famous Band, All War Heroes, to Play in Orchestra Here

One of the immediate and most pleasing results of the memorable visit of the French Military Band this week has been the engagement by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of five of its members, all of whom are regarded as very distinguished musicians.

As is generally known, all the members of this French Military Band are veterans. Just before they left France they were informed by the Minister of Fine Arts that the French government felt that they had done their bit in the war, and that if any of them was successful in securing an engagement in America, permission would be given to him to remain in the United States following the close of the tour of the French band, which is set for the end of August.

Some of the soloists of the band, which is of extraordinary calibre, created a profound impression by their playing. This is only to be expected, as no less than twenty-eight of them hold first prizes from the Paris Conservatoire.

Knowing the quality of these musicians, the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra felt the time favorable to do some recruiting, with the result that contracts have been signed by five of the bandsmen. These are Abdon Lauc, bassoon Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernand Thillois, violinist, and Georges Miquelle, violoncello.

Herald June 22

SYMPHONY SIGNS FRENCH PLAYERS

Five Members of Military Band Engaged by the Orchestra

SOLOISTS MADE GOOD IMPRESSION HERE

Five members of the great French Military Band, which has been playing an engagement in Boston and vicinity this week, have been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their contracts to start when the band ends its present tour in August. They are Abdon Laus, bassoon; Emil Stievenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernand Thillois, violin, and George Miquelle, violoncello.

Just before these men left France they were informed by the minister of fine arts that the French government felt that they had done their share in the fight against the Germans, and that the men could consider themselves free to accept engagements in America at the close of their tour. Some of the soloists created a deep impression here, which is no more than might be expected, as 28 of them hold first prizes from the Paris Conservatoire.

All Fine Players

M. Speyer roused great admiration for his tone and technique in a solo he played at Symphony Hall Tuesday night. He won his conservatoire prize in 1911 and has played with the Colonne and Opera Comique orchestras; the Champs Elysees Theatre and the Vichy and Deauville casines.

Stevenard is said to be the greatest master of the bass clarinet in Europe. He has written a school for the bass clarinet, is professor in Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum and has been a member of the Lamoureux and Opera Comique orchestras. He was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

M. Laus is a protege of the famous Pierre Monteux. Besides other famous organizations he has played in the Paris opera and the classical concerts at Pau. He is a first prize man.

M. Thillois received second prize at the Conservatoire in 1912. He was called away immediately for his two years military service. Then came the war, and he served with the fighters until this spring.

M. Miquelle is regarded as having unusual talent as a 'cellist. He is a first prize man, and was a soloist at the Concerts Wurmser in Paris.

SYMPHONY GETS FIVE FROM FRENCH BAND

Artists Will Return Here After American Tour

To Replace Alien Enemy Musicians, It Is Rumored

After serving their country valiantly through three years of war, five premier musicians of France are to become members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This announcement was made last night by the trustees of the orchestra, who, while Capt Pares' French band was here this week, took the opportunity to secure recruits for the orchestra.

All members of the band are war veterans. Just before they left France they were informed that the French Government felt they had done their duty in the war and that if any were successful in obtaining engagements in America, permission would be given for them to remain in the United States.

Some of the soloists of the band created a profound impression. No less than 28 of them hold first prizes from the Paris Conservatoire.

Symphony Orchestra contracts have been signed by the following bandsmen: Abdon Laus, bassoon; Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernand Thillois, violin, and Georges Miquelle, violoncello.

M Speyer took a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1911 and has played with the Colonne Orchestra and the Opera Comique Orchestra; the Theatre des Champs-Elysees and the Casions at Vichy and Deauville.

...ead Stievenard has the reputation of ...eing the greatest master of the bass ...larinet in France. He was a first-...lerze winner at the Paris Conservatoire, ...ffic been a member of the Lamoureux ...nd Opera Comique Orchestras and is a ...rofessor at Vincent dIndy's Schola ...abltorum. He has written a study for ...nd bass clarinet that is a standard ...ishc. M Stievenard was wounded at ...varbattle of Yser.

Laus is a first-prize man. He has ...JOed at the Theatre des Champs-...ees and Ballet Russe, in the Con-... Sechiari at Paris, in the Paris ...and the classical concerts at Pau. ...Chillois, the new violinist, received ...of th prize at the Paris Conservatoire ...he . He was called away immediately ...sta s military service of two years. ...came the war and he served con-...duously until this Spring. He has ...del in the Concerts Sechiari in Paris ... Nantes.

...neaquelle is regarded as a most un-...pir talented 'cellist. He was a first-...ha inner at the Paris Conservatoire; ...of it in the Concerts Wurmser in ...th d was a member of the Colonne ...the ra.

...he musicians will come to Boston ...he ne their new duties about Sept ...of oon as they complete their pres-...me with Capt Pares, it is under-...

...Le mored that a number of alien ...an members of the Symphony Or-...di ave been released and that it is ...of the trustees to replace them ...A pick of the world's musicians ...e from friendly or neutral coun-

Toscanini as a Symphonic Conductor

Italy's Record as a Patron of the Highest Form of Orchestral Music — Alberto Bimboni Takes Issue with a Musical America Editorial Writer

ALBERTO BIMBONI, the noted Italian conductor, composer, pianist and organist, has written the following letter to MUSICAL AMERICA:

I was indeed very sorry to read the editorial in your issue of June 1, headed "The Boston Conductorship," in which one of your editorial writers has expressed himself so unfavorably about Toscanini and what he calls the "non-existent" Italian culture for concert music.

Does he forget the memorable success of Toscanini in the Beethoven Ninth Symphony a few years ago at the Metropolitan? The audience and the majority of the critics agreed that the performance was one that was less conventional, less heavy and consequently more smooth than what we had heard here before. And there was due respect paid the classic lines of the work. The conductors of our New York orchestras have conducted this work many times, but they had the applause only of their countrymen. Instead Arturo Toscanini presented himself to the cosmopolitan public and he had a cosmopolitan triumph. If Toscanini accepts the conductorship of the Boston Symphony that orchestra will kill all the other orchestras and their conductors, because a genius will be at the head, with eclectic ideas and faith in the compositions, old and new, of all nationalities!

In regard to the lack of culture among Italians for concert programs I wish to place myself on record and state emphatically that this is not true and that the statement was made by a man who has not a knowledge of this subject. The writer of your editorial forgets the symphonic concerts established by Luigi Mancinelli in Bologna forty years ago, followed by those of his celebrated successor at that famous conservatory, Giuseppe Martucci. He forgets the Toscanini symphonic concerts at the Scala in Milan eighteen years ago, which concerts were later given in the north of Italy. Has not for twelve years the Augusteo in Rome been a typical symphonic institution where the public can hear and judge concerts conducted by conductors of every nationality? Smaller orchestras have existed in Venice and in Florence, where I myself conducted for two seasons. And chamber music societies are in existence in smaller towns like Siena, Ferrara, Perugia and Parma. Is this ignorance? As a result of this activity should the Italian judgment on such music be "almost non-existent?" You must agree with me that your writer was wrong.

Alberto Bimboni, Italian Musician, Who Champions the High Musical Ideals of His Country

Concerts Are Self-Supporting

The concerts in most countries indicate the wishes of the wealthy music-lovers who back the orchestras with their subscriptions. In Italy the Martucci and Toscanini concerts lived by themselves, without endowment, and were self-supporting. And in the public squares of Rome, Turin, Milan, Venice and Naples the Municipal Bands have for years played Beethoven, Wagner and Schubert. I remember a Wagner band concert given in Rome in the Piazza del Popolo by Alessandro Vesella. And there also 100,000 assembled to hear Beethoven's Fifth Symphony! ! !

The lower classes in Italy go always to the opera. Where do they go here in America? To the vaudeville. Philadelphia gets her opera from the New York Metropolitan, the Middle West from the Chicago company. The situation is little better for concerts, though there are, of course, more symphony orchestras in America than opera companies. Instead in Italy cities like Pisa, Livorno, Ferrara and Parma have their own opera season annually.

In Italy the public would not indorse concert performances such as here have met with approval. They would not tolerate the so-called "classical program" after the fashion of Dr. Muck. Italians do not want a conductor to appear as a doctor, they want to hear music, not lessons in counterpoint. Richard Strauss's music is better liked in Italy than Brahms's, because Brahms is seen by Italians to be only an academic imitator of Beethoven.

I wish that Toscanini might come to Boston. He would teach the other conductors to be broad-minded, he would open the programs to all nationalities and not impose "all Bach" or "all Beethoven," "all Wagner" or "all Strauss" programs on his audiences. This has been for years the way of German propaganda, with the excuse: "for the sake of art." Bach, Beethoven, Wagner, Strauss are, to be sure, great composers. But in all countries there are big composers not known in America yet. There seem to be people who take it upon themselves to condemn these composers, without ever having heard a measure of their music.

Yours very sincerely,
ALBERTO BIMBONI.

New York, June 12, 1918.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date 1918

MEMORIZING SCORES.

The latest objection advanced to the availability of Signor Toscanini for the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (and curiously it comes from a sympathetically appreciative and ardently pro-Ally source) has to do with the distinguished conductor's habit of leading always without a score before him—i. e., from memory. The objector fears he would ruin his mind in attempting to conduct over a hundred concerts from memory in a span of six months.

This objection is doubtless put forward impulsively on the spur of the moment, for a little reflection suffices to detect several fallacies in its fabric, aside from the minor fact that seven rather than six months is the compass of the Boston Symphony season. In the first place, though perhaps conducting one hundred concerts, he would conduct only twenty-four programmes, for the twenty-four pairs of concerts that annually make up the home season of the Boston band. The programmes played outside of Boston are invariably selected from works performed in the course of the Boston concerts.

In the second place, Signor Toscanini conducts without score by preference and has never complained of hardship in so doing—quite the contrary, in fact. Either this habit or a superior quickness of ear made him the most alert of the many conductors that had led the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House, as his correcting of errors in the instrumental parts that had eluded the watchfulness of Messrs. Seidl, Mottl, Hertz, and Mahler proves. Moreover, Signor Toscanini has conducted from memory a multitude of operas for upward of twenty-five years and for fifteen a host of symphony concerts without appearing to injure the integrity of his brain. Certainly his art has steadily waxed stronger. In view of these precedents it is safe to predict that his reason would withstand the strain of conducting the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But the fashion of conducting from memory is becoming so general that Signor Toscanini no longer seems a phenomenon in that respect. Various European conductors years ago adopted the custom, sporadically at least, in the most complicated modern scores, both operatic and symphonic. Mr. Stokowski in conducting here the other year that enormously complicated choral symphony (the eighth) of Gustav Mahler, dispensed altogether with the score. Mr. Gabrilowitsch conducted his three symphony concerts last spring and his three symphony concerts this spring without score. Mr. Volpe is planning to conduct his coming Stadium concerts without score. Various non-resident conductors, appearing here with local or foreign orchestras, have conducted one or more numbers without score. The custom is growing so rapidly, indeed, that it may become universal. Some decades ago pianists still played in public with their music open on the rack before them. Now they memorize their programmes as a matter of course. No cases of mental ruin have been attributed to the resulting strain. Conductors, judged by all examples to date, are in no greater danger than the pianists of addling their brains by overburdening their memories, least of all Signor Toscanini.

UNION

ress: Springfield, Mass.
JUN 9 1918

"BLUE DEVILS'" SONGS BREAK BOSTON'S SABBATH SILENCE

Bemedalled Poilus Stir Staid Audience in Symphony Hall – Agide Jacchia's Personality Saves "Pops" from Dreariness

By HENRY GIDEON

Boston, June 16, 1918.

WE are accustomed to hearing, and saying, that Boston is the musical center of the country. In the summer months it is most assuredly not! Without opera, symphony, band music, or even first-class theater music it must strike the thousands of visitors from the South and West as a city to which music is not a necessity. The case is very much like that of certain churches that seem to find reason enough for divine services during the busy winter months, but absolutely no use for them in July and August. "Peradventure he sleepeth, or is on a journey."

Until Independence Day, or thereabout, there is always one place of musical entertainment to go to in Boston, the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. ("Always" six days out of the week, the seventh is dull and dreary.) To look at the majority of the players you would hardly think it an entertainment at all. What it is to the audience one can only guess. Festive it surely is not, except for the appearance of little tables in the place ordinarily occupied by expensive seats during the winter. But the numbers are usually very large, sometimes even crowding the house to suffocation.

These concerts, modeled after the famous Bilse Concerts in Berlin, were started in the spring of 1885 by Gericke, who called them Promenade Concerts. His main purpose was to keep the members of the orchestra—all except the principals—engaged a number of weeks after the expiration of the regular season so that their contracts might call for a larger fee. The plan has been followed right up to the present season, when each of the seventy-five players is engaged for a season of forty weeks. Last year the older plan of using three or four conductors during the summer was abandoned in favor of the one-man season and the able and engaging young conductor, Agide Jacchia, was appointed. This year he is again the incumbent. It is evidence of the impression he makes upon orchestra and audience that a certain motion picture manager, a man of discrimination, scoured the country last September to find for the conductorship of an experimental series of symphony concerts about to be introduced into his New Haven theater "that young wonder who directed the Pops last summer." Jacchia was on the road with the Boston National Grand Opera Company at the time and therefore unable to negotiate with his admirer.

It must be con[illegible] without the [illegible] end of the song [illegible] gallant gentlemen had stirred up so much excitement that the crowd that gathered outside of Symphony Hall, as well as on the inside, hardly more than half saw them. The orchestra was putting the finishing touches on one of its best numbers when the joyous fanfare resounded through the hall and Alpine Chasseurs, in full accoutrement, marched the length of the aisle up to the first tables. They found their places with some little difficulty and the management "set 'em up."

Photo by Matzene

Agide Jacchia, Conductor of the Boston Symphony "Pops"

The "Marseillaise" sounded as it had never sounded before. The audience tried to sing along, in French, in English, in "da-dom-da-dee," but many a voice choked. There was many a hurrah for the song the poilus sang with such fine tone and such fine spirit.

Who cared that the effective [illegible] was marred by the barber sh[illegible] their exit, but no—the program sheet promised numbers by Offenbach, Bizet, Massenet and Planquette. So they stayed to hear their "Orphée aux Enfers," their beloved "Carmen," their "Werther" and their exciting "Sambre et Meuse."

The entire program was much like the rest of the Pop programs, in that it contained effervescent music such as the Strauss "Fledermaus" and a Waldteufel waltz, brilliant music like the Liszt "First Hungarian Rhapsody," and arrangements of bigger works such as a fantasia on Verdi's "Otello" and a suite from "Carmen." There were fewer encore numbers and for once Handel's "Largo," arranged for solo violin, harp, organ, then all violins, harp and organ —fortissimo, con molto entusiasmo— failed to appear. The next "special" program occurs on the night of Bunker Hill Day, when war veterans will find themselves very much at home with the contents of the program.

EVENING GLOBE
ess: New York City

'Cellist Like Toscanini.

Editor Globe:—With Sir Henry Wood and Toscanini eliminated it seems difficult to see what other man there is with sufficient calibre for the post of leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Recently, however, the name of J. Pablo Casals, the distinguished Spanish 'cellist, has been suggested. The superb power of the virtuoso in his case seems joined to a broad and constructive musical sense, as evidenced by the quality of his own chosen programmes as a soloist and also as conductor of a number of orchestras in European cities. Toscanini was a 'cellist in the orchestra before becoming a conductor, and it is not improbable that the genius of a Casals could also turn his art to a fuller expression before our music-loving public, by directing one of its great musical organizations.

ELY J. KAHN.

New York, June 15.

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR.

The whole United States is interested in the successor to the late conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, who is now "resting" in a detention camp as an enemy alien. The case is too recent to need recounting, but it is recalled that in the orchestra besides its enemy alien conductor are a number of other enemy aliens, and considerable opposition has been aroused in the native music world by their retention. In consequence the personality of the new conductor is a matter of national interest.

Sir Henry Wood was first named, but the cables announced that he has declined, and the rumor is current that this course was undertaken because the eminent English director felt that he would be placed in an embarrassing position if the personnel of the orchestra remained unchanged. Arturo Toscanini, an Italian, and formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company, is the latest name suggested, but there are many who believe that so eminent an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be directed by an American. Theodore Spiering is the most conspicuous American name mentioned, but he appears to be laboring under the insurmountable handicap of being a native, born, reared and inspired.

"The indications are strong that the world war is to create an entirely new and commendable spirit in American musical affairs," declares Miss Coralie Andrews, herself a noted American [illegible] who has been compelled to

Toscanini as a Symphonic Conductor

Italy's Record as a Patron of the Highest Form of Orchestral Music — Alberto Bimboni Takes Issue with a Musical America Editorial Writer

ALBERTO BIMBONI, the noted Italian conductor, composer, pianist and organist, has written the following letter to MUSICAL AMERICA:

I was indeed very sorry to read the editorial in your issue of June 1, headed "The Boston Conductorship," in which one of your editorial writers has expressed himself so unfavorably about Toscanini and what he calls the "non-existent" Italian culture for concert music.

Does he forget the memorable success of Toscanini in the Beethoven Ninth Symphony a few years ago at the Metropolitan? The audience and the majority of the critics agreed that the performance was one that was less conventional, less heavy and consequently more smooth than what we had heard here before. And there was due respect paid the classic lines of the work. The conductors of our New York orchestras have conducted this work many times, but they had the applause only of their countrymen. Instead Arturo Toscanini presented himself to the cosmopolitan public and he had a cosmopolitan triumph. If Toscanini accepts the conductorship of the Boston Symphony that orchestra will kill all the other orchestras and their conductors, because a genius will be at the head, with eclectic ideas and faith in the compositions, old and new, of all nationalities!

In regard to the lack of culture among Italians for concert programs I wish to place myself on record and state emphatically that this is not true and that the statement was made by a man who has not a knowledge of this subject. The writer of your editorial forgets the symphonic concerts established by Luigi Mancinelli in Bologna forty years ago, followed by those of his celebrated successor at that famous conservatory, Giuseppe Martucci. He forgets the Toscanini symphonic concerts at the Scala in Milan eighteen years ago, which concerts were later given in the north of Italy. Has not for twelve years the Augusteo in Rome been a typical symphonic institution where the public can hear and judge concerts conducted by conductors of every nationality? Smaller orchestras have existed in Venice and in Florence, where I myself conducted for two seasons. And chamber music societies are in existence in smaller towns like Siena, Ferrara, Perugia and Parma. Is this ignorance? As a result of this activity should the Italian judgment on such music be "almost non-existent?" You must agree with me that your writer was wrong.

Alberto Bimboni, Italian Musician, Who Champions the High Musical Ideals of His Country

Concerts Are Self-Supporting

The concerts in most countries indicate the wishes of the wealthy music-lovers who back the orchestras with their subscriptions. In Italy the Martucci and Toscanini concerts lived by themselves, without endowment, and were self-supporting. And in the public squares of Rome, Turin, Milan, Venice and Naples the Municipal Bands have for years played Beethoven, Wagner and Schubert. I remember a Wagner band concert given in Rome in the Piazza del Popolo by Alessandro Vesella. And there also 100,000 assembled to hear Beethoven's Fifth Symphony! ! !

The lower classes in Italy go always to the opera. Where do they go here in America? To the vaudeville. Philadelphia gets her opera from the New York Metropolitan, the Middle West from the Chicago company. The situation is little better for concerts, though there are, of course, more symphony orchestras in America than opera companies. Instead in Italy cities like Pisa, Livorno, Ferrara and Parma have their own opera season annually.

In Italy the public would not indorse concert performances such as here have met with approval. They would not tolerate the so-called "classical program" after the fashion of Dr. Muck. Italians do not want a conductor to appear as a doctor, they want to hear music, not lessons in counterpoint. Richard Strauss's music is better liked in Italy than Brahms's, because Brahms is seen by Italians to be only an academic imitator of Beethoven.

I wish that Toscanini might come to Boston. He would teach the other conductors to be broad-minded, he would open the programs to all nationalities and not impose "all Bach" or "all Beethoven," "all Wagner" or "all Strauss" programs on his audiences. This has been for years the way of German propaganda, with the excuse: "for the sake of art." Bach, Beethoven, Wagner, Strauss are, to be sure, great composers. But in all countries there are big composers not known in America yet. There seem to be people who take it upon themselves to condemn these composers, without ever having heard a measure of their music.

Yours very sincerely,
ALBERTO BIMBONI.

New York, June 12, 1918.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date.....

MEMORIZING SCORES.

The latest objection advanced to the availability of Signor Toscanini for the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (and curiously it comes from a sympathetically appreciative and ardently pro-Ally source) has to do with the distinguished conductor's habit of leading always without a score before him—i. e., from memory. The objector fears he would ruin his mind in attempting to conduct over a hundred concerts from memory in a span of six months.

This objection is doubtless put forward impulsively on the spur of the moment, for a little reflection suffices to detect several fallacies in its fabric, aside from the minor fact that seven rather than six months is the compass of the Boston Symphony season. In the first place, though perhaps conducting one hundred concerts, he would conduct only twenty-four programmes, for the twenty-four pairs of concerts that annually make up the home season of the Boston band. The programmes played outside of Boston are invariably selected from works performed in the course of the Boston concerts.

In the second place, Signor Toscanini conducts without score by preference and has never complained of hardship in so doing—quite the contrary, in fact. Either this habit or a superior quickness of ear made him the most alert of the many conductors that had led the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House, as his correcting of errors in the instrumental parts that had eluded the watchfulness of Messrs. Seidl, Mottl, Hertz, and Mahler proves. Moreover, Signor Toscanini has conducted from memory a multitude of operas for upward of twenty-five years and for fifteen a host of symphony concerts without appearing to injure the integrity of his brain. Certainly his art has steadily waxed stronger. In view of these precedents it is safe to predict that his reason would withstand the strain of conducting the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But the fashion of conducting from memory is becoming so general that Signor Toscanini no longer seems a phenomenon in that respect. Various European conductors years ago adopted the custom, sporadically at least, in the most complicated modern scores, both operatic and symphonic. Mr. Stokowski in conducting here the other year that enormously complicated choral symphony (the eighth) of Gustav Mahler, dispensed altogether with the score. Mr. Gabrilowitsch conducted his three symphony concerts last spring and his three symphony concerts this spring without score. Mr. Volpe is planning to conduct his coming Stadium concerts without score. Various non-resident conductors, appearing here with local or foreign orchestras, have conducted one or more numbers without score. The custom is growing so rapidly, indeed, that it may become universal. Some decades ago pianists still played in public with their music open on the rack before them. Now they memorize their programmes as a matter of course. No cases of mental ruin have been attributed to the resulting strain. Conductors, judged by all examples to date, are in no greater danger than the pianists of addling their brains by overburdening their memories, least of all Signor Toscanini.

"BLUE DEVILS'" SONGS BREAK BOSTON'S SABBATH SILENCE

Bemedalled Poilus Stir Staid Audience in Symphony Hall – Agide Jacchia's Personality Saves "Pops" from Dreariness

By HENRY GIDEON

Boston, June 16, 1918.

WE are accustomed to hearing, and saying, that Boston is the musical center of the country. In the summer months it is most assuredly not! Without opera, symphony, band music, or even first-class theater music it must strike the thousands of visitors from the South and West as a city to which music is not a necessity. The case is very much like that of certain churches that seem to find reason enough for divine services during the busy winter months, but absolutely no use for them in July and August. "Peradventure he sleepeth, or is on a journey."

Until Independence Day, or thereabout, there is always one place of musical entertainment to go to in Boston, the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. ("Always" six days out of the week, the seventh is dull and dreary.) To look at the majority of the players you would hardly think it an entertainment at all. What it is to the audience one can only guess. Festive it surely is not, except for the appearance of little tables in the place ordinarily occupied by expensive seats during the winter. But the numbers are usually very large, sometimes even crowding the house to suffocation.

These concerts, modeled after the famous Bilse Concerts in Berlin, were started in the spring of 1885 by Gericke, who called them Promenade Concerts. His main purpose was to keep the members of the orchestra—all except the principals—engaged a number of weeks after the expiration of the regular season so that their contracts might call for a larger fee. The plan has been followed right up to the present season, when each of the seventy-five players is engaged for a season of forty weeks. Last year the older plan of using three or four conductors during the summer was abandoned in favor of the one-man season and the able and engaging young conductor, Agide Jacchia, was appointed. This year he is again the incumbent. It is evidence of the impression he makes upon orchestra and audience that a certain motion picture manager, a man of discrimination, scoured the country last September to find for the conductorship of an experimental series of symphony concerts about to be introduced into his New Haven theater "that young wonder who directed the Pops last summer." Jacchia was on the road with the Boston National Grand Opera Company at the time and therefore unable to negotiate with his admirer.

It must be con[illegible] without the gallant gentlemen had stirred up so much excitement that the crowd that gathered outside of Symphony Hall, as well as on the inside, hardly more than half saw them. The orchestra was putting the finishing touches on one of its best numbers when the joyous fanfare resounded through the hall and Alpine Chasseurs, in full accoutrement, marched the length of the aisle up to the first tables. They found their places with some little difficulty and the management "set 'em up."

Photo by Matzene

Agide Jacchia, Conductor of the Boston Symphony "Pops"

The "Marseillaise" sounded as it had never sounded before. The audience tried to sing along, in French, in English, in "da-dom-da-dee," but many a voice choked. There was many a hurrah for the song the poilus sang with such fine tone and such fine spirit.

Who cared that the effective [illegible] was marred by the barber sh[illegible] end of the song [illegible] their exit, but no—the program sheet promised numbers by Offenbach, Bizet, Massenet and Planquette. So they stayed to hear their "Orphée aux Enfers," their beloved "Carmen," their "Werther" and their exciting "Sambre et Meuse."

The entire program was much like the rest of the Pop programs, in that it contained effervescent music such as the Strauss "Fledermaus" and a Waldteufel waltz, brilliant music like the Liszt "First Hungarian Rhapsody," and arrangements of bigger works such as a fantasia on Verdi's "Otello" and a suite from "Carmen." There were fewer encore numbers and for once Handel's "Largo," arranged for solo violin, harp, organ, then all violins, harp and organ —fortissimo, con molto entusiasmo— failed to appear. The next "special" program occurs on the night of Bunker Hill Day, when war veterans will find themselves very much at home with the contents of the program.

[illegible] EVENING GLOBE
[illegible]ess: New York City

'Cellist Like Toscanini.

Editor Globe:—With Sir Henry Wood and Toscanini eliminated it seems difficult to see what other man there is with sufficient calibre for the post of leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Recently, however, the name of J. Pablo Casals, the distinguished Spanish 'cellist, has been suggested. The superb power of the virtuoso in his case seems joined to a broad and constructive musical sense, as evidenced by the quality of his own chosen programmes as a soloist and also as conductor of a number of orchestras in European cities. Toscanini was a 'cellist in the orchestra before becoming a conductor, and it is not improbable that the genius of a Casals could also turn his art to a fuller expression before our music-loving public, by directing one of its great musical organizations.

ELY J. KAHN.

New York, June 15.

[illegible]ess:
[illegible] 1918

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR.

The whole United States is interest[illegible]d in the successor to the late con[illegible]ductor of the Boston Symphony Orches[illegible]tra, Dr. Karl Muck, who is now "rest[illegible]ing" in a detention camp as an enemy alien. The case is too recent to need recounting, but it is recalled that in the orchestra besides its enemy alien conductor are a number of other enemy aliens, and considerable opposition has been aroused in the native music world by their retention. In consequence the personality of the new conductor is a matter of national interest.

Sir Henry Wood was first named, but the cables announced that he has declined, and the rumor is current that this course was undertaken because the eminent English director felt that he would be placed in an embarrassing position if the personnel of the orchestra remained unchanged. Arturo Toscanini, an Italian, and formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company, is the latest name suggested, but there are many who believe that so eminent an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be directed by an American. Theodore Spiering is the most conspicuous American name mentioned, but he appears to be laboring under the insurmountable handicap of being a native, born, reared and inspired.

"The indications are strong that the world war is to create an entirely new and commendable spirit in American musical affairs," declares Miss Coralie Andrews, herself a noted American prima donna, who has been compelled to

American June 22

American June 24

Herald June 24 141

American 6/22

Symphony Drops Huns

SUCCESSOR OF MUCK OUSTED

Eighteen Dismissed From Orchestra; to Employ Only Allied Musicians

Eighteen Germans have been dropped from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ernest Schmidt, who succeeded Dr. Muck as leader, is among them.

Citizens of the United States and subjects of Allied nations only will be employed henceforth, according to information given the AMERICAN today at Symphony Hall box office.

Some of the vacancies caused by dropping the Germans have already been filled with members of the French military band lately in Boston.

When Dr. Muck started for Fort Oglethorpe he was succeeded by Schmidt, previously assistant conductor and violinist. Schmidt's contract has been cancelled. It is understood that the other 17 Germans dropped also played stringed instruments.

The new French players nearly all hold prizes from the Paris Conservatoire. They were told before they left France that they might consider themselves open for any engagements they might see fit to contract here.

Two of them have been in the French Army as fighters, and one of them, Emil Stevenard, was wounded in the battle of the Yser.

The new players are: Abdon Laus, bassoon; Emil Stevenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernaud Thillois, violin, and George Miquelle, 'cello.

Monitor June 22

Music Notes

BOSTON, Mass.—The Pop concerts given in Symphony Hall by an orchestra of Boston Symphony men, under the direction of Agide Jacchia, continue two weeks longer. On the evening of Monday, June 24, an Italian program will be given, with solos by Mr. Gerardi, violinist; Mr. Cella, harpist; Mr. Vannini, clarinetist; Mr. Nappi, trumpeter; and Mr. Belgiorno, trombone player. On the evening of Wednesday, June 26, the annual program, comprising numbers selected by request of the patrons of the concerts, will be given. On the evening of Wednesday, July 3, a Russian program will be played, with music by Tschaikowsky predominating. On the night of Thursday, July 4, a patriotic program will be given, with a chorus of men, directed by Stephen Townsend, assisting. At this concert there will be community singing by chorus and audience.

The program for tonight is as follows:

March, "Second Connecticut," Reeves; overture, "Semiramide," Rossini; valse, "The Fairy Lake," Tschaikowsky; fantasia, "Madam Butterfly," Puccini; suite from "Carmen," Bizet; largo, Handel; "To a Wild Rose" and "To a Water Lily," MacDowell; "Finlandia," Sibelius; "The Star-Spangled Banner"; selection, "The Century Girl," Herbert; Polish dance, Scharwenka; waltz, "España," Waldteufel; American military fantasy.

Transcript June 22

Last Week but One of the Pops

Only two weeks remain in the season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall. Despite war-time conditions which meant the loss of large patronage from Harvard and Tech, the season has been one of the most successful in the history of the Pop Concerts. This is a great tribute, primarily, to Conductor Agide Jacchia, whose programmes and skilful conducting have won for him a large and admiring public here.

Two nights of unusual interest are scheduled for the coming week. Monday evening, June 24, will be the second and last "Italian Night" of the season. The Dante Alighieri Society of Boston will attend in a body. Conductor Jacchia has cleverly built a programme so that the titles form the acrostic "Italian Night." There will be several incidental solos, all by Italian members of the orchestra, Mr. Gerardi, violinist; Mr. Cella, harpist, Mr. Vannini, clarinetist; Mr. Nappi, trumpet, and Mr. Belgiorno, trombone. Mr. Gerardi was a pupil of the late Placido Fiumara, who was a member of the orchestra for many years and then of Charles Martin Loeffler.

The annual "Request" programme will be played next Wednesday evening, June 26. Mr. Jacchia has received in the last six weeks since the night was announced, nearly one thousand requests, and he has built his programme as closely as possible according to the requests that have been made.

For the last week of the concerts there will be two special nights of particular interest. On Wednesday night, July 3, a second Russian programme will be given. The Fourth of July will bring a grand patriotic programme. Stephen Townsend will again have his remarkable male chorus which created such an impression at the Red Cross Night, and there will be another chance for the much-discussed "community singing," because the audience will be asked to join in the various songs. The programme for tonight is as follows:

March, "Second Connecticut" ..... Reeves
Overture, "Semiramide" ..... Rossini
Valse, "The Fairy Lake" ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
(a) March of the Smugglers
(b) Toreadors' Song
(c) Bohemian Dance
Largo ..... Handel
(Violin, Harp, Organ and Strings)
To a Wild Rose—To a Water Lily .... MacDowell
Finlandia ..... Sibelius
THE STAR-SPANGLED BANNER
Selection, "The Century Girl" ..... Herbert
Polish Dance ..... Scharwenka
Waltz, "España" ..... Waldteufel
American Military Fantasy

The programme for Monday night:

DANTE ALIGHIERI SOCIETY NIGHT
Inno, "Soldati d' Italia" ..... Martino
The Italian in Algiers, "Overture" ..... Rossini
Aida, "Introduzione e Romanza" ..... Verdi
(Trombone solo, Signor Belgiorno)
La Boheme, "Fantasia" ..... Puccini
Il Trillo Del Diavolo ..... Tartini
(Violin solo, Signor Gerardi)
Ave Maria, "Otello" ..... Verdi
(Clarinet solo, Signor Vannini)
Neapolitan Song, "O Sole Mio" ..... Capua (Trumpet solo, Signor Nappi)
MARCIA REALE
Norma, "Overture" ..... Bellini
Italia, "Rapsodia" ..... Casella
Gavotta ..... Jacchia
Harp Solo, "Pensiero Poetico" ..... Lebano
(Signor Cella)
The Jewels of the Madonna, "Intermezzo, Act III" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
THE STAR-SPANGLED BANNER

Ysaye as Conductor

With the honor which came to Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian violinist, in the success of the Cincinnati May Festival which he conducted, came another far more deeply felt, the decoration of his son, Anton, by the Belgian government for bravery on the field of battle. The sorrows of Ysaye in the present war have been as deep and painful as his life has been remarkable. Not only has his home in Brussels been taken by the Germans, but his charming villa in Godine near Namur, where he was accustomed to spend his summers, and where violinists from all over the world visited him to receive instruction, has been completely devastated. The earnings of his life's career invested in Belgian securities and banks have also been preëmpted by the Germans. Two sons who answered [illegible] in foreign lands. "American singers are in greater demand in their own country than ever before, and those who are genuinely interested in creating an American musical supremacy have been highly gratified at the success of their efforts. In the selection of a successor to Dr. Muck the entire musical world is interested, not only the native music lovers, but those of the allied and neutral nations as well, and it would appear that native patriotism, as well as native pride, would suggest the wisdom and justice of appointing a native conductor to this high post. Maj. Higginson, by whose bounty the great success of the orchestra has been made possible during many years, has the absolute power to appoint this successor, and the patrons of his orchestra in every city of consequence in the United States are hoping with all their hearts that he will see the immeasurable benefits to be derived from such an appointment and meet the occasion in a [illegible] American spirit."

The musical journals have failed to agree upon a compromise appointee, and each week sees the list increased. Besides Toscanini, now that Sir Henry Wood is not to be considered, the names of Chevilliard, of Paris, Mengelberg, of Amsterdam, Rachminoff, of Russia, and Montex, of France, are under consideration, but one seeks in vain for an [illegible] man of American sym-

Post June 24

THRIFT POPS A BIG HIT

Concert Boosts Sale of War Savings Stamps

Boston's War Savings "Pop of Pops," at Symphony Hall last evening, started this city's final effort to put the Hub over the top in War Savings Stamp sales in the State-wide June drive to obtain 1,000,000 War Savings pledges.

The audience, which packed the hall to capacity, represented sales of several thousand dollars worth of War Savings and Thrift Stamps, for every one attending the concert received, in addition to an evening of rare entertainment, the value of the admission ticket in War Savings or Thrift Stamps.

HOUSE SOLD OUT

Tickets for the concert were all sold long before the start and every War Savings and Thrift Stamp in the house was taken up. Robert Weeks and William Chamberlain, members of the third Liberty Loan and Red Cross committees, had charge of the affair and during the entertainment were forced to send to the postoffice to get a new lot of stamps, so great was the demand.

Society girls and matrons scattered through the audience during intermission and gathered in thousands of pledge cards. Mr. Weeks made several sales for batches of $100 worth of stamps following a brief War Savings address by Charles F. Weed, chairman of the War Stamps drive in Massachusetts.

Stamp Pops a Hit

The idea of introducing War Savings Stamps by way of a Symphony Pop concert was a distinct hit. Long before 8 o'clock a throng of several hundred people was gathered about the box office, buying seats and receiving in return the value of tickets in War Savings and Thrift Stamps.

The following War Savings Stamp meetings are announced for today:

Lynn—Odd Fellows' Hall, 8 p. m. Speakers—Mrs. George T. Rice, Sailor Ryan.
Needham—Masonic Hall, 8 p. m. Speaker—W. W. Dearborn.
Reading—Security Hall, 8 p. m. Speakers—Mr. Guy Ham, Sergeant Nelson Byrne.
Theatres—Beacon, A. J. Farnsworth, 7:55; Bijou, Mr. A. Thaler, 8:45; Boston, O. S. Marshall, 8:45; Fenway, O. S. Marshal 7:40; Park, A. J. Farnsworth, 8:30; Shubert, A. R. Mack ("Shellproof Mack"), 3:1 and 9:15; Tremont Temple, James W. Spring 8:05. Pop Concert, J. W. Spring, 9.

Post June 24

THE SYMPHONY CLEAN-UP

The vast majority of Bostonians, whether patrons or not, or whether music-lovers or not, will approve the action of the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra in clearing that body of enemy aliens. The orchestra is an institution, highly representative of our city, and for that reason all of us are interested in whatever affects its influence, its standing or its reputation.

Enough had already happened in connection with the Symphony's affairs to make it very evident that the continued presence in its ranks of German citizens was a fester that would continue to give trouble as long as it lasted, and perhaps threaten even the life of the organization itself. That this infection has been cut out is the best thing that could happen.

Henceforth the Boston Symphony Orchestra, solidly American, plus allied players of France and other nations, and with its few gaps filled with great

'POP' GIVES NEW IMPETUS TO STAMP DRIVE

Never was a more cosmopolitan audience seen at the Pops than that which attended the "Pop of Pops" last night in Symphony Hall.

It was not the regulation crowd that attends the Pops. It was made up of residents of every part of Boston and its suburbs, many of whom had never attended a Pop concert before. They came to show their interest in the war savings stamp campaign and to do their share in boosting the sale of stamps in Boston.

The result was an unqualified success and a new impetus was given to the war savings stamp campaign in direct receipts at the box office of cash for tickets that represented 6,492 stamps and with cash sales of stamps for a large amount in addition.

MAY REALIZE $12,500.

The number of pledges was not computed last night, but it is fully expected that the proceeds of the concert, if all the cards distributed are filled out and exchanged for war savings stamps, wil be $12,500.

Lieut.-Gov. Calvin A. Coolidge and Rear Admiral Spencer S. Wood were among the prominent guests present. The only speaker of the evening was Charles F. Weed, who was introduced briefly by Robert S. Weeks, of the War Savings Stamp Committee.

After expressing appreciation of the donation of the hall by Major Higginson, and of the services of the players, Mr. Weed dwelt directly upon the war situation and its financial background.

"I want you all to realize the real gravity of this war situation," he said. "The Allies are outnumbered on the Western front by 40 divisions. Each division has 20,000 men. General Foch, against these odds, will nevertheless hold the line, but we must give him every aid and encouragement.

"It is up to us to decide whether we will try to win the war on the instalment plan or whether we will go about the winning of the war as our main business from this time forth. To do that we must reverse those odds that now confront the Allied armies; that means that we must send 1,600,000 American troops to France, to give us the advantage the Germans possess now.

ALL MUST HELP.

"To send troops the government must have money, and we must provide it. The total expense of this government in its 140 years of existence since the time of Alexander Hamilton, including its three great wars and the building of the Panama Canal, was about $24,000,000,000.

"In the next year the government wants to spend $24,000,000,000—as much as we have spent in the whole 140 years. That means that everyone must do his part in financing the war, and the War Savings Stamps offer the means of doing it."

So many stamps were sold at the hall that a postoffice official had to be called in from his home to dig up more stamps. Conductor Jacchia bought $100 worth of the stamps, and a large number of musicians made large purchases. Robert S. Weeks addressed the musicians while they were outside the main hall, during the intermission, and expressed warm appreciation of their splendid services to the campaign.

NATIONAL AIRS PLAYED.

An unidentified person in the audience bought $82 worth of stamps—that will mean $100 in 1923.

The program included the national airs of England, Italy, France and the United States. While they were played, a tall bluejacket waved the flags of those nations. Other selections included the suite from Peer Gynt, the intermezzo from Cavalleria Rusticana, Boccherino's "Minuetto," and a number of pieces highly popular with admirers of the Symphony Orchestra. "Keep the Home Fires Burning," played as an encore, was enthusiastically applauded.

"POP OF POPS" TAXES HALL

War Savings Stamps Concert Quickly Exceeds Its Allotment

HURRIED CALL SENT TO THE POSTOFFICE

The "Pop of Pops," the war savings stamps concert given by the Symphony Orchestra as a regular "Pops" feature last evening, was a rousing patriotic event. Every seat was taken before Saturday night. Ten minutes before the concert began the selling of admission stopped altogether and hosts of people were turned away.

The box office disposed of 6470 stamps before the performance began—all that had been provided for sale at the hall, before the 20 young women under the direction of Miss Marion Sprague had a chance to conduct a drive through the audience. Supt. Cullis of the Back Bay postal station was called on and made a hurried trip to his office, opened the vault and issued $3000 worth additional stamps, into which the appreciative audience made great inroads.

Orchestra in Good Form

The Symphony Orchestra never was in better form or spirit, and never played to an audience in more appreciative mood. Conductor Agide Jacchia and his musicians were the subjects of warm encomiums from the audience and the committee in charge of the drive, and the applause that greeted them after every number elicited numerous encores, Tschaikowsky's "Marche Miniature" being the encore after the same composer's "Valse des Fleurs" and "Over There" that for "Cavalleria Rusticana."

The four national airs that were interspersed with the rest of the program were greeted with significant bursts of enthusiasm, and 2d Class Boatswain's Mate Martin Kociss of the navy waved the British, French, Italian and American flags from the stage during the rendering of the airs of the respective nations. Robert S. Weeks and William E. Chamberlain of the war savings stamps committee were in charge of the arrangements.

At the close of the first part, Mr. Weeks introduced Charles F. Weed of the state committee on war savings, who thanked the members of the orchestra for their kindness in giving their services, thanked Maj. Higginson for the gift of the hall, the management and attendants for giving their services, and the audience, in behalf of the committee, for being there.

"This is as much your work as ours, and it is not yours or ours any more than that of every man, woman and child in America."

The closeness of the German lines to Paris, and the still closer proximity to the channel ports, gave gravity to Mr. Weed's remarks, as he told his hearers that it would require a vast army of men to turn the odds in favor of the allies.

"Will the country go on?" he asked, "fighting the war on the instalment plan or will it subordinate everything else and strike one blow that will end it all?"

To Spend $24,000,000,000

He said that the entire cost of running the American government, including all its wars and building the Panama canal, had been $24,000,000,000, while in the next year Congress intends to expend $24,300,000,000 on this war. The American people, he said, had always consumed the entire product of their industries. The government was now a customer for these products to the extent of the sum mentioned, and everybody who purchased or demanded anything that he could dispense with was appropriating labor and material for which the government had sore need. It was the object of the thrift stamps to induce people to curtail their demands, and not primarily to lend money to the government; the lending was essential, but secondary.

Large signs were displayed from every balcony, showing the price of the war savings stamps this month—$4.17.

At the second intermission a "silent talk" was displayed on the stage, telling the people that if they would buy stamps and complete the thrift cards they had received with their tickets, and would turn them into War Saving stamps, the result would be a loan to the government of $12,510.

During this intermission Conductor Jachia came on the stage, bowed and announced that he wished to make the largest purchase of stamps so far taken, and asked for $50 worth. Someone in the audience spoke out, saying that a man had purchased $82 worth. Mr. Jachia replied:

"Well, then, I will take $100 worth."

Speakers at rallies to be held today in the interest of the campaign include: Mrs. George T. Rice and Sailor Ryan at Lynn Odd Fellows' Hall, 8 P. M.; W. W. Dearborn in Masonic Hall, Needham, 8 P. M.; Guy Ham and Sergt. Nelson Bryne, in Security Hall, Reading, 8 P. M.; A. J. Farnsworth at Beacon Theatre, 7:55 P. M.; A. Thaler at Bijou, 8:45 P. M.; O. S. Marshall, Boston Theatre, 8:45 P. M.; O. S. Marshall at Fenway Theatre, 7:40 P. M.; A. J. Farnsworth at Park Theatre, 8:30 P. M.; J. W. Spring at Pop concert, 9 P. M.; A. R. Mack at Shubert, 3:15 and 9:15 P. M.; James W. Spring at Tremont Theatre, 8:05 P. M.

Advertiser 142 June 24

Herald June 25 - 1918

Traveler June 25 —

POPS OPEN JUNE'S GREAT WAR DRIVE

Players of the Symphony, Volunteers All, Sell 6,492 Thrift Stamps

STIRRING ADDRESS BY CHAIRMAN WEED

Allies Still Outnumbered, He Says; Country Needs Thrift Stamp Money

The noise you heard last night was the pop in the Pop of Pops, exploding at Symphony Hall in a great patriotic signal that now opens the big week of Boston's June drive in War Savings Stamps.

Sixty-four hundred and ninety-two stamps were passed over the Symphony Hall counter to patrons of the most remarkable Pop concert in history. Every time a twenty-five cent piece went into the coffers it came back to the party of the first part in the form of a T. S.

The attendance was the largest in Pop Concert history. Hundreds were unable to find seats. Every seat in the house was sold at noon on Saturday. Hundreds were content to take standing room. The receipts amounted to more than $1500. Symphony Hall statisticians figure that if every stamp grows into a June booklet, the Pop of Pops will have been instrumental in selling securities valued at $12,000.

AUDIENCE HAD BEST OF IT.

And the audience had all the best of it because, having made a wise and patriotic investment, which will come back to them with interest, they heard one of the best concerts of the year.

A feature of the night was the appearance of a six-footer in naval uniform who displayed the British flag when "God Save the King" was played, at the opening of the concert, came back with the tricolor for "La Marseillaise," displayed the flag of Sunny Italy for the "Marcia Reale," and aroused greatest enthusiasm when he returned, at the end, to wave the Stars and Stripes for the "Star Spangled Banner."

The punchiest address of the night came from Chairman Charles F. Weed of the June Drive.

"It is of tremendous importance to the nation in this hour," Mr. Weed said, "that each and every one of us should realize the gravity of the present situation. Not all of us do.

ALLIES OUTNUMBERED.

"I wonder if the men and women of Boston understand tonight, as life moves along here with almost its wonted calm, that on the Western front the Allies are outnumbered to the extent of 40 German divisions, of 20,000 men each. This is the fact.

"We are confident that General Foch is going to hold that line, but it is up to the United States to make good the deficiency in troops, and to more than make it up, to the end that the odds will be on our side.

"This means that we must have 1,600,000 men in France as quickly as we can get them there.

"We know that we are going to win this war—but how shall we win it? Are we going to do it on the instalment plan, or shall we sail in, American fashion, and make a job of it?

"The call is for money. The call is addressed to you and you and you and you, to me and to everybody. Uncle Sam asks us to lend him all the money we possibly can spare. He could demand it of us, but he asks us for it, instead, and promises to pay it back to us with interest.

TO RAISE 24 BILLION.

"The outlook is that in the next year the United States will be called upon to raise $24,000,000,000, or in one year more money than the total amount the Government has raised since the day of Alexander Hamilton.

"These are facts to make people stop and think. They ought to lead each one of us to go into Savings Stamps as deeply and as generously and as completely as he went into Liberty Bonds, Red Cross and the other big things of the war."

The effect of Mr. Weed's words was visible almost immediately as young women canvassers moved from table to table about the hall and sold more and more Thrift Stamps until the supply was exhausted and a hurry call went out for somebody with the magic key to open the nearest postoffice.

Director Jacchia of the orchestra, who had already given his services to the Cause, bought $100 worth of stamps. The men of the orchestra, also volunteers for the night (some of them at the cost of their regular Sunday evening employment elsewhere), also bought stamps. Major Higginson had donated the use of the hall. Even the attaches served for no other compensation than the knowledge of duty well done.

HAPPIEST PATRIOT.

The happiest patriot present was described as "of Commonwealth avenue." He had evidently had a dinner of the ante-bellum variety. He was filled with patriotic remarks, but he backed them up by investing $90 in Thrift Stamps.

Robert S. Weeks acted as manager of the concert, which was a success from start to finish and a great credit to the worker who conceived the idea.

Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday—you have four days in which to get in line.

MRS. ANITA MUCK

(Photograph by Joe Dixon, Herald Staff Photographer.)

MRS. KARL MUCK IS REGISTERED

Curious Throng Drawn to Back Bay Police Station During Her Visit

NATIVE OF AUSTRIA AND ENEMY ALIEN

Mrs. Anita Muck, wife of Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday spent slightly more than an hour in the Back Bay police station going through the formality of registering as an enemy alien. She admitted being of Austrian birth, but claimed Swiss citizenship. This claim she based on the contention of her husband that he had automatically become a Swiss citizen when, more than 40 years ago, his father became a citizen of that nation. Just at present Mrs. Muck isn't exactly certain as to her citizenship status. She is, however, a duly registered alien.

Mrs. Muck arrived at the station shortly after 4:30 in a large touring car accompanied by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra. At the time there was a goodly number of persons in the street, attracted, no doubt, by the gathering of newspaper photographers.

Manager Ellis Assists

Accompanied by Manager Ellis she went into the station and, immediately after Sergt. Louis Lutz had completed the registration of another woman, she went through the ordeal. Manager Ellis proved of considerable assistance to her and did most of the writing on the somewhat lengthy blank which enemy aliens are called on to fill out.

In fact, the limit of Mrs. Muck's effort with the pen was to write her name in the spaces of the blank which call for it, and then to affix her signature to the small photograph which must accompany each blank. The work of registering went off rather smoothly until the space was reached wherein one is called on to assert his or her citizenship. Then

(Continued on Page Twelve, Column 4.)

Continuation

MRS. KARL MUCK IS REGISTERED

(Continued from Page One.)

It was that some uncertainty came up. Finally the matter was adjusted satisfactorily to herself, Mr. Ellis and Sergt. Lutz.

Following the filling out of the blanks and signing of names, Mrs. Muck was taken into the signal room, where her finger prints were taken. This completed the formality. Mrs. Muck removed the ink from her fingers with benzine, an old cloth, soap and water. She was entirely unconcerned during the process and from time to time smiled and chatted with Sergt. Lutz or Mr. Ellis. In the guard room she displayed some interest in the machine on which wagon and signal calls are registered.

On her return to the office of the station Mrs. Muck observed that there was a gathering of curious folk on the outside. Adjusting a dainty silvered lorgnette, she glanced through it and out of an open window toward the crowd.

"My," she said, "you would think a big robbery had just been committed. See the crowd; and the women, too. Isn't it wonderful?"

Home Is in Graz, Austria

Afterward she inquired of one of the officers if he were in the station on the night Dr. Muck was arrested. It was in that station that the noted musician spent his first night in confinement. She seemed pleased with the treatment Sergt. Lutz and Capt. Thomas F. Goode had accorded her.

Flanked by Mr. Ellis and an officer, she swept out of the station, across the sidewalk and into an automobile. All the while she smiled and gazed around, apparently not the least bit troubled by the additional notoriety which has come upon her. The auomobile finally sped off, but some time during the period beginning July 7 and ending July 12 she must again visit the police station and obtain the card which all enemy aliens are given.

Mrs. Muck is about 46 years of age, and before her marriage was Fraulein Anita Portugall of Graz, the capital of Styria, Austria. Her father was at one time mayor of Graz, but has since died. Her mother is yet alive and the family home is in Styria. Mrs. Muck and the doctor visited at the home on the occasion of their trips abroad.

In March, 1914, Dr. Muck purchased the four-story brick house at 50 Fenway and since that time they have made their home there. Mrs. Muck speaks English with just the slightest trace of a foreign accent. She is an attractive appearing woman and prior to the war enjoyed many acquaintances in the highest social circles.

Since the internment of her husband at Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, Mrs. Muck has retained these many friends and from some of them has received expressions of sympathy at the sudden turn in the family affairs. During the period her husband was confined at the East Cambridge jail Mrs. Muck was a daily visitor to him.

Dozen Other Registrants

She brought him delicacies and saw to it that he had plenty of tobacco to smoke in the pipe to which he was forced to accustom himself. It is not known whether she has visited him since his confinement at Fort Oglethorpe. On the occasion of her first visit to the United States and Boston Mrs. Muck took a course at Radcliffe. She told friends later that she continued her studies on her return to Germany.

Mrs. Muck was one of 13 enemy alien women who were at the Back Bay police station yesterday to register as such. Some were wives of musicians. Others were the wives of waiters and still others were cooks or household employes who have seen several years of service in Back Bay families. Registration continues until Thursday night.

FOUND DEAD IN RED

Police Register Mrs. Karl Muck

Mrs. Karl Muck, wife of the former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, alighting from her limousine at the Back Bay police station, where she registered as an enemy alien.

Mrs. Karl Muck, wife of the former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, interned some weeks ago, is now a registered enemy alien. When registering at the Back Bay police station, she claimed Swiss citizenship, but admitted being of Austrian birth.

Accompanied by Manager Ellis of the Symphony, she went into the station, and, immediately after Sergt. Louis Lutz had completed the registration of another woman, she went through the ordeal. Manager Ellis proved of considerable assistance to her and did most of the writing on the somewhat lengthy blank which enemy aliens are called on to fill out.

In fact, the limit of Mrs. Muck's effort with the pen was to write her name in the spaces of the blank which call for it, and then to affix her signature to the small photograph which must accompany each blank. The work of registering went off rather smoothly until the space was reached wherein one is called on to assert his or her citizenship. Then it was that some uncertainty came up. Finally the matter was adjusted satisfactorily to herself, Mr. Ellis and Sergt. Lutz.

Following the filling out of the blanks and signing of names, Mrs. Muck was taken into the signal room, where her finger prints were taken. This completed the formality. Mrs. Muck removed the ink from her fingers with benzine, an old cloth, soap and water. She was entirely unconcerned during the process and from time to time smiled and chatted with Sergt. Lutz or Mr. Ellis. In the guard room she displayed some interest in the machine on which wagon and signal calls are registered.

Liberty 5622

TIGHT BINDING

American June 25

MRS. MUCK REGISTERS AS ALIEN ENEMY

Mrs. Karl Muck, wife of the former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, leaving the Back Bay police station after having registered as an alien enemy, in company with a plain clothesman (at left) and Manager Charles A. Ellis of the Symphony Orchestra (at right).

Mrs. Karl Muck, the wife of Dr. Karl Muck who, once the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now interned for the duration of the war at Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, registered at the Back Bay station under the Alien Enemy Law.

Accompanied by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, Mrs. Muck drove up to the station with a smile that did not falter when half a dozen cameras were focused upon her. But the smile may have been one of nervousness rather than of enjoyment, for she twisted the chain that hung about her neck, and let her gaze wander from one to the other of the crowd that had gathered.

Dressed in black taffeta, with a black hat trimmed with white roses, Mrs. Muck went through the formula of registration.

"A disagreeable duty, it is," she said to the reporters, "but one that has to be done."

Mon July

The Pop Concerts, given by an orchestra of Boston Symphony men under the conductorship of Agide Jacchia, come to a close tonight in Symphony Hall. The management announces that Mr. Jacchia has been engaged to direct the Pop Concerts next season. In the past nine weeks, 54 concerts have been given and 341 different pieces have been presented. On the programs there have been 40 overtures, 23 fantasias, 21 selections (generally meaning excerpts from operas), 30 waltzes, 30 marches, 15 intermezzos and preludes, parts of 14 suites, seven rhapsodies and 161 miscellaneous works. Among the special occasions were the Red Cross night, on May 27, and the war savings stamp concert of Sunday, June 23. Speakers have appeared on behalf of patriotic causes at certain of the concerts. The program of the concert tonight is as follows:

"God Save the King"; grand march from "Aïda," Verdi; overture, "Mignon," Thomas; "American Patrol," Meacham; fantasia, "Carmen," Bizet; "La Marseillaise"; rhapsody, "Italia," Casella; "Song of the Volga Boatmen," orchestrated by Jacchia; serenade, Pierné; overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky; "Marcia Reale"; "The Dance of the Hours," Ponchielli; "Love's Dream After the Ball," Czibulka; sextet from "Lucia," Donizetti; "Good Bye," Tosti; "The Star Spangled Banner"; "Auld Lang Syne."

Post June 30 — 143

Symphony Proves Patriotism Discharges Germans; Hires French

The expulsion of of all German artists from the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the engagement of a number of players, principally of wind instruments, from the French Military Band which recently performed so brilliantly in this city, is a move which will be welcomed on all sides. The news comes that Alwin Schroeder, for many years a member of the Symphony, then resigned, has now returned again to its ranks. There will be other changes. Emil Ferir, first violin for many years of the Boston Symphony, has resigned his position to occupy the same post in the Philadelphia orchestra.

There are many vacancies to be filled. Georges Longy, now in Europe, is expected to bring back some players with him. There are orchestral players by no means inferior to players now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of American birth and experience, who could well be called on to contribute to filling the gaps in the ranks.

We do not believe in chauvinism, in provincial favoritism, in anything less than the highest orchestral standards, but there are certainly many instrumentalists born and trained in this country who should now be given employment and encouragement in this city as well as European players—even those of our allies. Dr. Muck, when he came back to Boston for his second term, discharged for reason of his own many excellent musicians in the orchestra. He replaced them in more than one instance with players, mostly of German birth, who were inferior artists to the men who departed, with, apparently, no better reason than the caprice of the conductor. It is high time that Americans who are able to do so, and meet the severest practical tests of their ability, should take part in the restoration of the Boston Symphony to its unequalled excellence under Gericke. Now is the moment for a wise and discriminating encouragement of national talent in the greatest of our national orchestras.

LAST WEEK OF THE POPS

The 33d season of the Pop concerts will come to an end next Saturday evening, July 6. In many respects it has been the most sucessful season these concerts have ever enjoyed. The patronage has been, generally speaking, very large and some nights have been record-breakers. Notable among these were the "Red Cross Night"; the night when the Blue Devils were present; the night when the French Military Band was a guest; the special concert given a week ago to open the Trift Stamp campaign, and "Request Night" last Wednesday.

The last week will be a busy one with many special features. Monday night a considerable part of the tables will be taken by osteopathists who are having a convention here. Tuesday night the graduate nurses of Boston will have a reunion. Wednesday night will bring the second Russian-Tschaikowsky programme. This programme, generally speaking, is entirely different from the one given a few weeks ago, which was one of the most successful musical features of the season.

Special arrangements have been made to make the night of the Fourth, Thursday, unusually attractive. The feature of the "Red Cross Night" was the singing of popular war songs by a chorus of upwards of 100 men under Stephen Townsend. This same chorus will take part on the Fourth. All the popular songs sung on "Red Cross Night" will be repeated and there will be some new ones, and, as on the former occasions, the audience will be asked to join in the refrains. It will be a good singing concert.

For the closing night, Mr. Jacchia has arranged a fine popular programme, one of the best of the season. The programme for tomorrow (Monday) night is as follows:

Overture, "Zampa" .....Herold
Waltz, "Jelly Fellows".....Vollstedt
Soli for violoncello:
"Cantilena" .....Goltermann
"Spinning Song" .....Popper
Mr. Keller.
Fantasia, "The Masked Ball".....Verdi
First Hungarian Rhapsody .....Liszt
Nocturne, No. 1, op. 9.....Chopin-Jacchia
Marche Miniature .....Tschaikowsky
Scheherazade .....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces against a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion.
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Selection, "Her Regiment" .....Herbert
"Andalusia" .....Sequeira
"A Petits Pas" .....Sudessi
March from "Tannhauser" .....Wagner

Transcript July 6

Last Night of the Pops

Conductor Jacchia and his diversified programe.

The thirty-third season of Pop Concerts comes to an end tonight, and much to the gratification of the management it has turned out to be the most successful season of these concerts that Boston has ever known. In the beginning the outlook was not very promising. There was the war, and as a direct result of the war there was the diminishing patronage from the various universities and colleges of Boston which were steady customers of the Pops in the past.

To have made a record this season is due largely to the personal popularity of Conductor Jacchia and the programmes which he has made. It will be good news to the patrons that Mr. Jacchia has been engaged for the next season of Pop Concerts, which will begin in May, 1919.

The programmes which Mr. Jacchia has made and the diversity of the works which have appeared on them, as well as their performance by the orchestra, has caused unusual comment. In the fifty-four concerts that have been given during the past nine weeks 350 different works have appeared on the programmes. This is an average of nearly forty new pieces each week. The record shows that the programmes have contained forty different overtures, twenty-three fantasias, twenty-one selections, seven rhapsodies, parts of fourteen different suites, fifteen intermezzos and preludes, thirty waltzes, thirty marches and 161 pieces that must be grouped under the general head of miscellaneous.

The season was made notable by several special nights. Among these must be mentioned Red Cross Night, May 27, and the special War Savings Stamp concert on Sunday, June 23. During the Red Cross campaign and the War Savings Stamp campaign speakers were present in Symphony Hall nearly every evening and the subscriptions obtained from the audiences were large.

Record July 7 — 1917

SPLENDID WAR WORK MARKS POPS' SEASON

Jacchia and Symphony Hall Management Earn Public Gratitude

By J. V. Clark

The season of Pops at Symphony Hall comes to an end this evening. The season, according to reports from the management, has been a most satisfactory one financially. It has been more than a financial success. It has been the best season musically in recent years—perhaps none has been better. It has been a season which has been of great service to the community in its furtherance of the work for the Great War.

In Mr. Jacchia, a last year's discovery, the management found just the man for the place. A conductor with plenty of temperament he has instilled into the band, which in the days immediately prior to his coming was too prone to play with a sometimes sluggish indifference, enthusiasm and fire—that something which is so adequately described by our American slang "pep." He has made excellent programs. No trash has found its way on his list of musical selections.

At times, as he himself told the readers of this paper in an interview, he has put on his program war songs which of themselves did not possess sufficient intrinsic musical worth to figure on a dignified music program, but the war makes legitimate the use of any decent music which helps in keeping patriotism aflame. On Mr. Jacchia's programs have been found the old tried and true pieces, which are part and parcel of Pops entertainment. Conductors come, conductors go, but Thais meditations, Cavalleri intermezzi, Handelian Largoes and Little Lead Soldiers Marching remain. They are the Camilles, the Girls I Left Behind Me and the Charley's Aunts of the Pops' repertoire.

Mr. Jacchia has made a good selection, although possibly not too large, of the better musical plays and operetts of ephemeral interest. Best of all he has included some novelties from the modern Italian and Russian repertoire. Wisely he has not cluttered his program with American music just because it was by Americans. The worth of the music, not the nationality of the composer, has guided Mr. Jacchia. Once admitting that the music for the Pops ought to be as light as it is (we are not at this moment considering the advisability of lifting the standard of the Pops to, say, the standard of the Wood Promenade Concerts in London), the programs have been well made up.

The series have been honestly advertised and carefully managed as in the past. No promises have been made and then broken. Mr. Walter's straightforward advance notices to the public—and no press agent's notices come to this office which surpass his in directness and clarity—have kept the public fully and quickly informed on all matters. The crowds have been handled most efficiently and there has been none of that roughness or extreme freedom of conduct at these concerts which have marked similar concerts in many other places.

But the Pops this year have done more than offer well played programs of polite music to persons of good breeding. They have served their city, their State and the country in every way possible. Any cloud that may have hung over the Boston Symphony Orchestra because of the acts of any persons associated with it in the past should be dissipated by the patriotism shown by all persons connected with the orchestra this summer. There should be no silly prejudice against our great orchestra—either in its full greatness as a Symphony orchestra or in its lesser brilliancy as a Pops orchestra—because of the nefarious acts of any person previously connected with it. The orchestra, we hope, will continue serving the community not only as an instrument for aesthetic advancement but as a power for instilling patriotism.

During the summer season the orchestra did splendid work in the Third Liberty Loan Campaign. Stirring music and speeches by eminent speakers sold many bonds. Again, when the Thrift Stamp campaign was on foot the orchestra and its management did everything in its power to further the necessary work, and on one occasion offered a special Sunday concert for which every person connected with Symphony Hall gave his or her services gratuitously. The Red Cross found a good friend in the Symphony Hall management—one which helped in all ways and on all occasions. Distinguished guests of the city, the Blue Devils, and the members of the so-called Republican Band of France, were entertained at the Pops and their presence with accompanying exercises aroused great enthusiasm. There were community "sings" that were good, honest fun.

In a word, the management of the Pops this year gave not only as good entertainments as they have given in years past, but better entertainment and, at the same time, did war work of the most valuable kind.

Gordon's Olympia

The simple announcement that William S. Hart is to appear is quite sufficient to secure the attendance of thousands of wise theatregoers, but the glad news that he is to appear this week at Gordon's Olympia in no less a play than "Wolf Lorry" is certain to create a furor, for it gives him an opportunity to show off his attainments as a professional Westerner to better advantage than anything in which he has appeared up to the present time. The vaudeville, too, is splendid. It ranges from grave to gay, but is all scintillatingly clever and thoroughly enjoyable. It has variety enough to please every patron and vovacity enough to please the most blaze. Singers who are as pretty as they are clever, and dancers who may be described in the same way. Jugglers and acrobats galore, and all of them above the average, while there are in store for those who come some surprise acts which cannot be told of in advance.

adv 142 Jul

POPS
JUNE'
W Players of Volunte
6,492 T
STIRRING
BY CHA Allies Still
He Says;
Thrift
The noise was the pop i bloding at Sy patriotic sign big week of War Savings
Sixty-fo
two stamps
Symphony H of the most in history.
five cent pie fers it came the first part
The attend
Pop Concert unable to fin
the house wa urday. Hun take standin amounted to phony Hall s every stamp let, the Pop instrumental valued at $1
AUDIENCE
And the a of it becaus and patriotic come back they heard of the year.
A feature appearance uniform wh flag when played, at cert, came for "La Ma
flag of Sun Reale," an thusiasm w end, to wa for the "St
The pun night came
F. Weed o
"It is o
to the na
Weed said, of us shou
the presen do.
ALLIES C
"I wond of Boston moves alo wonted ca front the the exten
of 20,000
"We a Foch is g it is up make go and to m end that side

TIGHT BINDING

145

m UNION

ress: Springfield, Mass.

Eighteen Germans Dropped from Boston Symphony

BOSTON, June 21—Eighteen Germans have been dropped recently from membership in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to W. H. Brennan, an official of the organization. It is stated that in the future no enemy alien will be permited to take part in the concerts of the orchestra, whose former leader, Dr. Karl Muck, has been interned for the duration of the war.

om POST

dress: Washington, D. C.

GERMAN MUSICIANS OUSTED.

Boston Symphony Drops 18, but Retains Austrians in Organization.

Special to The Washington Post.

Boston, Mass., June 21.—Eighteen Germans who last year belonged to the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been dropped from membership, and hereafter no musicians who are counted by the United States government as enemy aliens are to take part in the concerts of the organization. This information was given out at symphony hall today.

Among those who were dismissed, it is understood, is Ernest Schmidt, violinist and assistant conductor, who directed the concerts in Boston this spring after Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, was arrested and interned. The few Austrians in the orchestra will be retained. Only those players who would cause difficulty for the orchestra in entering the cities of the five monthly tours, of which Washington is one, will be dropped.

m

ress:

e

18 GERMANS ARE DROPPED FROM BOSTON SYMPHONY

No More Enemy Aliens to Take Part.

Boston, June 21.—Eighteen Germans have been dropped recently from membership in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to W. H. Brennan, an official of the organization.

It is stated that in the future no enemy aliens will be permitted to take part in the concerts of the orchestra, whose former leader, Dr. Karl Muck, has been interned for the duration of the war.

RECORD

s: Philadelphia, Pa.

JUN 23 1918

FRENCH DISPLACE GERMANS

Take Places Vacated in Cleaning Out Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Special to "The Record."

Boston, June 22.—Eighteeen Germans have been dropped from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Ernest Schmidt, who succeeded Dr. Karl Muck as leader. Citizens of the United States and subjects of the allied nations will be employed henceforth, say the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra Corporation, which recently took over the management of this famous organization of musicians.

Several of the vacancies will be filled by members of the French Military Band. Before these musicians left France their government gave them privilege of accepting engagements in this country, as it was felt they already had rendered their share of service in the war.

Five members of the French band already have signed contracts with the Symphony Orchestra for the coming season. They are Abdon Laus, bassoon; Emile Sitevenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernand Thillois, violinist, and Georges Miquelle, violoncello.

M. Speyer played a solo at the concert at Symphony Hall recently and aroused great admiration with his tone and technique. He took a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1911, and has played with several leading Continental orchestras.

M. Stievenard has the reputation of being the greatest master of the bass clarinet in France. He received a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire, has been a member of the Lamoureux and Opera Comique orchestras and is a professor in Vincent D'Indy's Schola Cantorum. M. Stievenard was wounded at the battle of Yser.

M. Laus is a first prize man. He has played at the Theatre des Champs Elysees and Ballet Russe, under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

M. Thillois received second prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1912. He was called away immediately for military service of two years, and served continuously until this spring.

M. Miquelle is regarded as a player of most unusual talent. He won a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire, and has been a soloist at the Concerts Wurmsy in Paris.

n AMERICAN

ress: Baltimore, Md.

When W. A. Brady produces The Chinese Puzzle, among those in the cast will be Edward Emery, Alice Lindahl, Edouard Durand, Mrs. Russ Whytal and Annie Hughes.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has dropped 18 German artists and will fill their places with French musicians. It is said the orchestra will employ no more alien enemies.

om NORTH AMERICAN

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

ate

18 GERMANS DROPPED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Among Them Is Ernest Schmidt, Successor to Dr. Karl Muck

Special Dispatch to The North American

BOSTON, June 22.—Eighteen Germans have been dropped from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Ernest Schmidt, who succeeded Dr. Karl Muck as leader.

Citizens of the United States and subjects of the allied nations will be employed henceforth, according to the trustees of the symphony orchestra corporation, which recently took over the management of this famous organization of musicians.

Several of the vacancies will be filled by members of the French military band. Before these musicians left France their government gave them privilege of accepting engagements in this country, as it was felt that they already had rendered their share of the service in the war.

Five members of the French band already have signed contracts with the symphony orchestra for the coming season. They are: Abdon Laus, bassoon; Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernand Thillois, violinist, and Georges Miquelle, violoncello.

rom

ddress: New York City.

ate

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CLEANS OUT ITS GERMAN ELEMENT

Eighteen Alien Enemies Dismissed by the Board of Trustees.

FRENCHMEN ENGAGED

Sir Henry Wood Now Is Likely to Accept the Leadership.

(Special to The New York Review.)

Boston, June 28.—Following the work of eliminating everything Teutonic from the Boston Symphony Orchestra which began with the internment of its former leader, Dr. Karl Muck, eighteen players of the organization, all enemy aliens, have been dropped from its ranks, and they will be replaced as quickly as possible by artists of allied nationalities.

Now that this has been done, it is believed that Sir Henry Wood, the English conductor, will accept the directorship of the orchestra. This post was offered him some weeks ago but he would not consent to come to Boston—one of the chief reasons, it now develops, that he would not be connected with any organization tainted with Teutonism. It is believed that he now will accept the post.

Five members of the French military band, which has been filling an engagement and attracting keenly appreciative attention here this week, have been engaged to replace some of the dropped players. The newly chosen French members will go a long way toward improving the situation. The late appointes are Abdon Laus, bassoon; Emil Stievenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernand Thillois, violin, and George Miquelle, 'cello. Just before these musicians left France they were informed by the Minister of Fine Arts that the French Government felt that they had done their share in the fight against the Germans, and that the men could consider themselves free to accept engagements in America at the close of their tour. Some of the soloists created a deep impression here, which is no more than might be expected, as twenty-eight of them hold first prizes from the Paris Conservatoire.

M. Laus is a protege of Pierre Monteux. Besides other famous organizations he has played in the Paris Opera and the classical concerts at Pau. He is a first-prize man. M. Stevenard is said to be the greatest master of the bass clarinet in Europe. He has written a school for the bass clarinet, is professor in Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum and has been a member of the Lamoreux and Opera Comique Orchestras. He was wounded at the Battle of the Yser. M. Speyer won great admiration for his tone and technique in a solo he played at Symphony Hall Tuesday night. He won his Conservatoire prize in 1911 and has played with the Colonne and Opera Comique Orchestras, the Champs Elysees Theater and the Vichy and Deauville casinos. M. Thillois received second prize at the Conservatoire in 1912. He was called away immediately for his two years' military service. Then came the war, and he served with the fighters until this spring.

M. Miquelle is regarded as having unusual talent as a 'cellist. He is a first-prize man, and was a soloist at the concerts Wurmser in Paris.

Unionizing the orchestra has seemingly gone by the board.

TRANSCRIPT
FEB, 7-8-9

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon, 2:30
Saturday Evening at 8
ANTON WITEK, soloist
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

HERALD
FEB. 8-9

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon at 2:30
Saturday Evening at 8
ANTON WITEK, soloist
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

—GLOBE—
FEB. 8-9

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Saturday Evening at 8
ANTON WITEK, soloist
DR. KARL MUCK, Cond.
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

HERALD
FEB. 20-21

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon at 2:30
Saturday Evening at 8
DR. KARL MUCK, Cond.
ETHEL LEGINSKA, Soloist
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

ADVERTISER
FEB. 23

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon at 2:30
Saturday Evening at 8
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
ETHEL LEGINSKA, Soloist
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

RECORD
FEB-23-21

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon at 2.30
Saturday Evening at 8
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
ETHEL LEGINSKA, Soloist
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE
f21 23

ADVERTISER-
FEB-8-9

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon at 2:30. Saturday Evening at 8. ANTON WITEK, soloist. Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

—RECORD—
FEB. 7-8-9

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon at 2.30
Saturday Evening at 8
ANTON WITEK, soloist
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE
f7 9

TRANSCRIPT
FEB. 22, 23

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Tonight at 8
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
ETHEL LEGINSKA, Soloist
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE
4t(A) fe 20

—POST—
FEB. 23

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon at 2:30
Saturday Evening at 8
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
ETHEL LEGINSKA, Soloist
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

GLOBE
FEB. 23, 14

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
SATURDAY EVENING AT 8
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
ETHEL LEGINSKA, Soloist
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

[9h]

TRANSCRIPT
FEB. 21, 1918

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE
THURSDAY EVENING, FEB. 21, AT 8
Boston Symphony Orchestra
DR. KARL MUCK, Conductor
ETHEL LEGINSKA, Soloist
A limited number of tickets at GEO. H. KENT'S Bookstore and at Theatre evening of concert.
2t(A) fe 20

POST-HERALD, FEB. 17-
TRANSCRIPT-FEB. 16-

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA NEXT FRIDAY AFT. AT 2:30 SATURDAY EVE. AT 8
ETHEL LEGINSKA, Pianist, Soloist

ADVERTISER
MARCH. 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon at 2:30
Saturday Evening at 8.
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
IRMA SEYDEL, Soloist
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

TRANSCRIPT
MARCH. 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Tonight at 8
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond
IRMA SEYDEL, Soloist
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE
4t(A) fe 27

GLOBE
MARCH. 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Saturday Evening at 8
DR. KARL MUCK, Cond
IRMA SEYDEL, Soloist
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

TRANSCRIPT
JAN. 3, 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon at 2.30
Saturday Evening at 8
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE
4t(A) ja 23

RECORD
MARCH. 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon at 2.30
Saturday Evening at 8
Dr. KARL MUCK, Cond.
IRMA SEYDEL, Soloist
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE
mh1-2t

HERALD
MARCH, 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYMPHONY HALL
Friday Afternoon at 2:30. Saturday Evening at 8. Dr. CARL MUCK, Cond.
IRMA SEYDEL, Soloist
TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 38

BSO
Pops

1918 - 1919

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK

BLANK PAGE

MONITOR AUGUST 30, 1918

MR. FRADKIN JOINS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—Fredric Fradkin, a native of the United States, has been appointed concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to an announcement given out by Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the organization. He succeeds Anton Witek, a native of Bohemia. The appointment is understood to indicate that the policy of the trustees is to Americanize the orchestra, as far as is consistent with the highest artistic standards, and to replace former alien enemy members with musicians whose sympathies are with the United States and the Allies in the war.

Mr. Fradkin is the artist whom Mr. Ansermet, musical director of the Diaghileff Russian Ballet, selected as his concertmaster in the American tour of 1916. The musical director of the ballet picked him out from among the violinists then available in New York because, as he said, he found him possessing just the initiative in attacking a phrase and just the rhythmic energy in outlining a melody that were demanded in the leader of the string section of an orchestra.

Mr. Witek, the retiring concertmaster, joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1910, when Max Fiedler was the conductor. He succeeded Willy Hess. Before coming to the United States, he enjoyed much acclaim in German musical circles.

GLOBE AUGUST 30,

NEW CONCERT MASTER OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Judge Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that Frederic Fradkin, the brilliant young American violinist, has been engaged as concertmaster of the orchestra to succeed Anton Witek.

Besides being a native-born American, Mr Fradkin has not only youth in his favor but is an artist of very unusual gifts and achievements. Only 26 years old, he is the youngest man to occupy this most important post since Franz Kniesel came to Boston in 1885.

He is, musically speaking, decidedly of the French school. Born in Troy, N Y, of Russian parents, April 2, 1892, his father placed him under the tuition of Henry Schradieck when he was 5 years old. His next teacher was Max Bendix. In 1905 he went to Paris and in 1909 received the first prize of the Conservatoire for violin playing.

His first engagement was as concert master and soloist under Pannequin. The following year he was engaged by Louis Ganne as soloist in Monte Carlo. Then he went to Brussels and studied with Ysaye.

Fradkin's first important appearance in America was in Carnegie Hall, New York, January, 1911, with the Philharmonic Orchestra. He went to London in the Spring of 1911 and played under Landon Ronald. In 1912 he was engaged as concertmaster and soloist of the Wiener-Conzert Verein, Vienna.

He returned to this country in the Fall of 1915 to be concertmaster and soloist of the orchestra organized for the Ballet Russe, and held this position during the life of that organization in this country.

RECORD, AUGUST 30,

FRADKIN NEW CONCERTMEISTER OF SYMPHONY

FREDRIC FRADKIN

By J. V. CLARK

Boston theatregoers with memories for details rubbed their eyes when they saw in the Boston papers this morning that a certain Frederic Fradkin was to be the new concert meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Anton Wietek.

Where had they heard the name before? The statement of Judge Cabot, president ofthe Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he had appeared here as concert master ofthe Ballet Russe did not entirely satisfy. Had he not been here more recently?

Then the theatregoer with a long memory remembered—Fradkin appeared at B. F. Keith's a fortnight ago with a young woman named Tell. Their team's name was Fradkin and Tell.

The news spread like wildfire around the Rialto. Vaudeville players were puffed up with pride that one of their number should have been chosen for the second most important position in the country's greatest orchestra.

"Bob" Larsen, the manager of B. F. Keith's, is in New York today, but his assistant, Bart Grady, was quick on the job calling for press agents to get out a story for tomorrow morning's papers.

When Fradkin appeared at Keith's he was the second act on the program and thus did not receive extended notices from the dramatic editors who took in the show that week. The Record in its review of the bill said of Fradkin:—

"Another musical act was that offered by Fradkin, who was booked as a world renowned violinist, and Miss Jean Tell, soprano. The violinist, who played exceptionally well, made up his program largely from the short pieces Kresler used to play before he went into voluntary exile. Miss Tell, a strikingly pretty girl, more than equaled Mr. Fradkins success."

That in brief is the story of Fradkin's playing. His importance makes a little more extended notice now advisable. He plays with an extremely smooth, velocity tone, but without a particularly big or sensuous tone. He phrases like a musician and like one who has been carefully taught. He impressed his audience, and vaudeville's audiences are extremely heterogeneous, as a good sound violinist, but he did not electrify them in Kreisler or Heifetz manner. How he will figure on the Symphony stage no man can tell.

Mr. Fradkin is extremely young, only 26. He is the youngest man to occupy the position of concert master in our Symphony since Franz Kneisel came to Boston in 1885.

He is, musically speaking, decidedly of the French school—so the trustees of the orchestra say. Born in Troy, N. Y., in 1892 he began his violinistic career at an early age. He has studied with Schradieck, Bendix, Remy and Ysaye. He has played under Ganne and Mahler.

Mr. Fradkin received extremely flattering press notices when he first played in America, possibly the best coming from Henry Finck in the N. Y. Evening Post. He is a first prize Paris Conservatory pupil, the prize being awarded by Faure, Colonne, Vidal, D'Ambrosio, Thibaud and Lalo.

TRAVELER AUGUST 30,

FRADKIN COMES IN SEPTEMBER

Fredric Fradkin, native born American violinist, engaged by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as concert master to succeed Witek, is only 26 years of age.

Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist engaged to succeed Anton Witek as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is only 26 years old, and the youngest man to occupy the post since Franz Kneisel held it, more than 20 years ago. He is a native born American, of Russian parents. He has studied under Schradieck, Bendix, Remy, Pennequin and Ysaye. He had pronounced success as concert master and soloist of the Wiener-Conzert Verein, Vienna, and was concert master of the Ballet Russe Orchestra during its existence in this country. Mr. Fradkin plans to reach Boston late in September.

HERALD AUGUST 30.

NEW SYMPHONY VIOLIN LEADER

Fredric Fradkin Succeeds Anton Witek as Concert Master

IS 26 YEARS OLD AND AN AMERICAN

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced yesterday that Fredric Fradkin, American violinist, had been engaged as concert master of the orchestra to succeed Anton Witek. Besides being a native born American, Mr. Fradkin has youth in his favor, and is an artist of unusual gifts. Only 26 years old, he is the youngest man to occupy this important post since Franz Kneisel came to Boston in 1895.

The new member of the Symphony Orchestra attracted much attention as the violinist who was concert master of the Ballet Russe Orchestra during the two Boston engagements of that company. Musically speaking, he is decidedly of the French school.

Is of Russian Parentage

Born in Troy, of Russian parents, April 2, 1892, he was 5 years old when his father placed him under the tuition of Henry Schradieck, the famous teacher. His next teacther was Max Bendix, for many years concert master of the Chicago orchestra. In 1905 he went to Paris, where his first teachers were Remy and Joseph White, and in 1907 he entered the Conservatoire in the class of Professor Lefort. He received the first prize of the Conservatoire for violin playing in 1909, the jury being composed of Gabriel Faure, Edouard Colonne, Paul Vidal, D'Ambrosio, Jacques Thibaud, Pierre Salo, and others.

His first engagement was as concert master and soloist under Pennequin. The following year he was engaged by Louis Ganne as soloist in Monte Carlo, where he had a decided success. Then, feeling that he needed more work, he went to Brussels and studied with Ysaye.

Led Ballet Russe

Fradkin's first important appearance in America was in Carnegie Hall, New York, in January, 1911, when he was the last soloist to appear with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under the late Gustav Mahler. Exceedingly laudatory notices followed his appearance. He went to London in the spring of 1911 and played under Landon Ronald. In 1912 he was engaged as concert master and soloist of the Wiener-Conzert Verein, Vienna, where he had more success. He returned to this country in the fall of 1915 to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra organized for the Ballet Russe, and held this position during the life of that organization in this country.

Mr. Fradkin plans to reach Boston toward the end of next month.

POST, AUGUST 30,

SYMPHONY GETS AMERICAN BOY

Fredric Fradkin, at 26, the New Concertmaster

Judge Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced yesterday that Fredric Fradkin, the brilliant young American violinist, had been engaged as concertmaster of the orchestra, to succeed Anton Witek.

Besides being a native born American, Mr. Fradkin has not only youth in his favor, but is an artist of very unusual gifts and achievements. Only 26 years old, he is the youngest man to occupy this most important post since Franz Kneisel came to Boston in 1885.

Mr. Fradkin will be remembered by the musical public of Boston as the very remarkable violinist who was concertmaster of the Ballet Russe Orchestra and roused such enthusiasm with the various incidental solos he had to play during the two Boston engagements of that company.

TRANSCRIPT, AUGUST 30,

FRADKIN, NEW CONCERTMASTER

American Violinist with Fine Record Engaged for Boston Symphony Orchestra

Judge Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that Frederic Fradkin, the young American violinist, had been engaged as concertmaster of the orchestra. It is considered fortunate for the orchestra and its patrons in Boston and elsewhere that the difficult problem of filling the first seat of the volin section has been successfully solved and that an American has been found for it. Besides being a native-born American, Mr. Fradkin has not only youth in his favor, but he is an artist of unusual gifts and achievements. Only twenty-six years old, he is the youngest man to occupy this most important post since Franz Kneisel came to Boston in 1885.

Mr. Fradkin will be remembered by the musical public of Boston as the violinist who was concertmaster of the Ballet Russe Orchestra and roused such enthusiasm with the various incidental solos he had to play during the two Boston engagements of that company. His career, though necessarily brief, is interesting.

He is, musically speaking, decidedly of the French school. Born in Troy, N. Y., of Russian parents, April 2, 1892, when he was five years old his father placed him under the tuition of Henry Schradieck, the famous teacher. His next teacher was Max Bendix, for many years concertmaster of the Chicago Orchestra. In 1905 he went to Paris, where his first teachers were Remy and Joseph White, and in 1907 he entered the Conservatoire in the class of Professor Lefort. He received the first prize of the Conservatoire for violin playing in 1900, the jury being composed of Gabriel Fauré, Edouard Colonne, Paul Vidal, D'Ambrosio, Jacques Thibaud, Pierre Lalo, etc.

His first engagement was as concertmaster and soloist under Pannequin. The following year he was engaged by Louis Ganne as soloist in

From SUN

Address: New York City.

Date AUG 30

FRADKIN IS CONCERT MASTER

American Musician Succeeds Witek in Boston Orchestra.

BOSTON, Aug. 29.—The appointment of the American violinist Frederic Fradkin as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Anton Witek, was announced by the trustees to-day.

Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885. He was born in Troy in 1892, and studied in Paris and Brussels. For three years he was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Conzert Verein of Vienna. In 1915 he returned to this country to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

From

Address: New York City

Date AUG 30

Fradkin, American Violinist, Heads New Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Aug. 29.—The appointment of the American violinist, Frederic Fradkin, of Troy, N. Y., as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Anton Witek, was announced by the trustees of the organization to-day. Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the place since Franz Kneisel was appointed, in 1885, and succeeds to a position filled by some of the best known violinists of Europe.

Mr. Fradkin was born in Troy, N. Y. in 1892, and studied in Paris and Brussels. For three years he was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Konzert Verein, of Vienna. In 1915 he returned to this country to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

From WORLD

Address: New York City

Date AUG 30 1918

FRADKIN SYMPHONY HEAD.

BOSTON, Aug. 29.—The appointment of the American violinist, Frederic Fradkin of Troy, N. Y., as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Anton Witek, was announced by the trustees of the organization to-day. Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885. Mr. Fradkin was born in Troy in 1892 and studied in Paris and Brussels.

MONITOR AUGUST 30, 1918

MR. FRADKIN JOINS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—Fredric Fradkin, a native of the United States, has been appointed concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to an announcement given out by Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the organization. He succeeds Anton Witek, a native of Bohemia. The appointment is understood to indicate that the policy of the trustees is to Americanize the orchestra, as far as is consistent with the highest artistic standards, and to replace former alien enemy members with musicians whose sympathies are with the United States and the Allies in the war.

Mr. Fradkin is the artist whom Mr. Ansermet, musical director of the Diaghileff Russian Ballet, selected as his concertmaster in the American tour of 1916. The musical director of the ballet picked him out from among the violinists then available in New York because, as he said, he found him possessing just the initiative in attacking a phrase and just the rhythmic energy in outlining a melody that were demanded in the leader of the string section of an orchestra.

Mr. Witek, the retiring concertmaster, joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1910, when Max Fiedler was the conductor. He succeeded Willy Hess. Before coming to the United States, he enjoyed much acclaim in German musical circles.

GLOBE AUGUST 30,

NEW CONCERT MASTER OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Judge Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that Frederic Fradkin, the brilliant young American violinist, has been engaged as concertmaster of the orchestra to succeed Anton Witek.

Besides being a native-born American, Mr Fradkin has not only youth in his favor but is an artist of very unusual gifts and achievements. Only 26 years old, he is the youngest man to occupy this most important post since Franz Kniesel came to Boston in 1885.

He is, musically speaking, decidedly of the French school. Born in Troy, N Y, of Russian parents, April 2, 1892, his father placed him under the tuition of Henry Schradieck when he was 5 years old. His next teacher was Max Bendix. In 1905 he went to Paris and in 1909 received the first prize of the Conservatoire for violin playing.

His first engagement was as concert master and soloist under Pannequin. The following year he was engaged by Louis Ganne as soloist in Monte Carlo. Then he went to Brussels and studied with Ysaye.

Fradkin's first important appearance in America was in Carnegie Hall, New York, January, 1911, with the Philharmonic Orchestra. He went to London in the Spring of 1911 and played under Landon Ronald. In 1912 he was engaged as concertmaster and soloist of the Wiener-Conzert Verein, Vienna.

He returned to this country in the Fall of 1915 to be concertmaster and soloist of the orchestra organized for the Ballet Russe, and held this position during the life of that organization in this country.

RECORD, AUGUST 30,

FRADKIN NEW CONCERTMEISTER OF SYMPHONY

FREDRIC FRADKIN

By J. V. CLARK

Boston theatregoers with memories for details rubbed their eyes when they saw in the Boston papers this morning that a certain Frederic Fradkin was to be the new concert meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Anton Wietek.

Where had they heard the name before? The statement of Judge Cabot, president ofthe Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he had appeared here as concert master ofthe Ballet Russe did not entirely satisfy. Had he not been here more recently?

Then the theatregoer with a long memory remembered—Fradkin appeared at B. F. Keith's a fortnight ago with a young woman named Tell. Their team's name was Fradkin and Tell.

The news spread like wildfire around the Rialto. Vaudeville players were puffed up with pride that one of their number should have been chosen for the second most important position in the country's greatest orchestra.

"Bob" Larsen, the manager of B. F. Keith's, is in New York today, but his assistant, Bart Grady, was quick on the job calling for press agents to get out a story for tomorrow morning's papers.

When Fradkin appeared at Keith's he was the second act on the program and thus did not receive extended notices from the dramatic editors who took in the show that week. The Record in its review of the bill said of Fradkin:—

"Another musical act was that offered by Fradkin, who was booked as a world renowned violinist, and Miss Jean Tell, soprano. The violinist, who played exceptionally well, made up his program largely from the short pieces Kresler used to play before he went into voluntary exile. Miss Tell, a strikingly pretty girl, more than equaled Mr. Fradkins success."

That in brief is the story of Fradkin's playing. His importance makes a little more extended notice now advisable. He plays with an extremely smooth, velocity tone, but without a particularly big or sensuous tone. He phrases like a musician and like one who has been carefully taught. He impressed his audience, and vaudeville's audiences are extremely heterogeneous, as a good sound violinist, but he did not electrify them in Kreisler or Heifetz manner. How he will figure on the Symphony stage no man can tell.

Mr. Fradkin is extremely young, only 26. He is the youngest man to occupy the position of concert master in our Symphony since Franz Kneisel came to Boston in 1885.

He is, musically speaking, decidedly of the French school—so the trustees of the orchestra say. Born in Troy, N. Y., in 1892 he began his violinistic career at an early age. He has studied with Schradieck, Bendix, Remy and Ysaye. He has played under Ganne and Mahler.

Mr. Fradkin received extremely flattering press notices when he first played in America, possibly the best coming from Henry Finck in the N. Y. Evening Post. He is a first prize Paris Conservatory pupil, the prize being awarded by Faure, Colonne, Vidal, D'Ambrosio, Thibaud and Lalo.

TRAVELER AUGUST 30,

FRADKIN COMES IN SEPTEMBER

Fredric Fradkin, native born American violinist, engaged by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as concert master to succeed Witek, is only 26 years of age.

Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist engaged to succeed Anton Witek as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is only 26 years old, and the youngest man to occupy the post since Franz Kneisel held it, more than 20 years ago. He is a native born American, of Russian parents. He has studied under Schradieck, Bendix, Remy, Pennequin and Ysaye. He had pronounced success as concert master and soloist of the Wiener-Conzert Verein, Vienna, and was concert master of the Ballet Russe Orchestra during its existence in this country. Mr. Fradkin plans to reach Boston late in September.

From SUN

Address: New York City.

Date AUG 30

FRADKIN IS CONCERT MASTER

American Musician Succeeds Witek in Boston Orchestra.

BOSTON, Aug. 29.—The appointment of the American violinist Frederic Fradkin as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Anton Witek, was announced by the trustees to-day.

Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885. He was born in Troy in 1892, and studied in Paris and Brussels. For three years he was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Conzert Verein of Vienna. In 1915 he returned to this country to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

From

Address: New York City

Date

Fradkin, American Violinist, Heads New Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Aug. 29.—The appointment of the American violinist, Frederic Fradkin, of Troy, N. Y., as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Anton Witek, was announced by the trustees of the organization to-day. Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the place since Franz Kneisel was appointed, in 1885, and succeeds to a position filled by some of the best known violinists of Europe.

Mr. Fradkin was born in Troy, N. Y. in 1892, and studied in Paris and Brussels. For three years he was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Konzert Verein, of Vienna. In 1915 he returned to this country to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

From WORLD

Address: New York City

Date AUG 30 1918

FRADKIN SYMPHONY HEAD.

BOSTON, Aug. 29.—The appointment of the American violinist, Frederic Fradkin of Troy, N. Y., as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Anton Witek, was announced by the trustees of the organization to-day. Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885. Mr. Fradkin was born in Troy in 1892 and studied in Paris and Brussels.

HERALD AUGUST 30.

NEW SYMPHONY VIOLIN LEADER

Fredric Fradkin Succeeds Anton Witek as Concert Master

IS 26 YEARS OLD AND AN AMERICAN

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced yesterday that Fredric Fradkin, American violinist, had been engaged as concert master of the orchestra to succeed Anton Witek. Besides being a native born American, Mr. Fradkin has youth in his favor, and is an artist of unusual gifts. Only 26 years old, he is the youngest man to occupy this important post since Franz Kneisel came to Boston in 1895.

The new member of the Symphony Orchestra attracted much attention as the violinist who was concert master of the Ballet Russe Orchestra during the two Boston engagements of that company. Musically speaking, he is decidedly of the French school.

Is of Russian Parentage

Born in Troy, of Russian parents, April 2, 1892, he was 5 years old when his father placed him under the tuition of Henry Schradieck, the famous teacher. His next teacther was Max Bendix, for many years concert master of the Chicago orchestra. In 1905 he went to Paris, where his first teachers were Remy and Joseph White, and in 1907 he entered the Conservatoire in the class of Professor Lefort. He received the first prize of the Conservatoire for violin playing in 1909, the jury being composed of Gabriel Faure, Edouard Colonne, Paul Vidal, D'Ambrosio, Jacques Thibaud, Pierre Salo, and others.

His first engagement was as concert master and soloist under Pennequin. The following year he was engaged by Louis Ganne as soloist in Monte Carlo, where he had a decided success. Then, feeling that he needed more work, he went to Brussels and studied with Ysaye.

Led Ballet Russe

Fradkin's first important appearance in America was in Carnegie Hall, New York, in January, 1911, when he was the first soloist to appear with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under the late Gustav Mahler. Exceedingly laudatory notices followed his appearance. He went to London in the spring of 1911 and played under Landon Ronald. In 1912 he was engaged as concert master and soloist of the Wiener-Conzert Verein, Vienna, where he had more success. He returned to this country in the fall of 1915 to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra organized for the Ballet Russe, and held this position during the life of that organization in this country.

Mr. Fradkin plans to reach Boston toward the end of next month.

POST, AUGUST 30,

SYMPHONY GETS AMERICAN BOY

Fredric Fradkin, at 26, the New Concertmaster

Judge Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced yesterday that Fredric Fradkin, the brilliant young American violinist, had been engaged as concertmaster of the orchestra, to succeed Anton Witek.

Besides being a native born American, Mr. Fradkin has not only youth in his favor, but is an artist of very unusual gifts and achievements. Only 26 years old, he is the youngest man to occupy this most important post since Franz Kneisel came to Boston in 1885.

Mr. Fradkin will be remembered by the musical public of Boston as the very remarkable violinist who was concertmaster of the Ballet Russe Orchestra and roused such enthusiasm with the various incidental solos he had to play during the two Boston engagements of that company.

TRANSCRIPT, AUGUST 30,

FRADKIN, NEW CONCERTMASTER

American Violinist with Fine Record Engaged for Boston Symphony Orchestra

Judge Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that Frederic Fradkin, the young American violinist, had been engaged as concertmaster of the orchestra. It is considered fortunate for the orchestra and its patrons in Boston and elsewhere that the difficult problem of filling the first seat of the volin section has been successfully solved and that an American has been found for it. Besides being a native-born American, Mr. Fradkin has not only youth in his favor, but he is an artist of unusual gifts and achievements. Only twenty-six years old, he is the youngest man to occupy this most important post since Franz Kneisel came to Boston in 1885.

Mr. Fradkin will be remembered by the musical public of Boston as the violinist who was concertmaster of the Ballet Russe Orchestra and roused such enthusiasm with the various incidental solos he had to play during the two Boston engagements of that company. His career, though necessarily brief, is interesting.

He is, musically speaking, decidedly of the French school. Born in Troy, N. Y., of Russian parents, April 2, 1892, when he was five years old his father placed him under the tuition of Henry Schradieck, the famous teacher. His next teacher was Max Bendix, for many years concertmaster of the Chicago Orchestra. In 1905 he went to Paris, where his first teachers were Remy and Joseph White, and in 1907 he entered the Conservatoire in the class of Professor Lefort. He received the first prize of the Conservatoire for violin playing in 1909, the jury being composed of Gabriel Fauré, Edouard Colonne, Paul Vidal, D'Ambrosio, Jacques Thibaud, Pierre Lalo, etc.

His first engagement was as concertmaster and soloist under Pannequin. The following year he was engaged by [illegible] Ganne as soloist in [illegible]

From HERALD

Address: New York City

Date AUG 30 1918

MR. FRADKIN CONCERT MASTER OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Mass., Thursday.—The appointment of the American violinist, Fredric Fradkin, of Troy, N. Y., as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Anton Witek, was announced by the trustees of the organization to-day. Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885, and succeeds to a position that has been filled by some of the best known violinists of Europe.

Mr. Fradkin was born in Troy, N. Y., in 1892, and studied in Paris and Brussels. For three years he was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Conzert Verein, of Vienna. In 1915 he returned to this country to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

From TIMES

Address: New York City

Date AUG 30 1918

FREDRIC FRADKIN CHOSEN.

New Concert Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succeeds Witek.

BOSTON, Aug. 29.—The appointment of the American violinist, Fredric Fradkin of Troy, N. Y., as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Anton Witek, was announced by the trustees of the organization today.

Mr. Fradkin was born in Troy, N. Y., in 1892, and studied in Paris and Brussels. For three years he was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Conzert Verein of Vienna.

GLOBE SEPTEMBER 18,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENGAGES MONTEUX

He Will Conduct in Eight October Concerts

Pierre Monteux, distinguished French conductor, has been engaged by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct the three pairs of concerts to be given Oct 11-12, 18-19 and 25-26, as well as the concert in Cambridge Oct 17 and in Northampton Oct 23.

The engagement of Mr Monteux as the first French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company makes it impossible for him to remain longer in Boston, but the trustees expect to be able to announce the name of the conductor for the rest of the season within a few days.

PIERRE MONTEUX.

Subscribers to last year's concerts will be notified by mail that they may renew their subscriptions for the season of 1918-19, retaining the seats they had last year. This privilege will be open until Sept 26. After that date seats which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be sold to the general public. beginning Monday morning, Sept 30.

Pierre Monteux was born in Paris, April 4, 1875 and received his musical education at the Paris Conservatory, where he studied with Lavignas, Charles Lenepveu and Berhelier. Originally he planned to become a violinist, but soon conducting exerted its fascination, and he has devoted his life to it. Until 1911 he conducted the Concerts Colonne in Paris.

Later he was engaged as conductor of the Ballet Russe, making tours of all the capitals of Europe. Meanwhile, he gave a series of concerts in the Paris Casino, which he devoted to the ultra-modern works.

He has been with the Paris Opera and at the Theatre of the Champs Elysee, the Chatalet, the Odeon, Covent Garden and the Drury Lane Theatres, and opera houses in Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

Monteux has always had a preference for the modern composers. He was in charge of the first productions of the opera "Marouf" and the opera-ballet by Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Le Coq d'Or," given by the Metropolitan Opera Company, by which he was engaged in 1917.

Mr Monteux has appeared twice in Boston, once with the Ballet Russe when he conducted most of their performances and made a particularly deep impression with Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," and last year with the Metropolitan Opera Company. He is married to Germaine Benedictus and has been spending a quiet Summer with his wife near Stamford, Conn.

HERALD SEPTEMBER 18,

TO LEAD SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux, Who Will Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Through October. He Is First French Conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

MONTEUX TO LEAD SYMPHONY A MONTH

Metropolitan Conductor Engaged for Concerts in October

Pierre Monteux, who twice in the past three years has appeared in Boston, has been engaged by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra especially to conduct the three pairs of concerts to be given in October, that is on Oct. 11-12, 18-19, and 25-26, as well as two concerts in Cambridge and Northampton on Oct. 17 and 23 respectively. His engagement as first French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York precludes a longer stay in Boston. The trustees expect soon to be able to announce the name of the conductor for the remainder of the season.

Subscribers to last season's concerts have until Sept. 26 the privilege of renewing their subscriptions. The season sale to the general public opens at Symphony Hall Monday morning, Sept. 30.

M. Monteux, who is 43 years of age, received his musical education at the Paris Conservatoire and had his first experience as a conductor of important works with the Concerts Colonne, in Paris. Beginning in 1911 he made four European tours as conductor of the Ballet Russe, and it was with this organization that he made his American debut in the fall of 1916. When the Metropolitan Opera Company decided a year ago to devote greater attention to French operas, he was engaged as French conductor, two new works, the opera "Marouf" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera-ballet, "Le Coq d' Or," being entrusted to his direction. In Boston he will be recalled for his direction of the orchestra with the Ballet Russe in the season of 1916-17, and of the performances last year by the Metropolitan Opera Company of "Le Coq d' Or" and of "Samson and Delilah."

MONITOR, SEPTEMBER 18,

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Conductor

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been able to secure a conductor for one month in the person of Pierre Monteux, an assistant conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whom it was hoped to be able to secure for a year. It is understood that the management of the opera company felt that his services were indispensable there and so refused to release him from his contract. He will conduct, however, the three pairs of concerts in Boston, one in Cambridge and one in Northampton. By the end of October the trustees are hopeful of being able to announce the conductor for the rest of the year. The season will open on the afternoon of Friday, Oct. 11.

HERALD SEPTEMBER 19,

Monteux, Conductor

It is a pleasure to learn that Mr. Pierre Monteux will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the month of October. Trained in the most thorough and famous of music schools, the Paris Conservatory, an excellent musician, he has had wide experience and has won an international reputation as a conductor of opera, ballet and symphonic concerts. His leadership of opera and ballet has already been warmly praised in this city.

His engagement will put an end to the ungrounded, preposterous theory that only a German or an Austrian can successfully conduct Symphony concerts. It is eminently fitting that a Frenchman should begin the season with an orchestra that is now largely composed of French virtuosos. His present engagement at the Metropolitan Opera House will prevent his remaining here through the season, but he will have a brilliant successor.

There should be, there undoubtedly will be, lively and widespread interest in the approaching Symphony season. The board of trustees has been diligent in securing accomplished musicians to fill the places made vacant by popular demand and patriotic feeling. The trustees fully intend to maintain the standard that has made this orchestra famous throughout the world. The list of assisting soloists already engaged is of itself a strong attraction. For many years the orchestra has been the pride and the glory of this city. It should be the zealous care of Boston that this glory shall not fade.

RECORD, SEPTEMBER 18,

PIERRE MONTEUX WILL CONDUCT FALL CONCERTS

CONDUCTOR PIERRE MONTEUX

Pierre Monteux, French conductor, has been engaged by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct the three pairs of concerts to be given Oct. 11-12, 18-19 and 25-26, as well as the concert in Cambridge, Oct. 17, and in Northampton, Oct. 23.

The engagement of Conductor Monteux as tht first French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Co. makes it impossible for him to remain longer in Boston, but the trustees expect to be able to announce the name of the conductor for the rest of the season within a few days.

Pierre Monteux was born in Paris, April 4, 1875, and received his musical education at the Paris Conservatory, where he studied with Lavignas, Charles Lenepveu and Berhelier. Originally he planned to become a violinist, but soon conducting exerted its fascination, and he has devoted his life to it. Until 1911 he conducted the Concerts Colonne in Paris.

Later he was engaged as conductor of the Ballet Russe, making tours of all the capitals of Europe. Meanwhile, he gave a series of concerts in the Paris Casino, which he devoted to the ultra-modern works.

Monteux has appeared twice in Boston, once with the Ballet Russe when he conducted most of their performances and made a particularly deep impression with Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," and last year with the Metropolitan Opera Company. He is married to Germaine Benedictus and has been spending a quiet summer with his wife near Stamford, Conn.

POST, SEPTEMBER 18, 1918

MONTEUX SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Engaged for October —Name Permanent Head Later

"After a long delay," comes the announcement from Symphony Hall, "made inevitable by war conditions, the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce that the season of symphony concerts will begin Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12, and that Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, has been specially engaged to conduct the three pairs of concerts to be given in October, that is, on Oct. 11-12, 18-19 and 25-26, as well as the concert in Cambridge, Oct. 17, and in Northampton Oct. 23.

NAME CONDUCTOR SOON

"The engagement of Mr. Monteux as the first French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company precludes for him a longer stay in Boston, but the trustees expect shortly to be in a position to announce the name of the conductor for the remainder of the season.

"Immediately subscribers to last year's concerts will be notified by mail that they may renew their subscriptions for the season of 1918-19, retaining the seats they had last year. This privilege will be open to them up to and including Thursday, Sept. 26. Any seats which have not been taken by last year's subscribers by this date will be set aside for season sale to the general public. This sale will open at Symphony Hall Monday morning, Sept. 30."

With Ballet Russe

Mr. Monteux has appeared twice in Boston, in the season of 1916-17 with the Ballet Russe, when he conducted most of the performances and made a particularly deep impression with "Petrouchka" and last year, when as French conductor of the Metropolitan he conducted the performances of "Le Coq d'Or," "Samson and Delilah" and the "Dance in Place Congo."

He was born in Paris April 4, 1875. He received his musical education at the Paris Conservatoire. Originally he intended to become a violinist, and as such he made his public debut with a string quartet in Paris in 1894. Soon, however, conducting exerted its fascination, and he has devoted his life to that occupation.

With Concerts Colonne

His first experience as a conductor of important works was gained with the Concerts Colonne in Paris, with which he was connected until 1911. In that year he was engaged as conductor of the Ballet Russe, making all in all four tours with that organization throughout the capitals of Europe.

In the season of 1913-14 he was at the Paris Opera. He has also conducted at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the Chatelet and the Odeon, Covent Garden and Drury Lane in London, and in opera houses in Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

In Europe he conducted many of the most important premieres of modern works. He came to America in 1916 as conductor of the Russian Ballet, and was engaged by the Metropolitan opera company the following season.

GLOBE SEPTEMBER 18

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENGAGES MONTEUX

He Will Conduct in Eight October Concerts

Pierre Monteux, distinguished French conductor, has been engaged by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct the three pairs of concerts to be given Oct 11-12, 18-19 and 25-26, as well as the concert in Cambridge Oct 17 and in Northampton Oct 23.

The engagement of Mr Monteux as the first French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company makes it impossible for him to remain longer in Boston, but the trustees expect to be able to announce the name of the conductor for the rest of the season within a few days.

Subscribers to last year's concerts will be notified by mail that they may renew their subscriptions for the season of 1918-19, retaining the seats they had last year. This privilege will be open until Sept 26. After that date seats which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be sold to the general public. beginning Monday morning, Sept 30.

Pierre Monteux was born in Paris, April 4, 1875 and received his musical education at the Paris Conservatory, where he studied with Lavignas, Charles Lenepveu and Berhelier. Originally he planned to become a violinist, but soon conducting exerted its fasci-

RECORD, SEPTEMBER 19, TRANSCRIPT, SEPTEMBER 18,

ULTRA MODERN WORKS POPULAR WITH MONTEUX

Possible Programs for Symphony—Choice of Soloists

By J. V. CLARK

Hardly less interesting to the general run of Boston Symphony patrons than the announcement that Pierre Monteux is to conduct the orchestra for its first month this season is the announcement of soloists for the year. Theoretically soloists have little place in Symphony programs. Such concerts should be for the performance of orchestral works and soloists should be used only when imperatively needed. This is the theoretically position, but the man in the box office and the ordinary concert-goer say otherwise. They wish the soloists. Mr. Box Office Man sees the soloists drawing money. The concert-goers, who are first attending concerts for passing the time and secondly for purely aesthetic pleasure, want all the excitement of a noted soloist, one concerning whose salary speculation may run rife or whose affairs have perhaps been aired on the front page of a thousand newspapers.

On this year's list of soloists stand the names of newcomers—of artists who have not appeared recently, and in a few cases of artists who have had recent successes with the orchestra. Most interesting of the newcomers is Jascha Heifetz, the marvellous young violinist, who created a furore when he first played here last winter in recital. He has shared the honor of creating the great furore in the musical world of America in recent years only with Mme. Galli-Curci. Other violinists to appear at these concerts are Jacques Thibaud and Frederic Fradkin. Thibaud has never met with deserved recognition in Boston.

He is the violinist for the violinists. His sensitive exquisite playing has not appealed to the many as the playing of some other artists. Without question he is one of the artists engaged who most richly deserve the honor of playing at these concerts. Fradkin is the new concert maester. Custom and courtesy demands that he be invited to play as soloist. He is, of course, anxious to be heard under the best advantage and the concert's patrons are anxious to hear as soloist the man they will hear so frequently as concertmaster. Joseph Malkin, 'cellist of the orchestra, will appear as soloist at one set of concerts.

Pianists there are in quantity. Harold Bauer will return after a considerable absence at these concerts. Joseph Hofmann, another of the old pianistic guard—years before the public rather than longevity gave him his position in the "guard"—will again appear. Among the younger pianists of note in the concert world today two have been chosen as Symphony soloists, Mischa Levitzki and Arthur Rubenstein. Levitzki's engagement was due undoubtedly not only to his real merit, but to the flattering reception given to him by the musical reviewers when he played here in recital at Jordan Hall. Mr. Rubenstein may not be remembered by Boston music lovers. He first played here at the Colonial Theatre in March, 1906. He then attracted no especial attention. He has developed to great artistic stature and of late has been ranked as a real artist. Olga Samaroff will be the one woman pianist to appear. Mme. Samaroff has not been a frequent visitor of late, but those Bostonians who attended last year's Worcester festival know how wonderfully she is playing. The organ, seldom used as a solo instrument at these concerts, will be called into play when Joseph Bonnet, the French organist, appears.

Four vocalists will be heard, Florence Easton, Sophie Braslau, Mabel Garrison and Emilio de Gogorza. Mme. Easton came to the Metropolitan Opera after much success in opera in Europe. Her first New York season was a most satisfactory one. In Boston she has sung only once in recent years, in "L'Oracolo" with Caruso. That opera in no way tested her abilities, so that the Symphony appearances will really introduce her to present day Boston music-lovers. Miss Braslau, also of the Metropolitan, has been singing most successfully in Chicago this summer, only last week making a genuine success as "Carmen." She has a beautiful contralto voice. Miss Garrison sang with the Symphony recently. She is, perhaps, all things considered, the equal of, if not the best, of the native-born coloratura sopranos. Mr. de Gorgorga has long been admired here both for his beautiful baritone voice and for his finished style as a vocalist.

At the present time no list of the works to be performed at the concerts during the first month of the season, when Mr. Monteux conducts, to say nothing of [illegible] ts, is [illegible] ail-

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

AT LAST, WORD OF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mr. Monteux for Temporary Conductor Through Three Weeks of October—Past and Present of a Semi-Familiar Figure — A Promising List of "Assisting Artists"—Young Singers, Young Pianists, Mr. Hofmann, Mr. Thibaud, Mr. Heifetz—The Chicago Orchestra to Continue with Mr. Stock

FOR three weeks this autumn, as for six last spring, a temporary conductor is to lead the Symphony Orchestra. After a summer of diligent but much hindered negotiation, the trustees of the band are still unable to conclude arrangements with any leader able and willing to carry the concerts through the season at the established and expected standards. Before long, they hope to make such arrangements and announce the outcome. Meanwhile, the orchestra with full ranks awaits the call to rehearsals; the "assisting artists" are engaged and apportioned; the schedule of concerts at home and abroad, from October to May, is drawn, with beginning here in Boston little more than three weeks hence. In these circumstances, the only practicable course was the summoning of a temporary conductor. One such, fit for the post, was available—Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera House, of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet, of occasional symphony concerts in Paris and New York. Accordingly, he will lead in the concerts of Oct. 11 and 12, Oct. 18 and 19, Oct. 25 and 26 in Boston, and in one or two elsewhere. Thereafter, as his contract with the Metropolitan Opera House requires, he will return to work at that theatre.

As conductor, Mr. Monteux has been heard in Boston only in the opera house. His name was first mentioned here when in the spring of 1914, Mr. Henry Russell announced him as one of the conductors of the Boston Opera Company for the season of 1914-15. The war intervened; the Boston Opera Company ceased to be; and Mr. Monteux, actually made his first appearance in Boston in November of 1916 as conductor of the Russian Ballet. With it he led the orchestra in Stravinsky's "Pétrouchka," Balakirev's "Thamar," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and "Sadko," Schumann's transcribed "Carnaval," a pastiche from Chopin, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and various intermezzi between the ballets. When the week was done, the reviewer for The Transcript wrote of his work:

> At every performance, Mr. Monteux has shown himself an expert conductor with the peculiar requirements of the choreographic dance and the mimed drama—incessant heed of the stage as well as of the orchestra; exact and fluent mating of music, miming and motion even to minute shadings and suggestion; clearness of rhythm, colorful play of harmonies and timbres; whipping force upon the dancers, readiness to hide any chance slip. These things are the métier of a conductor for a ballet, and few such are readier and surer than he.
>
> Furthermore, Mr. Monteux has appreciable quality as a conductor of the symphonic music, French or Russian, that has beguiled the tedium of many an entr'acte. He heeds texture of tone, seeks euphony, shades color and pace, understands, feels and imparts such widely different music as Debussy's "Clouds" and fragments of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Golden Cockerel." The abilities of a conductor in general that make him a better conductor of ballet, and mimodrama in particular, stood clear in his version of "Petrouchka," far truer to the manifold graphic force, the rhythmic fire, the stark candor of Stravinsky's music than was his predecessor's way with it. At the other extreme, he phrased and colored Debussy's tone-poem of the faun with heightening fancy and finesse. He has bettered the transcribed Chopin and Schumann of this and that ballet, intensified the sensuous richness, the exotic tang of "Scheherazade" and "Thamar." He has a somewhat less expert and less numerous orchestra than journeyed with the Russian Ballet ten months ago. What has been taken away, he pours back—from himself.

Mr. Monteux returned to Boston last April as one of the conductors of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Here he led in performances of Saint-Saëns's opera, "Samson and Delilah," of Rimsky-Korsakov's mimed fantasy, "The Golden Cockerel" and of Mr. Gilbert's ballet, "The Dance in Place Congo." In New York, besides, he had been charged with the restudied and remounted "Faust," Rabaud's newly produced "Marouf," "Carmen" and other operas of the French repertory. With "Samson and Delilah," he seemed no more than a practised conductor of an able orchestra, extracting what he might and what routine bade from Saint-Saëns's dry music. On the other hand, under the stimulus of "The Golden Cockerel," he excelled himself in rhythmic elasticity and verve, manifold glow of harmonic and instrumental color, clear spinning of an intricate tonal web, sensuous suavities, sardonic force, the characterizing and fantastic strokes with which the opera-ballet teems. His "Faust," as New York heard it, was remarkable for felicities of detail, for lyric warmth, for freshening imagination, while in "Marouf," as in "The Golden Cockerel," he rarely missed the delineative point, the characterizing pith of the music. Obviously Mr. Monteux ripens.

As conductor of symphonic music in the concert-hall, Mr. Monteux is known both to Paris and to New York. In Paris through a winter or two, he led in the Concerts Monteux at the old Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons. Young men for the most part filled his orchestra; his audience was young as well; band, conductor, hearers were all ardent for French and Russian music of the newest and most intrepid sort. From both he made many a programme. It was he, for example and at these concerts, who first played Stravinsky's "Pétrouchka" and "The Rite of Spring" as symphonic pieces—an interesting experiment he might amusingly repeat in Boston; while side by side with Stravinsky on his lists stood Ravel, Roger-Ducasse and other Parisian composers of the new generation. The musically open-minded flocked to the Concerts Monteux; the musically hide-bound came away from them with teeth on edge. In contrast, the summer symphony concerts at which Mr. Monteux conducted in New York in 1917 were models of musical probity. French, German, Russian classics, occasional pieces from American pens, light numbers for their own sake, filled the programmes; performance was faithful and sometimes eloquent; average audiences departed well pleased. As conductor of six Symphony Concerts in Boston, Mr. Monteux will, doubtless, renew the qualities he has disclosed at his best in the theatre. Whether he will choose his pieces as he did in Paris or as he did in New York or, more probably, at the golden mean between, remains to be seen.

The Soloists Also

Simultaneously with this timely word about the conductorship, the management of the Symphony Concerts makes public the list of "assisting artists" for the new season. Beside the first violinist and the first violoncellist of the orchestra, who as usual will play their concertos, each at a pair of concerts, there will be twelve in all; while only one of them, as wisdom and good fortune have at last willed, is of the "old stand-bys" that used to return year after year. No less than seven of the twelve—Miss Easton and Mr. de Gogorza among the singers; Mr. Heifetz and Mr. Thibaud of the violinists; Mr. Levitzki and Mr. Arthur Rubinstein of the pianists; Mr. Bonnet, the organist—come for the first time to the Symphony Orchestra in its own hall; while of the other five, Miss Braslau the alto, has been heard with it only in a concert for the Pension Fund. She herself Miss Easton, Miss Garrison, Mr. Heifetz Mr. Levitzki, Mr. Rubinstein, are all of the youngest generation, in proved worth, of our concert-halls. Mr. Thibaud, Mr. de Gogorza, Mme. Samaroff well represent the middle generation. Only Mr. Bauer remains—deservedly—of the eldest. Mr. Hofmann, illustrious pianist in the prime of his powers, returns, the differences of the past laid aside and forgotten; Mr. Thibaud receives the call he has long deserved; Mr. Bonnet emerges from churches and charity-concerts into fitter surrounding for his qualities as musician and virtuoso; Mr. Heifetz is to be heard, at length, with orchestra; between Miss Braslau, Miss Garrison and Miss Easton, the "jeune troupe" of the Metropolitan Opera House has been searched well. Beyond doubting, new influences, new policies, a fine new day have come upon the Symphony Concerts.

Of these singers, Miss Garrison is the young soprano of light and shimmering voice, of no small skill in ornate song, of sprightly and ingratiating presence, who was first heard at the Symphony Concerts last autumn. Miss Braslau, remembered from the concert for the Pension Fund last spring, is the young alto of the Metropolitan Company who has risen in it by no other means than her richness and warmth of voice, her intelligence, feeling, application. Miss Easton is known to Bostonian ears only by a single appearance at the Opera House last spring in the Italian music-drama, "L'Oracolo." It was sufficient to prove the beauty of her transparent soprano voice, the sincerity and the artistry of her song, the pleasure of her presence. As for Mr. de Gogorza, audience upon audience, here and elsewhere, knows from many a recital the fine ardors of his imparting tones and passion. Seldom, too, do the Symphony Concerts summon a man-singer.

For the violinists, it will no longer be possible to ask why Mr. Thibaud, in the flower of mind, spirit and hand as musician and virtuoso, is not called to the Symphony Concerts or why Boston, alone of the "major cities" of music in America, does not hear Mr. Heifetz with orchestra. Twice and thrice in a season in recent years Mr. Thibaud's abilities and distinctions have spoken for themselves in Boston. They will not sound less when the Symphony Orchestra is background to them. The Heifetz, moreover, of a symphony concert is the Heifetz of many a recital—master of the tone of the violin, the more for the euphony he achieves with other instruments, a flawless medium for his chosen music. As he quickens many curiosities, so in less degree will Mr. Fradkin, when his opportunity comes, apart from his new work as concert-master, to prove his individual skill as violinist.

For the pianists, the long exiled Hofmann, the ripe and familiar Bauer need no hush. Long absences, needless estrangements have not lessened the numbers or the faith of the public that with more and more reason sets Mr. Hofmann high among the pianists of our time. If Mr. Bauer's qualities are now fixed, he seldom fails to find new and interesting means for fresh disclosure of them. Audiences that knew Mme. Samaroff in her younger days as pianist will welcome her anew. Mr. Levitzki is indeed still a youth, but a youth who has already proved himself the instinctive, the practiced, the curiously mature musician. A few years ago, a few audiences in various American cities heard Arthur Rubinstein, pianist, and noted his promise. Subsequent years in Europe, if half of current report run true, have brought fulfillment.

Forward and Back

The public of the Symphony Orchestra in Boston, in New York, in the cities that it regularly visits, will read these announcements gladly. Perhaps the trustees, new to a difficult task and pressed by many other obligations, under-estimated the time and the effort necessary to secure a conductor in these days of war. With the standards of the concerts what they are, with conductors worthy of them few and well employed, the search and the capture of a new leader have not, these many years, been easy. At the moment, war-time limitations of nationality, war-time obstacles to journeying and communication, have narrowed the field of choice and multiplied the intervals between proposal, answer, and all the steps of negotiation. The trustees deserve whatever time they may need to gain a conductor who will take the post for at least a season, who bids fair to win and hold the interest of the public.

On the other hand, the board is wise not to defer by a day the appointed beginning, the usual succession of the concerts. For months past, it has been common knowledge that it was reorganizing the orchestra, engaging "assisting artists," preparing the schedule for the new year. Yet rumor and gossip would not down that there would be no more Symphony Concerts in Boston; that all the glories and the pleasures of the orchestra were come to end. Now and then malevolence plainly prompted these surmises and prophecies; occasionally mere churlishness encouraged them; usually no more than the zest of the busybody in such knowing prediction spread them. Now, once and for all, they are scattered. The Symphony Orchestra, the Symphony Concerts continue and by every sign a sustaining public with them.

Chicago Continues

As coincidence had it, while the Boston Orchestra was making these announcements, the Chicago Orchestra, a thousand miles away, was also publishing its plans for the new season and similarly silencing careless gossip and ominous rumor. As heretofore, it will undertake the usual series of twenty-eight paired concerts, as catholic as ever of programme, as varied as ever in the "assisting artists." Mr. Stock, moreover, will remain the conductor of the Chicago Orchestra. By January or February, in the ordinary progress of legal process, he will become a full-fledged citizen of the United States. As an "enemy alien," present or past, there is not a valid reproach or even suspicion upon him either for word or deed. Rightly, the trustees are resolved to uphold him and every other member of the orchestra who is equally blameless. In turn, the public of the concerts upholds them.

H. T. P.

Once More a Frenchman Saves the Da

(Photograph by Mishkin of New York)

Pierre Monteux

Conductor for October at the Symphony Concerts

RECORD, SEPTEMBER 19,

VIOLIN GENIUS TO MAKE HIS DEBUT WITH SYMPHONY

JASCHA HEIFETZ

SUNDAY HERALD, SEPTEMBER 22,

SOME SYMPHONY SOLOISTS OF THE CO

Left to Right, Josef Hofmann, Florence Easton, Jascha Heifetz, Mme. Olga Samaroff, Mabel Garrison and Jose

With one of the most eminent of French conductors, Pierre Monteux, to take charge of the October concerts, with an orchestra strengthened in many departments by the engagement of new artists (for the most part American and French), and with a list of soloists which includes the best singers, violinists and pianists now in America, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 38th season with the concerts on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. The period of storm and stress through which the orchestra has gone because of conditions arising from the war may be said to have been safely passed. The board of trustees, headed by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who have succeeded Mr. Higginson in the control and maintenance of the orchestra, have solved successfully the many difficult problems before them. Mr. W. H. Brennan, for nine years the business manager of the orchestra, has succeeded Charles A. Ellis as manager. Within a few days the trustees expect to be in a position to announce the name of the conductor who will follow Mr. Monteux in November.

The orchestra will give its usual series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts. These will run from Oct. 11-12 to May 2-3. In that period of 30 weeks a total of something over 100 concerts will be given, for in addition to the 48 allotted to Boston there will be the usual series in Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, Hartford, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington; while in the late winter the annual western trip of one week will be made.

The subscribers to last year's concerts have already received notices regarding the renewal of their subscriptions for the season. Owing to war delays the time for the subscription sale is necessarily brief, but much can be accomplished in three weeks. Last year's subscribers have until next Thursday, Sept. 26th, inclusive, in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The general sale of subscription tickets will open at Symphony Hall on Monday, Sept. 30, and continue up to the time of the first concerts.

Since last spring the orchestra has undergone a considerable re-organization, but it promises to be stronger than ever. Fredric Fradkin will be concertmaster in place of Mr. Whitek. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band last spring made it possible to fill the vacancies in the wind sections with artists of tried value. Practically all of the new members of the orchestra are either French or American, and, incidentally, in the string sections there will be much young blood.

Especial care has been taken in the choice of artists who will appear in Boston as soloists. Here again, the war is showing its effect, for the field of choice is much narrower than in past years. Eleven artists have been engaged to appear in addition to those who come from the orchestra itself. Four of these are singers, two are violinists, four are pianists, and one an organist.

Three of the singers are women, drawn from the Metropolitan Opera Company. They are Mabel Garrison and Florence Easton, sopranos, and Sophie Braslau, contralto. Miss Garrison made her first appearance here with the orchestra last season. Madame Easton has never sung here in concert. She appeared once last spring in the season of the Metropolitan Opera Company, but she will be best remembered as the remarkable first soprano of the Savage Grand Opera Company a dozen years ago. For nine years, up to the fall of 1916, Madame Easton was a principal soprano, first of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and afterward of the Opera in Hamburg. She returned to this country to be a principal soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, and last year both i singer singing time, al favorite

Brasl

The tw
Jascha H
It is a cu is making orchestra

The list
Josef Hof
Bauer and the one str early part a recital to most be a strar Russian I years ago protege of was Barth
however, t months wi ere of the

SUNDAY ADVERTISER AMERICAN, SEPTEMBER 22,

Plans for New Symphony Season

WITH one of the most eminent of French conductors, Pierre Monteux, to take charge of the October concerts, with an orchestra strengthened in many departments by the engagement of new artists (for the most part American and French), and with a list of soloists which includes the cream of singers, violinists and pianists now in America, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its thirty-eighth season with the concerts on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12.

The orchestra will give its usual series of twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. There will be the usual series in Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, Hartford, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington; while in the late Winter the annual western trip will be made.

Last year's subscribers have until next Thursday, September 26, inclusive, in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The general sale of subscription tickets to the public will open at Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow morning, Monday, September 30, and continue up to the time of the first concerts. All seats which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will then be placed on sale.

Eleven artists have been engaged to appear in addition to those who come from the orchestra itself. Four of these are singers, two are violinists, four are pianists, and one is an organist. Three of the singers are women, drawn from the Metropolitan Opera Company. They are Mabel Garrison, Florence Easton, sopranos, and Sophie Braslau, contralto. The other singer will be Emilio de Gogorza. The two violinists from abroad are Jascha Heifetz and Jacques Thibaud. The list of pianists comprises the names of Josef Hofmann, Olga Samaroff, Harold Bauer and Arthur Rubinstein.

An engagement out of the common is that of Joseph Bonnet, the French organist, whose several appearances in Boston have demonstrated that as an artist he has most unusual qualities.

Naturally there will be uncommon interest in the appearance of Fredric Fradkin, the new concertmaster, and, as a matter of course, Mr. Noack, the second concertmaster, will appear as soloist, and also Mr. Malkin, the leading 'cellist.

STARS OF THE SYMPHONY SEASON

Mabel Garrison. ©by Mishkin N.Y.

Mme. Olga Samaroff. Joseph Bonnet Florence Easton.

GLOBE SEPTEMBER 30,

STILL NEGOTIATING FOR SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, issued yesterday the following statement concerning the conductorship of the orchestra for this season:

"It has already been announced that Pierre Monteux will direct the opening concerts of the year. At the time of this announcement it was expected that the name of the permanent conductor could soon be made public. Owing to the entirely abnormal condition of affairs throughout the world such an announcement is still impossible.

"On more than one occasion it has taken from four to six weeks to receive answers from cable messages to Europe; but it may be said that negotiations are in active progress looking toward the continuance of the orchestra in the coming and following seasons upon precisely the high level which it has maintained throughout its history. Just as soon as dates and names can be given with definiteness more will be said.

"There is every confidence on the part of the management of the orchestra that an announcement, to which music lovers will give a hearty welcome, will soon be given out."

GLOBE SEPTEMBER 24,

MONTEUX WON'T PLAY WAGNER OR R. STRAUSS

Disapproves of Music of Any Living German

Pierre Monteux was in Boston yesterday for the purpose of going through the library of the Symphony Orchestra, that he may prepare the program for the October concerts which he will conduct. He returned to New York last night, but will be in Boston again the first of the week to start rehearsals. It is his purpose to have two weeks' rehearsals precede the first pair of concerts on Oct 11-12.

Mr Monteux is a man of pleasing personality, in his mid-forties. He speaks excellent English. Incidentally, rehearsals will be conducted in the English language.

In common with most French musicians, he holds that Beethoven and the other great German and Austrian composers of the past are in no wise responsible for the war. He believes that the music of these masters has become the property of the world, and this music is a very integral and necessary part of the repertoire of musicians.

"I will not play Wagner," said Mr Monteux, "because of his attitude toward France in the War of '70-71. Moreover, looked at from another point of view, much of the best music that Wagner wrote—'The Ring' and 'Die Meistersinger'—is in glorification of German ideals as are found in the kultur of today.

"Generally speaking, I disapprove of the playing, in Allied countries, of the music of any living German composer, and I particularly and specifically object to the performance of any music of Richard Strauss during the war.

"I believe I was the first one in this country to refuse to play the music of Strauss. That was two years ago when I came to this country as conductor for the Ballet Russe.

"It was my fortune in May, 1914, to prepare for Strauss the production in Paris of his Ballet 'Joseph.' That was a little more than two months before the beginning of the war.

"Strauss' attitude toward France, French art, French music and French musicians was even then unbearable. He was arrogant and insulting, and, even without war, I was almost persuaded to give up playing his music; but, in view of what followed, Strauss became impossible for me.

"Nor was it only Richard Strauss. His wife was with him in Paris. I recall with a certain amount of amusement that when she came in to the Opera House for the rehearsal she looked around and said to me, 'M Monteux, this beautiful theatre may soon have an Emperor in it.'"

SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 22,

PLANS OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Usual Number of Concerts Will Be Given

New Conductor and Many Noted Soloists Promised

The prospectus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, will have charge of the first three pairs of concerts, and that the board of trustees expects shortly to tell the public what arrangements have been made for the remaining concerts of the series.

Boston will have its usual series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts. These will run from Oct 11-12 to May 2-3. In that period a total of something over 100 concerts will be given, for, in addition to the 48 allotted to Boston, there will be the usual series in Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, Hartford, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington; while in the late Winter the annual Western trip of one week will be made.

The subscribers to last year's concerts have already received notices regarding the renewal of their subscriptions for the season of 1918-19.

Owing to delays made inevitable by war conditions, the time for the subscription sale is necessarily brief, but much can be accomplished in three weeks.

Last year's subscribers have until next Thursday in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The general sale of subscription tickets to the public will open at Symphony Hall, Sept 30, and continue up to the time of the first concerts.

Many New Faces

Since last Spring the orchestra has undergone a considerable reorganization. There will be many new faces in the personnel, but it is the belief of the management that in making these changes no sacrifice has been involved. Already it has been announced that Frederic Fradkin will be concertmaster in place of Mr Witek. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band last Spring made it possible to fill the vacancies in the wind sections with artists of tried value. Practically all the new members of the orchestra are either French or American, and, incidentally, in the string sections there will be much young blood.

Eleven artists have been engaged to appear in addition to those who come from the orchestra itself. Four of these are singers, two are violinists, four are pianists and one an organist.

Three of the singers are women drawn from the Metropolitan Opera Company. They are Mabel Garrison and Florence Easton, sopranos, and Sophie Braslau, contralto. Miss Garrison made her first appearance here with the orchestra last season. Mme Easton appeared here once last Spring in the season of the Metropolitan Opera Company, but she will be best remembered as the very remarkable first soprano of the Savage Grand Opera Company a dozen years ago. For nine years, up to the Fall of 1916, Mme Easton was a principal soprano, first of the Royal Opera of Berlin and afterward of the Opera in Hamburg. Sophie Braslau, contralto, has appeared here both in opera and concert. The other singer will be Emilio de Gorgorza, who is singing with the Symphony for the first time.

Violinists of Fame

The two violinists from abroad are Jascha Heifetz and Jacques Thibaud. It is scarcely necessary to discuss these artists, so well known are they, unless it be to wonder at the curious fact that Mr Thibaud is making his first appearance with the orchestra in Boston.

The list of pianists is exceedingly interesting. It comprises the names of Josef Hofmann, Olga Samaroff, Harold Bauer and Arthur Rubinstein. Of these, the one stranger is Rubinstein. In the early part of 1906 Mr Rubinstein gave a recital in the Colonial Theatre, but to the vast majority of music lovers of this city he will be a stranger. He is a native of Lodz, Russian Poland, where he was born 31 years ago.

An engagement out of the common is that of Joseph Bonnet, the French organist. Bonnet undoubtedly stands in a class by himself, and, to say the least, is one of the greatest organists in the world. The organ in Symphony Hall is an admirable instrument, Mr Bonnet having said last year that he thought it was one of the most brilliant in this country.

Naturally there will be uncommon interest in the appearance of Mr Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and, as a mater of course, Mr Noack, the second concertmaster, will appear as soloist, and Mr Malkin, the leading 'cellist.

HERALD SEPTEMBER 24,

MONTEUX BARS WAGNER MUSIC

Strauss, Arrogant and Insolent, Also on His Blacklist

WILL, HOWEVER, GIVE GERMAN CLASSICS

"If I can help win the war by giving up sugar, I will give up sugar gladly. I will give up gasoline. I will go on short rations of bread. In fact, as a Frenchman, I will do anything to help win the struggle; and if anyone can convince me that the end will be brought nearer by giving up the classics of German music—Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms—I am willing to give them up. So far, however I cannot see how the silencing of the music of these masters can do the least to help win the war, and it is my purpose (as it is the purpose, I am sure, of all French conductors) to give the great classics due place on concert programs. Personally, I will not play Wagner, nor will I play the works of any living German or Austrian composer."

Such was the statement made yesterday by Pierre Monteux, who was in Boston for the day for the purpose of going through the library of the Symphony Orchestra that he may prepare the programs for the October concerts which he will conduct. Mr. Monteux returned to New York last night, but will be in Boston again the first of the week to start rehearsals, for it is his purpose to have two weeks' rehearsals precede the first pair of concerts on Oct. 11-12.

Rehearsals in English

Mr. Monteux is a man of very pleasing personality, in his mid-forties, and he speaks excelleent English. Incidentally, rehearsals will be conducted in the English language. In common with most French musicians, he holds that Beethoven and the other great German and Austrian composers of the past are in no wise responsible for the war. He even goes so far as to say that he is quite certain that Beethoven, who was at heart a republican, would have been against the war had he been living. He holds that the music of these masters has become the property of the world, and this music is a very integral and necessary part of the repertoire of musicians.

"I will not play Wagner," said Mr. Monteux, "because of his attitude toward France in the war of '70-'71. Moreover, looked at from another point of view, much of the best music that Wagner wrote—"The Ring" and "Die Meistersinger"—is in glorification of German ideals as are found in the Kultur of today. Generally speaking, I disapprove of the playing of the music of any living German composer in the allied countries, and I particularly specifically obj to the performance of any music of Richard Strauss during the war.

"I believe I was the first one in this country to refuse to play the music of Strauss. That was two years ago, when I came to this country as conductor for the Ballet Russe. Arriving in New York, they told me that my first work was to superintend and direct the first performance in this country of the ballet founded on "Till Eulenspiegel," whereupon I informed the management that I would take the next ship back to France.

Strauss Was Unbearable

"It was my fortune in May, 1914, to prepare for Strauss the production in Paris of his ballet "Joseph." This was a little more than two months before the beginning of the war. Strauss's attitude toward France, French art, French music and French musicians was even then unbearable. He was arrogant and insulting and, even without war, I was almost persuaded to give up playing his music; but in view of what followed, Strauss became impossible for me. Nor was it only Richard Strauss. His wife was with him in Paris. I recall with a certain amount of amusement that when she came into the Opera House for the rehearsal, she looked around and said to me: 'M. Monteux, this beautiful theatre may soon have an Emperor in it.'

"I have not fully decided on my programs as yet. Naturally, having only three programs to make, it is rather difficult, for there are so many things I wish to play. I look forward with anticipations of greatest pleasure to my brief stay in Boston at the head of the famous Symphony Orchestra."

POST, SEPTEMBER 24,

TO PLAY GERMAN CLASSICS

Monteux Says Symphony Bars Wagner and Strauss

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a Frenchman who is really anxious to do anything to win the war, declared yesterday that he will give the great classics of German music—Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms—due place in the concert programmes of the Symphony Orchestra, but that personally he will not play Wagner nor any of the works of any living German or Austrian composer.

GIVE GREAT CLASSICS

Like most French musicians, he contends that Beethoven and the other great German and Austrian composers of the past are in no wise responsible for the war. He even goes so far as to say that Beethoven, who was at heart a republican, would have been against the war had he been living. He argues that the music of these masters has become the property of the world and that this music is a very integral and necessary part of the repertoire of musicians.

"If I can help win the war by giving up sugar, I will give up sugar gladly; I will give up gasolene; I will go on short rations of bread; in fact, as a Frenchman, I will do anything to help win the struggle; and if anyone can convince me that the end will be brought nearer by giving up the great classics of German music, I am willing to give them up. So far, however, I cannot see how the silencing of the music of these masters can do the least to help win the war, and it is my purpose, as it is the purpose, I am sure, of all French conductors, to give the great classics due place on concert programmes.

Won't Play Wagner

"I will not play Wagner because of his attitude toward France in the war of 1870-'71. Moreover, looked at from another point of view, much of the best music that Wagner wrote, 'The Ring' and 'Die Meistersinger,' is in glorification of German ideals as are found in the kulture of today. Generally speaking, I disapprove of the playing of the music of any living German composer in the allied countries, and I particularly and specifically object to the performance of any music of Richard Strauss during the war.

"I believe I was the first one in this country to refuse to play the music of Strauss. That was two years ago, when I came to this country as conductor of the Ballet Russe. It was my fortune in May, 1914, to prepare for Strauss the production in Paris of his ballet, 'Joseph.' This was a little more than two months before the begining of the war. Strauss' attitude toward France, French art, French music and French musicians was even then unbearable. He was arrogant and insulting."

Mr. Monteux was in Boston for the purpose of going through the Symphony Orchestra library to prepare the programmes for the October concerts that he will conduct.

AMERICAN SEPTEMBER 21

FLORENCE EASTON, SOPRANO, BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST

SYMPHONY SOLOIST LIST

Although the conductor for the balance of the season hasn't yet been announced, the assurance that Pierre Monteux will lead the October concerts of the Symphony, and the knowledge that the strongest available list of soloists has been secured has already encouraged the old subscribers to rush for seats.

The general sale of subscription tickets will open Monday morning, September 30, at which time all subscription seats not renewed by old subscribers will be offered to the public.

In addition to Mr. Monteux as conductor the appearance of Fredric Fradkin in place of Anton Witek as concertmaster is interesting. Mr. Fradkin is an American with a wide experience as concertmaster in European orchestras.

The retirement of C. A. Ellis as manager has given well deserved promotion to Mr. W. H. Brennon, who for nine years past has been business manager. The first concert occurs October 11, and the season runs as usual into May. There will be the usual series of concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Washington, as well as in Cambridge, Hartford, Providence and Worcester.

The list of soloists includes Mabel Garrison, Florence Easton, Sophie Braslau, Emilio de Gogorza. The three women are Metropolitan artists of the first rank, all Americans.

The violinists are Jascha Heifetz, the sensation of the past season, and Jacques Tibeaud. The list of pianists includes Josef Hofmann, Olga Samaroff, Harold Bauer and Arthur Rubenstein. Joseph Bonnet, the celebrated French organist, will also figure as a soloist. The soloists from the ranks of the orchestra will be Fradkin, the concertmaster; Noack, the second concertmaster, and Malkin, the leading cellist.

RECORD, SEPTEMBER 24,

MONTEUX TO PLAY GERMAN CLASSICS AT THE SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first month of the season, announces that he will play the great classics of German music, Mozart, Haydn, Schumann, Schubert and Brahms, at the concerts. He says that he sees no harm from the performance of works of these musicians who belong to the whole world of art, but that he will not play the composition of Wagner or any living German.

His attitude toward Wagner is based on Wagner's attitude towards France in the war of 70-71 and in the glorification in the later Wagnerian music dramas of German ideals as found in the kultur of today. Monteux is particularly opposed to Richard Strauss, who, he says, even before the war maintained an arrogant and insulting attitude towards the French and French art.

To revert to the German classics, Monteux says he is ready to give even them up if he thought that by so doing he could help win the war, but he does not see how silencing the masters can help in the Liberty struggle.

AMERICAN SEPTEMBER 24,

MONTEUX BARS MUSIC BY WAGNER

During the month's regime of Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play no Wagnerian music, nor any work by a living German composer.

Mr. Monteux will not play Wagner because of his attitude towards France in 1870. "Moreover," says Mr. Monteux, "much of the best music he ever wrote, 'The Ring of the Nibelungen' and the 'Meistersingers' is in glorification of German ideals and is found in the Kultur of today. I also object to playing the music of Richard Strauss, on account of Strauss' attitude towards France, French art, French music and French musicians, and I include other living German composers for much the same reasons.

"If any one could convince me that the end of the war would be brought nearer by giving up the great classics of German music, Beethoven, Mozart, Hayden, Schumann, Schubert and Brahms, I would give them up, but I do not think so, and it is my purpose, as I am sure it is of all French conductors, to give these classics due place on concert programs."

Transcript Sept. 21

Back to the Public of Her Youth

(Photograph by Hamilton of New York)

Olga Samaroff

Pianist at the Symphony Concerts

TRANSCRIPT, SEPTEMBER 23,

(Copyright Photograph by George Grantham Bain)

Camille Chevillard

Reputed to Be the New Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra

A Notably Characteristic Picture in Bulk of Body, Stolidity of Face and Carelessness of Dress

TRAVELER, SEPTEMBER 21,

ANNOUNCE BOSTON SYMPHONY ARTISTS

After a long delay, due to the difficulty in settling the matter of the conductorship, the prospectus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season is out. As already announced in the newspapers, the first three pairs of concerts—those in October—will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor.

The board of trustees, which has succeeded Mr. Higginson in the management of the affairs of the orchestra, has given assurances that they will shortly be in a position to announce who the conductor will be for the remainder of the season.

The orchestra will give its usual series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts. These will run from Oct. 11-12 to May 2-3.

Since last spring the irchestra has undergone a considerable re-organization, and there will be many new faces in the personnel. Already it has been announced that Fredric Fradkin will be concertmaster in place of Mr. Witek.

Eleven artists have been engaged to appear in addition to those who come from the orchestra itself. Four of these are singers, two are violinists, four are pianists and one an organist. Three of the singers are women, drawn from the Metropolitan Opera Company; they are Mable Garrison and Florence Easton, sopranos, and Sophie Braslau, contralto.

The two violinists from abroad are Jascha Heifetz and Jacques Thibaud. The list of pianists comprises the names of Josef Hofmann, Olga Samaroff, Harold Bauer and Arthur Rubinstein.

An engagement out of the common is that of Joseph Bonnet, the French organist.

Naturally there will be uncommon interest in the appearance of Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and, as a matter of course, Mr. Noack, the second concertmaster, will appear as soloist, and Mr. Malkin, the

GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 29.

New Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning at 8:30. There are excellent seats to be had both for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

Naturally there is much interest in the new members of the orchestra. In the first violins there will be two new faces, Fredric Fradkin, who will be concert master, and Ferdinand Thillois.

Mr Thillois cam to Boston last Spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville in the Department of Arden, July 19, 1890. A graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, a pupil of Lefort, who also was Fradkin's teacher, he won the first prize for violin in 1913.

Called to duty at the war's outbreak, he fought through the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin-des-Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital, playing for his wounded comrades. Both his parents have been prisoners in Germany since 1914, and he does not know what has become of them.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section Georges Mager, who as a versatile member of the French band last Spring sang thrillingly Fevrier's "October." Mr. Mager was taken prisoner early in the war and was exchanged in July, 1915. He has since served in Serbia and Saloniki.

Mr Malkin becomes the head of the cello section, sharing the first desk with the veteran Alwin Schroeder, who needs no introduction in Boston. Georges Miquelle is a "First Prize" of the Paris Conservatoire, a veteran, and formerly one of the principal cellists in the Colonne Orchestra of Paris.

The Dutch cellist, Philip Abbas, is a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatory and a pupil of Mossel. At 17 he was solo cellist at Aix-la-Chapelle. He has been soloist with Sir Henry Wood of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London; from 1907 to 1911 he was first cellist of the Brighton Municipal Orchestra, England, and for three years first cellist of the orchestras at Nice, Aix-les-

The 86 members of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris sailed from France on a French battleship some time since. Andre Messager will conduct the concerts in this country. The orchestra will appear in 50 of the principal cities in the United States during its stay here of three months. The second concert of its tour willl be given in Boston, Oct 9, at Symphony Hall.

TRAVELER, SEPTEMBER 28.

NEW MEMBERS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Much curiosity has been shown on the part of the public as to the new members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last spring it was announced that five members of the French military band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputation will be found in the personnel. In the first violins there will be two new faces—Frederic Fradkin, who will be concertmaster, and Ferdinand Thillois, a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire and a pupil of Lefort.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be Mr. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post, and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band.

Mr. Malkin, of course, becomes the head of the cello section, and sharing the first desk with him will be Alwin Schroeder, who needs no introduction in Boston. An interesting member of the section will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing here made such a profound impression. Another newcomer is the Dutch cellist, Philipp Abbas, who is a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatory and a pupil of Mossel.

A new contra bass player is Agesilao Villano, an Italian, and a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma.

A new oboe player is Louis Speyer, also from the French Military Band, and an artist of most unusual gifts. The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Mimart, who was called to military duty in France last spring) and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Abdon Laus, the new first bassoon, is just 30 years old. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has played in the principal orchestras of Paris. The new first trombone is Mr. Sordillo of this city.

Many of these men have been invalided home from duty at the front.

RECORD, SEPTEMBER 21,

Chevillard, New Boston Conductor, Artist of Catholic Musical Taste

By J. V. CLARK

Camille Chevillard, conductor of the Lamoureaux concerts in Paris, will be the next regular conductor of the report of the engagement of Chevillard was annouced exclusively in this paper over a week ago. At the present time it has not been confirmed by the Symphony Hall management, but his friends in ths country have nio hesitency in stating that he will lead the Symphony's forces after the first month of the concert for which Pierre Moneaux of the French staff of the Metropolitan Opero Co. has been engaged. The post was offered to Monteau, but his contract with the Metropolitan prevented his accepting it. The only hitch apparently in the plan for Chevillard coming lies in the fact that the French Government may want to hold him for the Lamoureaux-Colonne concerts in which Paris takes such well justified pride. In case Chevillard cannot come to Boston the post will be offered to Henri Rabaud. Rabaud is the composer of "Marouf," the opera which hal a none too successful presentation at the Metropolitan Opera last winter, and which is now being sung in Buenos Ayres. One thing is certain—the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be a Frenchman. Musical gossip points out that George Barrare, the flautist and director of the Little Symphony, played the Boston offer first in Monteaux's hands and then in Chevillard's. It is even rumored that Barrere will transfer his reed organization to Boston where it will become the neculeus and strength of the Boston Symphony.

Chevillard and his wife are now persons of the greatest interest to Bostonians. American friends of the French conductor describe him as an idealist of the rugged, elemental, homeric type. Thereis nothing of the flaneur about him. His musical taste—Boston music lovers may rejoice at this—are catholic in the extreme. He looks more like a rugged deputy from Southern France than a Parisian. He is 55, and lives in his villa at Chatou, near St. Germaine, in the environs of France. His villa is called the "Villa Haendel"—certainly an indication of his catholicy of taste.

His wife is the daughter of the great Lamoureaux, founder of the Lamoureaux concerts. She is a linguiste and is well known in France through her translation of German songs, especially those of Schubert and Schumann. She speaks English fluently and has translated many French and German songs into English. With Monteux, or Chevillard or Raband, a true Frenchman will be the conductor of our Symphony.

TRANSCRIPT, SEPTEMBER 24,

USUALLY, Mr. Hofmann, the pianist, does not return to the concert-hall in the autumn. This year, however, he is resuming work at once and the good word comes that he will play at the second pair of Symphony Concerts on Oct. 18 and 19.

Mr. Monteux makes known that in his judgment, the music of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert and Brahms may be righteously included in the programmes of symphony concerts in the United States while it is at war with Germany. Unlike Sir Henry Wood and Mr. Toscanini, in whose place, in a way, he stands, he rejects the music of Wagner because the composer's silly little pamphlet about the Franco-Prussian war, "Die Kapitulation," offends him and because he detects present German ideals in "The Mastersingers" and "The Ring of the Nibelung." He also rejects in toto the music of Strauss with whom and with whose wife as the press-agent of Symphony Hall reports him, he has had disagreeable encounters. What is more to the point, Mr. Monteux is likely to make Franck's eloquent symphony the chief item in his first programme. From the days of Mr. Gericke to this present autumn, it has long deservedly been one of the chassics of

Transcript Sept. 21

Back to the Public of Her Youth

(Photograph by Hamilton of New York)

Olga Samaroff

Pianist at the Symphony Concerts

TRANSCRIPT, SEPTEMBER 23,

(Copyright Photograph by George Grantham Bain)

Camille Chevillard

Reputed to Be the New Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra

A Notably Characteristic Picture in Bulk of Body, Stolidity of Face and Carelessness of Dress

TRAVELER, SEPTEMBER 21,

ANNOUNCE BOSTON SYMPHONY ARTISTS

After a long delay, due to the difficulty in settling the matter of the conductorship, the prospectus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season is out. As already announced in the newspapers, the first three pairs of concerts—those in October—will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor.

The board of trustees, which has succeeded Mr. Higginson in the management of the affairs of the orchestra, has given assurances that they will shortly be in a position to announce who the conductor will be for the remainder of the season.

The orchestra will give its usual series of 21 Friday afternoon and 21 Saturday evening concerts. These will run from Oct. 11-12 to May 2-3.

Since last spring the orchestra has undergone a considerable re-organization, and there will be many new faces in the personnel. Already it has been announced that Fredric Fradkin will be concertmaster in place of Mr. Witek.

Eleven artists have been engaged to appear in addition to those who come from the orchestra itself. Four of these are singers, two are violinists, four are pianists and one an organist. Three of the singers are women, drawn from the Metropolitan Opera Company; they are Mabel Garrison and Florence Easton, sopranos, and Sophie Braslau, contralto.

The two violinists from abroad are Jascha Heifetz and Jacques Thibaud. The list of pianists comprises the names of Josef Hofmann, Olga Samaroff, Harold Bauer and Arthur Rubinstein.

An engagement out of the common is that of Joseph Bonnet, the French organist.

Naturally there will be uncommon interest in the appearance of Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and, as a matter of course, Mr. Noack, the second concertmaster, will appear as soloist, and Mr. Malkin, the

GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 29.

New Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning at 8:30. There are excellent seats to be had both for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

Naturally there is much interest in the new members of the orchestra. In the first violins there will be two new faces, Fredric Fradkin, who will be concert master, and Ferdinand Thillois.

Mr Thillois cam to Boston last Spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville in the Department of Arden, July 19, 1890. A graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, a pupil of Lefort, who also was Fradkin's teacher, he won the first prize for violin in 1913.

Called to duty at the war's outbreak, he fought through the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin-des-Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital, playing for his wounded comrades. Both his parents have been prisoners in Germany since 1914, and he does not know what has become of them.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section Georges Mager, who as a versatile member of the French band last Spring sang thrillingly Fevrier's "October." Mr. Mager was taken prisoner early in the war and was exchanged in July, 1915. He has since served in Serbia and Saloniki.

Mr Malkin becomes the head of the cello section, sharing the first desk with the veteran Alwin Schroeder, who needs no introduction in Boston. Georges Miquelle is a "First Prize" of the Paris Conservatoire, a veteran, and formerly one of the principal cellists in the Colonne Orchestra of Paris.

The Dutch cellist, Philip Abbas, is a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatory and a pupil of Mossel. At 17 he was solo cellist at Aix-la-Chapelle. He has been soloist with Sir Henry Wood of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London; from 1907 to 1911 he was first cellist of the Brighton Municipal Orchestra, England, and for three years first cellist of the orchestras at Nice, Aix-les-

The 86 members of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris sailed from France on a French battleship some time since. Andre Messager will conduct the concerts in this country. The orchestra will appear in 50 of the principal cities in the United States during its stay here of three months. The second concert of its tour will be given in Boston, Oct 9, at Symphony Hall.

TRAVELER, SEPTEMBER 28.

NEW MEMBERS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Much curiosity has been shown on the part of the public as to the new members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last spring it was announced that five members of the French military band had been engaged. Other notables of reputation will be found in the personnel. In the first violins there will be two new faces—Frederic Fradkin, who will be concertmaster, and Ferdinand Thillois, a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire and a pupil of Lefort.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be Mr. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post, and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band.

Mr. Malkin, of course, becomes the head of the cello section, and sharing the first desk with him will be Alwin Schroeder, who needs no introduction in Boston. An interesting member of the section will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing

RECORD, SEPTEMBER 21.

Chevillard, New Boston Conductor, Artist of Catholic Musical Taste

By J. V. CLARK

Camille Chevillard conducting of the Lamoureux concerts in Paris will be the regular conductor of the orchestra, it was announced exclusively in this paper over a week ago. As this season's work has not been confirmed by the Symphony Hall management, but his friends in this country have the history in stating that he will lead the Symphony forces after the departure of the concert party which Pierre Monteux of the French staff of the Metropolitan Opera Co. has been for years. The last was offered to Monteux, but his contract with the Metropolitan prevented his accepting it. The only latest information on the plan for Chevillard coming here is the fact that the French Government may agree to hold him for the Lamoureux-Colonne concerts in which Paris takes such well justified pride. In case Chevillard should come to Boston the best will be offered in the Russian Ballet in the opera of "Mireille," the opera which had such a successful presentation at the Metropolitan a few last winter, and which is now being sung in Buenos Aires. One of the first concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be a Frenchman. Musical gossip points out that Chevillard, the flautist and director of the Little Symphony, plays in the Boston offer first in Monteux's hands and then in Chevillard's. It is even rumored that Barrère will transfer his real organization to Boston where it will become the nucleus and strength of the Boston Symphony.

Chevillard and his wife are now persons of the greatest interest to Bostonians. American friends of the French conductor describe him as an embodiment of the rugged, elemental, homely type. There is nothing of the dandy about him. His musical taste Boston music lovers may rejoice at this are catholic in the extreme. He looks more like a rugged deputy from Southern France than a Parisian. He is 55, and lives in his villa at Chatou, near St. Germaine, in the environs of France. His villa is called the "Villa Hacienda" certainly an indication of his eclectic of taste.

His wife is the daughter of the great Jamie Lamoureux, founder of the Lamoureux concerts. She is a linguiste and is well known in France through her translation of German songs, especially those of Schubert and Schumann. She speaks English fluently and has translated many French and German songs into English. With Monteux, or Chevillard or Raband, a true Frenchman will be the conductor of our Symphony.

TRANSCRIPT, SEPTEMBER 24,

USUALLY, Mr. Hofmann, the pianist, does not return to the concert-hall in the autumn. This year, however, he is resuming work at once and the good word comes that he will play at the second pair of Symphony Concerts on Oct. 18 and 19.

Mr. Monteux makes known that in his judgment, the music of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert and Brahms may be righteously included in the programmes of symphony concerts in the United States while it is at war with Germany. Unlike Sir Henry Wood and Mr. Toscanini, in whose place, in a way, he stands, he rejects the music of Wagner because the composer's silly little pamphlet about the Franco-Prussian war, "Die Kapitulation," offends him and because he detects present German ideals in "The Mastersingers" and "The Ring of the Nibelung." He also rejects in toto the music of Strauss with whom and with whose wife as the press-agent of Symphony Hall reports him, he has had disagreeable encounters. What is more to the point, Mr. Monteux is likely to make Franck's eloquent symphony the chief item in his first programme. From the days of Mr. Gericke to this present autumn, it has long deservedly been one of the classics of

NSCRIPT, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1918

After Five Years of Exile

(From the drawing by Leopold Seyffert)

Josef Hofmann

Pianist at the Symphony Concerts

WHEN CONCERTS BEGIN

More Plans for the Symphony Orchestra—Mme. Galli-Curci's First Programme—Mr. Lazaro To Be Heard

FOR the present there is little to add to the announcements about the new season made by the management of the Symphony Concerts on Wednesday last. It was then made known that Mr. Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera House would lead the orchestra in three pairs of concerts in Boston in October; that, before long, a more permanent conductor would be engaged; and that the "assisting artists" for the autumn, winter and spring, comprised Mmes. Garrison, Easton and Braslau and Mr. de Gogorza for singers; Messrs. Helfetz and Thibaud for violinists; and Messrs. Hofmann, Bauer, Levitzki and Arthur Rubinstein and Mme. Samaroff for pianists. It further appeared that subscribers to the concerts of last season, either on Friday afternoons or Saturday evenings, may renew subscriptions through Sept. 26—Thursday of next week; and that on Monday, Sept. 30, tickets for the new season would be on sale at the box-office.

A new communiqué from Symphony Hall now reports the reorganization of the orchestra—that is to say the dismissal of all German and Austrian subjects not on their way to naturalization as citizens of the United States and the substitution for them and for a few drafted men of French or American citizens. Sundry players, however, have still to be added to the string choir, so that as yet it is impossible to print a roster of the reconstituted orchestra. As report goes, Frenchmen have filled most of the vacancies among the wind instruments and Americans most of those among the strings. Thus freed from the current restrictions upon the movements of German or Austrian subjects, the orchestra will return to the full schedule of concerts in cities other than Boston. It will make the five monthly journeys to Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and New York and resume or continue the usual concerts in the nearer cities of New England. It will also at midwinter make the annual visit to five or six cities of the nearer West. Here in Boston, of course, the twenty-four pairs of concerts will befall as of old—the first on Oct. 11 and 12 next; the last on May 1 and 2, 1919.

RECORD, SEPTEMBER 28,

NEW VIRTUOSI TO JOIN RANKS OF SYMPHONY

Men Have All Won Great Distinction in Many Musical Centres

By J. V. CLARK

When the audience faces the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first performance of the season it will find gone many of the old familiar faces and in their places the faces of newcomers recruited to fill the vacancies made from one cause or another. There is much curiosity in these newcomers—naturally, for by them the orchestra will in a large measure keep or lose its ancient prestige. It is hardly necessary to say that among the newcomers there are none of Teutonic origin.

Louis Speyer, oboe player, is possibly the most interesting of the new artists. He played here as soloist with the French Military Band which appeared at the Pops. He disclosed great virtuosity. Mr. Longy says he is the best oboeist the Paris Conservatory has produced in years. Two new clarinets are Leo Croes, succeeding Paul Minart, called to military duty in France, and Emile Stievenard, a new bass clarinet. Both of these men have seen war service. Abdon Laus will be the new bassoon. He is a Paris Conservatory prize man and has played much in Paris, both at the opera and at various concerts. Mr. Sordillo of this city will be the first new trombone.

As has already been stated in these columns, Frederic Fradkin will be the new concert master. Ferdinand Thillois, who came to Boston with the French band, will also be a new first violin. He has played in the Colonne and Lamoureaux orchestras. He has had much war service and has been in the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin des Dames. New second violins will be M. Barrier, who was engaged in Paris, and Georges Mager. Mr. Mager appeared as vocalist with the French band last spring.

In the 'cello section Mr. Malkin will be promoted to the first desk, and the veteran, Alwin Schroeder, will partner him. George Miquelle, also of the French band, will be added to the section. Agesilao Villano, an Italian, long connected with the Colon Theatre, Buenos Ayres, will be a new contra bass player.

The subscription sale of seats for the concerts will open at the Symphony Hall box office Monday morning. The renewal of old subscription, the management states, has been most satisfactory and it is believed that, despite many advantages under which the orchestra has labored since last

FRENCH BAND STAR ENGAGED TO PLAY WITH OUR SYMPHONY

LOUIS SPEYER

Mr. Speyer first played in this city as soloist with the French Military Band last spring. He proved himself a master of the instrument and was engaged by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play regularly with the orchestra during the coming season.

POST, OCTOBER 6,

Boston Symphony Concerts

The order of the authorities postponing for a week the opening of theatres, music halls and the like will necessarily mean the postponement for a week of the first pair of concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, which were scheduled to be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. Unless there is a further delay in opening places of amusement the first concerts will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 18, and Saturday evening, Oct. 19.

For the information of ticket holders, W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, announces that for the concerts on the 18th and 19th respectively the tickets intended for those days will be used. The whole season will be put back just one week. Originally the 24th pair of concerts was scheduled for Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3. Now they will come Friday and Saturday, May 9 and 10, and at this last pair of concerts (the 24th) the tickets intended for Oct. 11 and 12 will be used. In this way it is thought that confusion will be obviated.

The conductor situation has been greatly eased at Symphony Hall by the receipt of a telegram from Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera company, giving Mr. Monteux an extra week's leave of absence from that institution. This will enable Mr. Monteux not only to conduct the Boston concerts of Nov. 1 and 2, but to conduct all the concerts of the first Southern trip. Mr. Gatti-Casazza has gone to considerable trouble to rearrange rehearsals for the first week in November in order to let Mr. Monteux conduct the Symphony Orchestra in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

CONCERTS TO COME

The first Sunday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall will be given by Mischa Elman, the violinist, on Oct. 13, instead of by Galli-Curci and MacCormack, as originally planned.

HERALD, OCTOBER 6,

LAZARO COMING TO SYMPHONY HALL

The Spanish army lost a good soldier 10 years ago when Hipolito Lazaro was released in order to pursue his vocal studies in Barcelona. Spain was at war with Morocco when the young singer, then 20 years old, enlisted and went off to do his patriotic duty. Today Lazaro is known in half a dozen different countries as a rarely gifted tenor. The young artist made his first operatic appearance in this country at the Metropolitan Opera last winter and was heard in Boston with that organization last spring. His concert work is said to be as brilliant as his operatic.

Lazaro comes to Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Oct. 20th, for his first Boston concert. He will be assisted by Sascha Jacobsen, a young violinist, who is meeting with distinct success on the concert stage.

SUNDAY HERALD, OCTOBER 6,

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The order of the authorities, postponing for a week the opening of theatres, music halls and the like, will necessarily mean the postponement for a week of the first pair of concerts of the Symphony Orchestra which were scheduled to be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. Unless there is a further delay in opening places of amusement, the first concerts will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 18, and Saturday evening, Oct. 19.

For the information of ticket holders, W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, announces that for the concerts on the 18th and 19th, respectively, the tickets intended for those days will be used. The whole season will be put back just one week. Originally the twenty-fourth pair of concerts was scheduled for Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3. Now they will come Friday and Saturday, May 9 and 10, and at this last pair of concerts (the twenty-fourth) the tickets intended for Oct. 11 and 12 will be used.

It does not follow that Mr. Monteux will give his No. 1 program on the 18th and 19th, because there will be a soloist, Josef Hofmann. The plan is now, therefore, to open the season on the 18th and 19th with the program originally announced for that date. It is possible, however, that Mr. Monteux may change his plans in this respect.

The conductor situation has been greatly eased at Symphony Hall by the receipt of a telegram from Mr. Gatti-Casazza of the Metropolitan Opera Company giving Mr. Monteux an extra week's leave of absence. This will enable him not only to conduct the Boston concerts of Nov. 1 and 2, but to conduct all the concerts of the first southern trip. Mr. Gatti-Casazza has gone to considerable trouble to rearrange rehearsals for the first week in November in order to let Mr. Monteux conduct the Symphony orchestra in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

The subscription sale of season tickets continues at Symphony Hall, and will continue up to the delayed opening of the season. The sale has progressed admirably and the prospects of a successful season are very bright.

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 22, 1918

Allied Music to Dominate Symphony Under Monteux's Baton, Says Olin Downes

It is worthy of note that with the appointment of Pierre Monteux to conduct the opening symphony concerts of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is led by a French conductor for the first time in its history. This is an important innovation in more respects than one. Not only will Mr. Monteux appear as a leader of an American orchestra who is entirely in sympathy, as such an official should be, with America in this war, but he will also bring the French taste and French technique to bear on the interpretation of music which requires these qualifications of a conductor. It may be fairly anticipated that Mr. Monteux's programmes will contain very little German music. French and Russian compositions will therefore, in all probability, predominate. In both fields Mr. Monteux has long since proved that he excels.

Factors in some measure compensatory for this are that Germans, if not Austrians and certain German-Americans neither too discreet nor loyal in their attitude regarding this war, are out of the orchestra; that the personnel of that body has been considerably improved, particularly by the engagement of a number of players from the French Military Band, which performed here last spring, and that an unusually interesting list of soloists has been engaged.

Eleven artists will appear, in addition to those from the orchestra itself. Four of these are singers, two are violinists, four are pianists, and one an organist. Three of the singers are women, drawn from the Metropolitan Opera Company. They are Mabel Garrison and Florence Easton, sopranos, and Sophie Braslau, contralto.

Miss Garrison, it will be remembered, made her first appearance here with the orchestra last season. Madame Easton has never sung here in concert. She appeared once last spring in the season of the Metropolitan Opera Company, but she will be best remembered as the very remarkable first soprano of the Savage Grand Opera Company a dozen years ago. For nine years, up to the fall of 1916, Madam Easton was a principal soprano, first of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and afterward of the opera in Hamburg. She returned to this country to be a principal soprano of the Chicago Opera Company and last year she joined the Metropolitan. Sophie Braslau, contralto, has appeared here both in opera and concert. The other singer will be Emilio de Gozorza, who is singing with the Symphony for the first time, although for many years he has been a well-tried favorite here in Boston.

The two violinists from abroad are Jascha Heifetz and Jacques Thibaud. It is scarcely necessary to discuss these artists, so well known are they, unless it be to wonder at the curious fact that Mr. Thibaud is making his first appearance with the orchestra in Boston.

The list of pianists is exceedingly interesting. It comprises the names of Josef Hofmann, Olga Samaroff, Harold Bauer and Arthur Rubinstein. Of these the one stranger is Rubinstein. In the early part of 1906 Mr. Rubinstein gave a recital in the Colonial Theatre, but to the vast majority of music lovers of this city he will be a stranger. He is a native of Lodz, Russian Poland, where he was born 31 years ago. In childhood he was a protege of Joachim, and his first master was Barth. He did his principal study, however, under d'Albert and spent some months with Leschetitzky. Accounts have it that he is one of the great pianists of the world.

The return of Josef Hofmann will be warmly welcomed, for Hofmann stands today in the very front rank of pianists and bids fair to inherit much of that popularity which was Paderewski's. It is also many years since Madame Samaroff appeared here in Boston. In a certain sense she is a Boston product in that it was here that she had her first success in America, and until her marriage she regarded it almost as a home. Harold Bauer, who last appeared with the orchestra three years ago, is always welcome.

An engagement out of the common is that of Joseph Bonnet, the French organist. His several appearances in Boston have shown that as an artist he has most unusual qualities. The organ in Symphony Hall is an admirable instrument, Mr. Bonnet having said last year that he thought it was one of the most brilliant in this country.

There will be interest in the appearance of Mr. Fradkin, the new concert master of the orchestra. Mr. Noack, the second concert master, will appear in due course as soloist; also Mr. Malkin, the leading cellist.

The orchestra will give its usual series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts. These will run from Oct. 11-12 to May 2-3. In that period of 30 weeks a total of something over 100 concerts will be given, for in addition to the 48 allotted to Boston there will be the usual series in Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, Hartford, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, while in the late winter the annual Western trip of one week will be made.

Within a few days the trustees expect to be in a position to announce the name of the conductor who will follow Mr. Morteux in November. In the meantime Boston patrons of the orchestra may rest assured of three unusually interesting programmes under Mr. Monteux. This distinguished conductor is greatly interested in the work and has already signified his intention of giving at the opening concert as the principal number Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor.

The subscribers to last year's concerts have already received notices regarding the renewal of their subscriptions for the season of 1918-19. Owing to delays made inevitable by war conditions, the time for the subscription sale to the concerts is necessarily brief, but much can be accomplished in three weeks. Last year's subscribers have until next Thursday, Sept. 26, inclusive, in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The general sale of subscription tickets to the public will open at Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow morning, Monday, Sept. 30, and continue up to the time of the first concerts. All seats which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will then be placed on sale.

Mabel Garrison.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist.

Florence Easton.

Mischa Levitzka. Joseph Bonnet.

Josef Hofmann. Jacques Thibaud.
(C. Bushnell, Seattle.

Sophie Braslau.

From _____

Address _____

Da

Est

Career of Boston Symphony's New Leader.

Frederick Fradkin, the young American violinist whose appointment to succeed Anton Witek as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been recently announced, is the youngest man to hold this post since the appointment of Franz Kneisel in 1885. Mr. Fradkin's first teachers were Henry Schradieck, for many years associated with the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute, and Max Bendix. Later he studied in Paris, where at the age of fifteen he entered the Conservatoire in 1907, receiving two years later the first prize in violin as well as the gift of a fine instrument from the French Government. Mr. Fradkin appeared in this country in 1911 as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and after a period of professional engagements in Europe, returned to America in 1915 as concertmaster of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe. His artistic achievements promise a continuance of the high standard set by the former concertmasters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MONITOR,
SEPTEMBER 30,

MUSIC

New Boston Orchestra Players

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—Despite the many disadvantages under which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has labored since last spring, the coming season promises to be successful. There will be noticed many new faces in the orchestra, a large number of these being French musicians of extended reputation. There is first the new concertmaster, Fredric Fradkin, as well as Ferdinand Thillois, a French violinist, and Paris Conservatory graduate, with a severe yet varied war experience. Several Americans will be new members of the second violin section. M. Barrier will be the leader of the viola section. He comes from Paris especially to fill this position. Another new viola player is Georges Mager, who came to America last season with the French band.

Among the 'cellists, Mr. Malkin will lead this section with Alwin Schroeder, a former member and general favorite sharing the first desk with Mr. Malkin. Georges Miquelle is a new member of the 'cello section, also Philipp Abbas, a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatory.

Agesilao Villano, an Italian virtuoso of distinguished reputation, will be a new member of the double bass section. He has played for many seasons at the Colon Theater in Buenos Aires.

Among the new wood-wind players are Louis Speyer, oboist, an artist of unusual gifts, prize winner at the Paris Conservatory, Leo Croës, clarinet, Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet, and Abdon Laus, first bassoon, all with a Parisian reputation. A new first trombone will be Mr. Sordillo, of Boston.

The trustees of the orchestra announce that they cannot yet make a statement regarding a permanent conductor. Pierre Monteux has been engaged to conduct through October, but all negotiations looking to the engagement of a man to fill out the rest of the season have so far come to naught.

AMERICAN,
ADVERTISER
SEPTEMBER 29,

New Artists in Symphony Ranks

THE subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning. The renewal of subscriptions justifies the belief of the trustees that the season will be one of great prosperity. Excellent seats are to be had both for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

Much curiosity has been shown on the part of the public as to the new members of the orchestra. Last Spring it was announced that five members of the French Military Band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputation will be found in the personnel. In the first violins there will be two newcomers—Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster, and Ferdinand Thillois. Mr. Thillois came to Boston last Spring with the French band. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, winning first prize for violin in 1913. He has been a member of both the Colonne and Lamoureux Orchestras. He fought through the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin des Dames.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band.

Mr. Malkin becomes the head of the 'cello section and, sharing the first desk with him, will be the veteran, Alwin Schroeder. An interesting member of the section will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing here made such a profound impression. He is a first prize winner of the Paris Conservatoire and has been one of the principal 'cellists in the Colonne Orchestra of Paris. Another newcomer is the Dutch 'cellist, Philipp Abbas, who is a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatoire and a pupil of Mossel.

Allied Music to Dominate Symphony Under Monteux's Baton, Says Olin Downes

It is worthy of note that with the appointment of Pierre Monteux to conduct the opening symphony concerts of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is led by a French conductor for the first time in its history. This is an important innovation in more respects than one. Not only will Mr. Monteux appear as a leader of an American orchestra who is entirely in sympathy, as such an official should be, with America in this war, but he will also bring the French taste and French technique to bear on the interpretation of music which requires these qualifications of a conductor. It may be fairly anticipated that Mr. Monteux's programmes will contain very little German music. French and Russian compositions will therefore, in all probability, predominate. In both fields Mr. Monteux has long since proved that he excels.

Factors in some measure compensatory for this are that Germans, if not Austrians and certain German-Americans neither too discreet nor loyal in their attitude regarding this war, are out of the orchestra; that the personnel of that body has been considerably improved, particularly by the engagement of a number of players from the French Military Band, which performed here last spring, and that an unusually interesting list of soloists has been engaged.

Eleven artists will appear, in addition to those from the orchestra itself. Four of these are singers, two are violinists, four are pianists, and one an organist. Three of the singers are women, drawn from the Metropolitan Opera Company. They are Mabel Garrison and Florence Easton, sopranos, and Sophie Braslau, contralto.

Miss Garrison, it will be remembered, made her first appearance here with the orchestra last season. Madame Easton has never sung here in concert. She appeared once last spring in the season of the Metropolitan Opera Company, but she will be best remembered as the very remarkable first soprano of the Savage Grand Opera Company a dozen years ago. For nine years, up to the fall of 1916, Madam Easton was a principal soprano, first of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and afterward of the opera in Hamburg. She returned to this country to be a principal soprano of the Chicago Opera Company and last year she joined the Metropolitan. Sophie Braslau, contralto, has appeared here both in opera and concert. The other singer will be Emilio de Gozorza, who is singing with the Symphony for the first time, although for many years he has been a well-tried favorite here in Boston.

The two violinists from abroad are Mascha Heifetz and Jacques Thibaud. It is scarcely necessary to discuss these artists, so well known are they, unless it be to wonder at the curious fact that Mr. Thibaud is making his first appearance with the orchestra in Boston.

The list of pianists is exceedingly interesting. It comprises the names of Josef Hofmann, Olga Samaroff, Harold Bauer and Arthur Rubinstein. Of these the one stranger is Rubinstein. In the early part of 1906 Mr. Rubinstein gave a recital in the Colonial Theatre, but to the vast majority of music lovers of this city he will be a stranger. He is a native of Lodz, Russian Poland, where he was born 31 years ago. In childhood he was a protege of Joachim, and his first master was Barth. He did his principal study, however, under d'Albert and spent some months with Leschetitzky. Accounts have it that he is one of the great pianists of the world.

The return of Josef Hofmann will be warmly welcomed, for Hofmann stands today in the very front rank of pianists and bids fair to inherit much of that popularity which was Paderewski's. It is also many years since Madame Samaroff appeared here in Boston. In a certain sense she is a Boston product in that it was here that she had her first success in America, and until her marriage she regarded it almost as a home. Harold Bauer, who last appeared with the orchestra three years ago, is always welcome.

An engagement out of the common is that of Joseph Bonnet, the French organist. His several appearances in Boston have shown that as an artist he has most unusual qualities. The organ in Symphony Hall is an admirable instrument, Mr. Bonnet having said last year that he thought it was one of the most brilliant in this country.

There will be interest in the appearance of Mr. Fradkin, the new concert master of the orchestra. Mr. Noack, the second concert master, will appear in due course as soloist; also Mr. Malkin, the leading cellist.

The orchestra will give its usual series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts. These will run from Oct. 11-12 to May 2-3. In that period of 30 weeks a total of something over 100 concerts will be given, for in addition to the 48 allotted to Boston there will be the usual series in Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, Hartford, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, while in the late winter the annual Western trip of one week will be made.

Within a few days the trustees expect to be in a position to announce the name of the conductor who will follow Mr. Monteux in November. In the meantime Boston patrons of the orchestra may rest assured of three unusually interesting programmes under Mr. Monteux. This distinguished conductor is greatly interested in the work and has already signified his intention of giving at the opening concert as the principal number Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor.

The subscribers to last year's concerts have already received notices regarding the renewal of their subscriptions for the season of 1918-19. Owing to delays made inevitable by war conditions, the time for the subscription sale to the concerts is necessarily brief, but much can be accomplished in three weeks. Last year's subscribers have until next Thursday, Sept. 26, inclusive, in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The general sale of subscription tickets to the public will open at Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow morning, Monday, Sept. 30, and continue up to the time of the first concerts. All seats which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will then be placed on sale.

Mabel Garrison.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist.

Florence Easton.

Mischa Levitzka. Joseph Bonnet.

Josef Hofmann. Jacques Thibaud.

Sophie Braslau.

From _____

Address _____

Da

Career of Boston Symphony's New Leader.

Frederick Fradkin, the young American violinist whose appointment to succeed Anton Witek as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been recently announced, is the youngest man to hold this post since the appointment of Franz Kneisel in 1885. Mr. Fradkin's first teachers were Henry Schradieck, for many years associated with the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute, and Max Bendix. Later he studied in Paris, where at the age of fifteen he entered the Conservatoire in 1907, receiving two years later the first prize in violin as well as the gift of a fine instrument from the French Government. Mr. Fradkin appeared in this country in 1911 as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and after a period of professional engagements in Europe, returned to America in 1915 as concertmaster of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe. His artistic achievements promise a continuance of the high standard set by the former concertmasters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Est

MONITOR,
SEPTEMBER 30,

MUSIC

New Boston Orchestra Players

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—Despite the many disadvantages under which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has labored since last spring, the coming season promises to be successful. There will be noticed many new faces in the orchestra, a large number of these being French musicians of extended reputation. There is first the new concertmaster, Fredric Fradkin, as well as Ferdinand Thillois, a French violinist, and Paris Conservatory graduate, with a severe yet varied war experience. Several Americans will be new members of the second violin section. M. Barrier will be the leader of the viola section. He comes from Paris especially to fill this position. Another new viola player is Georges Mager, who came to America last season with the French band.

Among the 'cellists, Mr. Malkin will lead this section with Alwin Schroeder, a former member and general favorite sharing the first desk with Mr. Malkin. Georges Miquelle is a new member of the 'cello section, also Philipp Abbas, a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatory.

Agesilao Villano, an Italian virtuoso of distinguished reputation, will be a new member of the double bass section. He has played for many seasons at the Colon Theater in Buenos Aires.

Among the new wood-wind players are Louis Speyer, oboist, an artist of unusual gifts, prize winner at the Paris Conservatory, Leo Croës, clarinet, Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet, and Abdon Laus, first bassoon, all with a Parisian reputation. A new first trombone will be Mr. Sordillo, of Boston.

The trustees of the orchestra announce that they cannot yet make a statement regarding a permanent conductor. Pierre Monteux has been engaged to conduct through October, but all negotiations looking to the engagement of a man to fill out the rest of the season have so far come to naught.

AMERICAN,
ADVERTISER
SEPTEMBER 29,

New Artists in Symphony Ranks

THE subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning. The renewal of subscriptions justifies the belief of the trustees that the season will be one of great prosperity. Excellent seats are to be had both for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

Much curiosity has been shown on the part of the public as to the new members of the orchestra. Last Spring it was announced that five members of the French Military Band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputation will be found in the personnel. In the first violins there will be two newcomers—Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster, and Ferdinand Thillois. Mr. Thillois came to Boston last Spring with the French band. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, winning first prize for violin in 1913. He has been a member of both the Colonne and Lamoureux Orchestras. He fought through the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin des Dames.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band.

Mr. Malkin becomes the head of the 'cello section and, sharing the first desk with him, will be the veteran, Alwin Schroeder. An interesting member of the section will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing here made such a profound impression. He is a first prize winner of the Paris Conservatoire and has been one of the principal 'cellists in the Colonne Orchestra of Paris. Another newcomer is the Dutch 'cellist, Philipp Abbas, who is a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatoire and a pupil of Mossel.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

SUNDAY HERALD SEPTEMBER 29.

NEW MEMBERS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Left to Right, F. Thillois, Violin; G. Mi quelle, 'Cello; A. Laus, Bassoon; L. Croes, Clarinet; P. Abbas, 'Cello.

The subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning, Sept. 30, at 8:30. The renewal of subscriptions justifies the belief of the trustees that the season will be one of great prosperity. There are excellent seats to be had both for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

Fradkin and Thillois

Last spring it was announced that five members of the French military band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputations will be found in the personnel.

In the first violins there will be two new faces—Frederic Fradkin, who will be concertmaster, and Ferdinand Thillois.

Mr. Thillois, who came to Boston last spring with the French band, was born at Charleville, July 19, 1890. A graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, he won the first prize for violin in 1913. He was a member of both the Colonne and Lamoureux orchestras. Called to duty in the 91st infantry he fought through the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin-des-Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital, playing for his wounded comrades. Both his parents have been prisoners in Germany since 1914, and he does not know what has become of them.

Some New "Strings"

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band. Mr. Mager, when the French band appeared at the Pop concerts last spring, sang a solo. A versatile musician, in addition to being a gifted viola player, he is one of the best trombone players in France. He was taken prisoner early in the war and was exchanged in July, 1915. He has since served in Serbia and Salonica.

Mr. Malkin becomes the head of the 'cello section, and sharing the first desk with him, will be Alwin Schroeder. An interesting member of the section will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing here made a profound impression. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, a veteran, and has been one of the principal 'cellists in the Colonne orchestra of Paris. Another newcomer is the Dutch 'cellist, Philipp Abbas, a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatoire. When he was 17 he was solo 'cellist of the orchestra at Aix-la-Chapelle. He has been soloist with Wood of the Queen's Hall orchestra, London; from 1907 to 1911 of the Brighton municipal orchestra, England, and for three years of the orchestras at Nice, Aix-les-Bains and Biarritz. He has also traveled in France with Vincent d'Indy. In 1916-17 he was at the desk of the first 'cellist of the Philadelphia orchestra.

Other New Players

A new double-bass player is Agesilao Villano, a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma. He began his career in the Scala Orchestra, whose director then was Faccio. He went to South America and for the last 15 years has been principal double-bass in the Colon Theatre of Buenos Ayres. In the winters he returned to Europe and played in France, England, Italy and Germany, under the direction of Mascagni, Martucci, Mancinelli, Toscanini, Campanini, Serafin, Saint-Saens, Rabaud, Messager, Leroux and others. In Italy he has also played under distinguished guest conductors.

A new oboe player is Louis Speyer, also from the French Military Band, and an artist of most unusual gifts. He was a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire in 1911.

The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Minart, who was called to military duty in France last spring), and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Mr. Croes served in the 8th regiment of territorial infantry and was severely wounded at the battle of the Yser in November, 1914. A first prize of the Conservatoire of Lille, he has played at the Monteux concerts and at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris. Mr. Stievenard has been a professor at D'Indy's Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureux concerts and the Opera-Comiques. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Abdor Laus, the new first bassoon, is 30 years old. A first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, he has played in the principal orchestras of Paris and has given four years to the Grand Opera.

The new first trombone is Mr. Sordillo of this city.

Louis Speyer, Oboe.

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 23 1918

The Huns That Hail From Poland

Established:

By ABRAHAM CAPLAN.

IT is pretty definitely understood that a Hun does not necessarily have to be a denizen of Hunland proper; that he may thrive in places where the Hun species is thought to be absent.

I want to say just a few words about the situation in Poland with respect to the attitude of the Polish people toward the unhappy Jews whose miserable lot it is to live in Poland or in Galicia, that part of the Austrian Empire which the Polish nationalists rightly demand returned to their hoped-for Polish republic, if a republic it is in truth to be.

Information has been coming to the Jews of America that the Poles are harassing the Jews in a subtle and insidious manner with a view of putting an end to the remnant of the Polish Jewish community.

It would seem that the oppressor, wherever he may be, would profit by the withering lesson that is being taught the arch-oppressor of humanity—Prussia. The Hun is now begging for mercy so that he may have a measurable lease on life as an agent of oppression, without which he is never sated. But the Allies are adamant. They are determined that the Hun species must be rooted out of existence.

Is Poland one of the Allies in respect to the desire to destroy bigotry and the subjection of small nations. I am afraid I cannot say that it is. I fear that Poland is playing a sinister double role. While it is appealing to the liberal world for material and moral support, it is at the same time employing the cultural and economic thumbscrew upon the Jews.

One of the conditions for which America and its allies are fighting is a free Poland. I wonder if America and the Allies assent to Poland doing with its Jews as it pleases.

Poland is doing to the Jews what the Germans did to the Poles in East Prussia, but it is doing it with an avowed self-righteousness that is damnable. The Jew without a certificate that he has been baptized can hold no position of trust in Galicia, which enjoys autonomous government and in which the Poles are the controlling political factor. The economic boycott of the Polish Jews of a few years ago is now succeeded by an infamous attempt to overwhelm them with Polish culture. It is such a Hunnish cry, this cry of culture, Kultur.

A carefully edited Jewish journal in this country reports that Paderewski, the spokesman of the Poles in America, has been trying to persuade officials in Washington that the Jews of Poland ought to be disarmed. I am sure that American officialdom repudiates the innuendo that even that gifted man is endeavoring to spread. In what respect is he different from another gifted musician, Karl Muck? You would have to draw a very fine line. Muck would diffuse and render supreme the Kultur that would overwhelm the world with the consummate evils of Prussianism. Paderewski is an open advocate of that Kultur of the Poles that would do to the Jews of Poland what Prussian Kultur would do to the world as a whole.

The Poles ought to recognize that the Allies are just as strong for the liberty of the Jews, those of Poland included, as for the redemption of Poland. If Poland would share the fate of Prussianism, it may pursue its present policy toward the Jews. If not, let it beware.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date 1918

Established:

Music.

Monteux Bans Some German Music for the War.

Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, has stated his position on the subject of what, if any, German music may be played here during the war, a subject that is being discussed with particular insistence now that the symphony orchestras are gathering for their new seasons. Mr. Monteux speaks on the subject with an authority that comes not only from his rank as a musician, but from his service in the trenches as a soldier of France during the first two years of the war. He made his confession of faith to the Boston Herald the other day, being on a visit to Boston preparatory to taking up the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the month of October. The Herald article follows in part:

"If I can help win the war by giving up sugar, I will give up sugar gladly. I will give up gasoline. I will go on short rations of bread. In fact, as a Frenchman, I will do anything to help win the struggle, and if any one can convince me that the end will be brought nearer by giving up the classics of German music—Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms—I am willing to give them up. So far, however, I cannot see how the silencing of the music of these masters can do the least to help win the war, and it is my purpose (as it is the purpose, I am sure, of all French conductors) to give the great classics due place on concert programmes. Personally, I will not play Wagner, nor will I play the works of any living German or Austrian composer."

Such was the statement made yesterday by Pierre Monteux, who was in Boston for the day for the purpose of going through the library of the Symphony Orchestra that he may prepare the programmes for the October concerts which he will conduct.

In common with most French musicians, he holds that Beethoven and the other great German and Austrian composers of the past are in no wise responsible for the war. He even goes so far as to say that he is quite certain that Beethoven, who was at heart a republican, would have been against the war had he been living. He holds that the music of these masters has become the property of the world, and this music is a very integral and necessary part of the repertoire of musicians.

"I will not play Wagner," said Mr. Monteux, "because of his attitude toward France in the war of '70-71. Moreover, looked at from another point of view, much of the best music that Wagner wrote—'The Ring' and 'Die Meistersinger'—is in glorification of German ideals as are found in the kultur of to-day. Generally speaking, I disapprove of the playing of the music of any living German composer in the allied countries, and I particularly specificially object to the performance of any music of Richard Strauss during the war.

"I believe I was the first one in this country to refuse to play the music of Strauss. That was two years ago, when I came to this country as conductor for the Ballet Russe. Arriving in New York, they told me that my first work was to superintend and direct the first performance in this country of the ballet founded on 'Till Eulenspiegel,' whereupon I informed the management that I would take the next ship back to France.

"It was my fortune in May, 1914, to prepare for Strauss the production in Paris of his ballet 'Joseph.' This was a little more than two months before the beginning of the war. Strauss's attitude toward France, French art, French music, and French musicians was even then unbearable. He was arrogant and insulting and, even without war, I was almost persuaded to give up playing his music; but, in view of what followed, Strauss became impossible for me. Nor was it only Richard Strauss. His wife was with him in Paris. I recall with a certain amount of amusement that, when she came into the Opera House for the rehearsal, she looked around and said to me: 'M. Monteux, this beautiful theatre may soon have an emperor in it.'"

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date SEP

Established:

Keith Vaudeville Opens Sept. 16

The regular fall and winter season of Keith vaudeville opens a week from to-morrow, Monday, September 16th, two weeks later than usual, in order that the Albee Stock Company season might be prolonged. Thousands of vaudeville devotees here are anticipating the return of their favorite amusement and from indications the season will be an unusually interesting and enjoyable one. Only a few months of the season will be played in the present Keith Theatre, for very soon the new million dollar Keith Theatre will be ready for occupancy, after vexatious unavoidable delays.

Manager Lovenberg the other day spoke very enthusiastically about the season's outlook. "We had been fearful that the draft would so influence affairs that we would find a scarcity of good entertainers," said Mr. Lovenberg, "but to our surprise and pleasure we found that there is an abundance of them. The unusual conditions seem to have made all the actors and actresses work particularly hard to find good acts and the extra effort seems to have borne fruit, for I cannot remember a season that has brought forth so many promising novelties as are on the vaudeville market to-day. And, for some reason, many actors who never before try vaudeville, are deserting the musical comedy and dramatic field to go into vaudeville. It is certainly a gratifying condition—and a most unexpected one—for vaudeville managers.

"Another very pleasing feature noticeable this new season is the unusual demand by the public for vaudeville. Vaudeville, better than any other form of amusement, really entertains. It may offer sugar coated education and thrills, but primarily it is for entertainment purposes—and the people of to-day want to be, in fact must be entertained. We are told that our boys in France enjoy the most the vaudeville entertainments sent them, and those people who are bearing the burden of carrying on here at home seem to feel the same way. It is shown by the exceptionally fine business done by the vaudeville theatres from one end of the country to the other. I look for one of the best seasons—in many ways—that we have had in years."

The season of vaudeville at the local Keith Theatre will begin with a monster bill of hits, including several very interesting novelties and every act but one new to the theatre. Heading the bill is "The Best Sellers," the very funny travesty which was one of the gems of the Actors' and Authors' Theatre of New York last winter and which has been secured for vaudeville by Hemine Shone and her company. Another novelty of the opening program will be Mme. Burnell, "A Current of Fun," who demonstrates the possibilities of electricity in a way that creates gales of laughter.

Private Louis Hart, of the British Army, on furlough, will offer an elaborate athletic novelty, "In a Dream," and Bessie Browning, the singing comedienne, whose partner, Jack Denny has gone to war, is now appearing alone in exclusive character songs in which she is said to be making a tremendous hit. Miss Juliette, the gifted mimic, will present a "One Girl Revue" and Green and Parker, in "At the Depot;" Edith and Eddie Adair, in a merry skit depecting the troubles of a shoe store clerk, called "At the Boot Store;" Tilu and Ward, "Two Happy Rubes," last season one of the hits of Anna Held's "Follow Me;" Evelyn and Dolly, petite and versatile entertainers; new comedy and scenic motion pictures and the Keith Concert Orchestra under the direction of Robert Gray, will be other features of the big bill.

Other interesting bookings for the local Keith Theatre include "The Decorators," an elaborately staged and uproarously funny travesty, with a big company of funmakers; "Nowadays," a timely singing comedy, depicting in humorous fashion the part women play in business to-day; William Ebbs, a ventriloquist with a new idea; Ames and Winthrop, the musical comedy favorites, in "A Thumbnail Revue;" "The Maid of France," an inspiring patriotic playlet; the Four Harmony Kings, a quartette of negro singers with unusually fine voices; "Hands across the Sea," a pretentious singing and dancing revue, produced by Charles Lovenberg with the Lovenberg sisters and Simon Neary and a company of 15; Tarzan the Ape, in a new really wonderful demonstration of intelligence and training; Nan Halperin, the little Queen of Song, in a new song Revue, with social scenery; "Somewhere With Pershing," a thrilling war playlet; Bessie Clayton, the celebrated dancer, and her big company; Frances Kennedy, "The Cheer Up Comedienne," who was one of last season's biggest hits; Van and Schenck, the singing comedians, late of the Century Theatre and other New York musical shows; Chilson Orhman, the distinguished concert soprano; Harry Hines, "The 58th Variety;" Charles Grapewin and Company in a new act; Ann Gray, the singer and harpist; Ralph Smalley, formerly cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Santos and Hayes, the Fat Girl and the Skinny One, last season's biggest laughing hit; Rae Elinore Ball and her brother Joseph and many others.

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date AUG 30 1918

Establis

FRADKIN CONCERT MASTER

American Violinist Appointed to Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Aug. 29.—The appointment of the American violinist, Fredric Fradkin, of Troy, N. Y., as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Anton Witek, was announced by the trustees of the organization today. Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885 and succeeds to a position that has been filled by some of the best-known violinists of Europe.

Mr. Fradkin was born in Troy, N. Y., in 1892 and studied in Paris and Brussels. For three years he was concertmaster and soloist of the Weiner Concert Verein, of Vienna. In 1915 he returned to this country to be concertmaster and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

From EVENING GLOBE

Address: New York City

Date 26 1918

THE BOSTON LEADER.

In engaging Pierre Monteux to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the month of October the management of America's premier orchestra has officially indicated its independence of the enslaving and ridiculous idea that only a German or an Austrian is capable of successfully conducting symphony concerts. Mr. Monteux has, of course, conducted such concerts with distinguished success both in Paris and in New York, besides proving his ability as a leader of opera and of ballet. His training at the Paris Conservatory and his experience as a viola player in orchestra and in chamber music organizations speak for the thoroughness of his musicianship. Altogether Mr. Monteux is a conductor eminently worthy of the honor that has come his way. The Boston Symphony Orchestra need only regret that a contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company makes it impossible for Mr. Monteux to remain its leader throughout the season.

Whoever immediately succeeds Mr. Monteux when his October engagement is at an end, it seems certain that the next permanent conductor of the orchestra will also be a man chosen from among our allies and artistically altogether up to the requirements of the position. The most credible report has it that the great Toscanini will return to America a year hence to this appropriate field for the display of his extraordinary abilities. There are also persistent rumors that Camille Chevillard will come hither from Paris, whether to fill the gap between the going of Mr. Monteux and the coming of Mr. Toscanini or as permanent conductor is not disclosed. Mr. Chevillard, who succeeded Lamoureux as conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra of Paris, is, like Messrs. Monteux and Toscanini, a leader of sound training, long experience, and recognized ability. In any case it is clear that a suitable man will guide the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and contribute at the same time to the further liberation of America from its former humiliating position as a musical vassal of Germany.

From HERALD

Address: New York City

Date SEP 1 9 1918

MR. MONTEUX TO CONDUCT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Mass., Wednesday.—Pierre Monteux, leading French conductor for the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York, has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct eight concerts in October. Announcement of a conductor for the remainder of the season is expected within a few days.

Mr. Monteux's services were obtainable only by consent of the Metropolitan Opera Company, which was given readily.

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City.

Date SEP 1 9 1918

TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Mass., Sept 18.

PIERRE MONTEUX, who is to serve as first French conductor for the Metropolitan Opera Company during the coming season, has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct eight concerts during the month of October. Announcement of a conductor for the remainder of the season is expected within a few days.

From HERALD

Address: New York City

SEP 1 1918

D

AT 26 HE'S CONCERT MASTER OF THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Appointment of Frederick Fradkin to be concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at twenty-six years of age, announced from Boston on Thursday, aroused much interest in musical circles. The young American violinist who succeeds Anton Witek is a native of Troy, N. Y., where he was born in 1892. His first teachers were Henry Schradieck and Max Bendix. From 1905 to 1907 he studied in Paris under Remy and Joseph White, and in the latter year he entered the Conservatoire in the violin class of Professor Lefore. He received the first prize in violin in 1909 and also the present of a fine instrument given by the French government.

Directly he left the Conservatoire he was engaged as concert master and soloist by Pennequin. In the following year Louis Ganne took him to Monte Carlo as soloist, where he attained success. Leaving Monte Carlo, he went to Brussels to work with Eugen Ysaye, and in January, 1911, he made his début in this country as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Society under Gustave Mahler. Since then he has played in London, and for three years was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Concert Verein in Vienna. He returned to this country in 1915 to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post of concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885.

From TIMES

Address: New York City

Date

YOUNGEST SINCE KNEISEL.

Boston Symphony Trustees Choose Fradkin in Witek's Place.

By action of the new Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced recently, the young American violinist, Frederick Fradkin, is to succeed Anton Witek as concertmaster of that brilliant organization. Fradkin is a native of Troy, N. Y., where he was born in 1892, and he will be the youngest man to hold the post of concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since a famous youth who was appointed in 1885, and whose name was Franz Kneisel.

Mr. Fradkin's first teachers were Max Bendix and the late Henry Schradieck. From 1905 to 1907 he studied in Paris under Remy and Joseph White, and entered the Conservatoire in the violin class of Professor Lefore. He received the first prize in violin in 1909 and also the present of a fine instrument given by the French Government. Directly he left the Conservatoire he was engaged as concertmaster and soloist by Pennequin.

In the following year Louis Ganne took him as soloist to Monte Carlo. Then he went to Brussels with Ysaye, and in January, 1911, made his début in New York as soloist with the Philharmonic Society under Gustave Mahler. He played in London, and for three years was concertmaster of the Wiener Concert Verein of Vienna. Since the war, Fradkin returned to this country in 1915 with the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

From REPUBLICAN

Address Springfield, Mass.

Date

ENCH, CONDUCTOR ENGAGED

Pierre Monteux to Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra at October Concerts, Including That in Northampton

Pierre Monteux, a distinguished French conductor, has been engaged by the trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra to conduct the three pairs of concerts to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, October 11 and 12, 18 and 19, 25 and 26, as well as the concert in Cambridge October 17 and in Northampton October 23. The engagement of Mr Monteux as the first French conductor of the Metropolitan opera company makes it impossible for him to remain longer in Boston, but the trustees expect to be able to announce soon the name of conductor for the rest of the season.

Pierre Monteux was born in Paris, April 4, 1875, and received his musical education at the Paris conservatory. He has conducted the Concerts Colonne in Paris. Later he was engaged as conductor of the Ballet Russe, making tours of all the capitals of Europe. Monteux has always had a preference for the modern composers.

The soloists for the year will be Harold Bauer, Joseph Bonnet, Sophie Braslau, Florence Easton, Fredric Fradkin, Mabel Garrison, Emilio De Gogorza, Jascha Heifetz, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Levitzki, Josef Malkin, Arthur Rubinstein, Olga Samaroff and Jacques Tribaud.

AMERICAN SEPTEMBER 28,

NEW PLAYERS IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

The subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall next Monday morning, September 30, at 8:30.

Much curiosity has been shown on the part of the public as to the new members of the orchestra. Last Spring it was announced that five members of the French Military Band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputation will be found in the personnel. In the first violins there will be two faces—Fredric Fradkin, who will be concertmaster, and Ferdinand Thillois. Mr. Thillois came to Boston last Spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville in the Department of Arden, July 19, 1890. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, a pupil of Lefort, who also was Fradkin's teacher, and he won the first prize for violin in 1913.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French Band. It will be remembered that Mr. Mager, when the French Band appeared at the Pop Concert last Spring, sang a solo.

Mr. Malkin, of course, becomes the head of the 'cello section, and sharing the first desk with him will be the veteran, Alwin Schroeder, who needs no introduction in Boston. An interesting member of the section will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French Band, whose playing here made such a profound impression. He is a first-prize winner of the Paris Conservatorie, a veteran, and has been one of the principal 'cellists in the Colonne Orchestra of Paris.

A new contra-bass player is Agesilao Villano, who has had a most distinguished career. Mr. Villano, an Italian, is a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma and began his career in the Scala Orchestra, whose director was then Faccio. He went to South America and played in Brazil, Uruguay and Chile, and for the last fifteen years has been principal contra-bass in the Colon Theatre of Buenos Aires.

A new oboe player is Louis Speyer, also from the French Military Band, and an artists of most unusual gifts. He was a first-prize winner at the Paris Conservatoire in 1911, and, Mr. Longy says, the most promising oboe player the Conservatoire has produced in many years.

The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Mimart, who was called to military duty in France last Spring) and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Mr. Croes served in the Eighth Regiment of Territorial Infantry and was severely wounded at the battle of the Yser in November, 1914. He is a first prize of the Conservatoire of Lille and has played at the Monteux Concerts and at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris. Mr. Stievenard has been a professor at Vincent d'Indy Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureux Concerts and l'Opera Comique. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

From REPUBLICAN

Address

Date

Much is made of the fact that the new concertmaster of the Boston symphony orchestra is a native-born American. Mr Fradkin is native-born, but he is not an American "of the old stock." Indeed, he belongs to those newer races which, unless the processes of the melting pot be unfavorable to talent, must in the long run increase considerably the number of America's musicians. Mr Fradkin is of Russian parentage. Though only 26 years old, he has won fame on both sides of the Atlantic. His training, it may be noted, is predominantly French. For, while as a young boy he studied under able teachers in the United States, from his 13th year on he was chiefly under the instruction of French masters, though he also studied with Ysaye, who is a Belgian. The management of the Boston symphony orchestra has apparently got a prize, and if the new conductor proves to be of equal distinction, the reorganized Boston symphony orchestra should start its first season with the promise of being worthy of its predecessor.

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date SEP

Established:

Keith Vaudeville Opens Sept. 16

The regular fall and winter season of Keith vaudeville opens a week from to-morrow, Monday, September 16th, two weeks later than usual, in order that the Albee Stock Company season might be prolonged. Thousands of vaudeville devotees here are anticipating the return of their favorite amusement and from indications the season will be an unusually interesting and enjoyable one. Only a few months of the season will be played in the present Keith Theatre, for very soon the new million dollar Keith Theatre will be ready for occupancy, after vexatious unavoidable delays.

Manager Lovenberg the other day spoke very enthusiastically about the season's outlook. "We had been fearful that the draft would so influence affairs that we would find a scarcity of good entertainers," said Mr. Lovenberg, "but to our surprise and pleasure we found that there is an abundance of them. The unusual conditions seem to have made all the actors and actresses work particularly hard to find good acts and the extra effort seems to have borne fruit, for I cannot remember a season that has brought forth so many promising novelties as are on the vaudeville market to-day. And, for some reason, many actors who never before tried vaudeville, are deserting the musical comedy and dramatic field to go into vaudeville. It is certainly a gratifying condition—and a most unexpected one—for vaudeville managers.

"Another very pleasing feature noticeable this new season is the unusual demand by the public for vaudeville. Vaudeville, better than any other form of amusement, really entertains. It may offer sugar coated education and thrills, but primarily it is for entertainment purposes—and the people of to-day want to be, in fact must be entertained. We are told that our boys in France enjoy the most the vaudeville entertainments sent them, and those people who are bearing the burden of carrying on here at home seem to feel the same way. It is shown by the exceptionally fine business done by the vaudeville theatres from one end of the country to the other. I look for one of the best seasons—in many ways—that we have had in years."

The season of vaudeville at the local Keith Theatre will begin with a monster bill of hits, including several very interesting novelties and every act but one new to the theatre. Heading the bill is "The Best Sellers," the very funny travesty which was one of the gems of the Actors' and Authors' Theatre of New York last winter and which has been secured for vaudeville by Hemine Shone and her company. Another novelty of the opening program will be Mme. Burnell, "A Current of Fun," who demonstrates the possibilities of electricity in a way that creates gales of laughter.

Private Louis Hart, of the British Army, on furlough, will offer an elaborate athletic novelty, "In a Dream," and Bessie Browning, the singing comedienne, whose partner, Jack Denny has gone to war, is now appearing alone in exclusive character songs in which she is said to be making a tremendous hit. Miss Juliette, the gifted mimic, will present a "One Girl Revue" and Green and Parker, in "At the Depot;" Edith and Eddie Adair, in a merry skit depecting the troubles of a shoe store clerk, called "At the Boot Store;" Tilu and Ward, "Two Happy Rubes," last season one of the hits of Anna Held's "Follow Me;" Evelyn and Dolly, petite and versatile entertainers; new comedy and scenic motion pictures and the Keith Concert Orchestra under the direction of Robert Gray, will be other features of the big bill.

Other interesting bookings for the local Keith Theatre include "The Decorators," an elaborately staged and uproarously funny travesty, with a big company of funmakers; "Nowadays," a timely singing comedy, depicting in humorous fashion the part women play in business to-day; William Ebbs, a ventriloquist with a new idea; Ames and Winthrop, the musical comedy favorites, in "A Thumbnail Revue;" "The Maid of France," an inspiring patriotic playlet; the Four Harmony Kings, a quartette of negro singers with unusually fine voices; "Hands across the Sea," a pretentious singing and dancing revue, produced by Charles Lovenberg with the Lovenberg sisters and Simon Neary and a company of 15; Tarzan the Ape, in a new really wonderful demonstration of intelligence and training; Nan Halperin, the little Queen of Song, in a new song Revue, with social scenery; "Somewhere With Pershing," a thrilling war playlet; Bessie Clayton, the celebrated dancer, and her big company; Frances Kennedy, "The Cheer Up Comedienne," who was one of last season's biggest hits; Van and Schenck, the singing comedians, late of the Century Theatre and other New York musical shows; Chilson Ohrman, the distinguished concert soprano; Harry Hines, "The 58th Variety;" Charles Grapewin and Company in a new act; Ann Gray, the singer and harpist; Ralph Smalley, formerly cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Santos and Hayes, the Fat Girl and the Skinny One, last season's biggest laughing hit; Rae Elinore Ball and her brother Joseph and many others.

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date AUG 30 1918

Establis

FRADKIN CONCERT MASTER

American Violinist Appointed to Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Aug. 29.—The appointment of the American violinist, Fredric Fradkin, of Troy, N. Y., as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Anton Witek, was announced by the trustees of the organization today. Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885 and succeeds to a position that has been filled by some of the best-known violinists of Europe.

Mr. Fradkin was born in Troy, N. Y., in 1892 and studied in Paris and Brussels. For three years he was concertmaster and soloist of the Weiner Concertzert Verein, of Vienna. In 1915 he returned to this country to be concertmaster and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

From EVENING GLOBE

Address: New York City

Date 26 1918

THE BOSTON LEADER.

In engaging Pierre Monteux to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the month of October the management of America's premier orchestra has officially indicated its independence of the enslaving and ridiculous idea that only a German or an Austrian is capable of successfully conducting symphony concerts. Mr. Monteux has, of course, conducted such concerts with distinguished success both in Paris and in New York, besides proving his ability as a leader of opera and of ballet. His training at the Paris Conservatory and his experience as a viola player in orchestra and in chamber music organizations speak for the thoroughness of his musicianship. Altogether Mr. Monteux is a conductor eminently worthy of the honor that has come his way. The Boston Symphony Orchestra need only regret that a contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company makes it impossible for Mr. Monteux to remain its leader throughout the season.

Whoever immediately succeeds Mr. Monteux when his October engagement is at an end, it seems certain that the next permanent conductor of the orchestra will also be a man chosen from among our allies and artistically altogether up to the requirements of the position. The most credible report has it that the great Toscanini will return to America a year hence to this appropriate field for the display of his extraordinary abilities. There are also persistent rumors that Camille Chevillard will come hither from Paris, whether to fill the gap between the going of Mr. Monteux and the coming of Mr. Toscanini or as permanent conductor is not disclosed. Mr. Chevillard, who succeeded Lamoureux as conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra of Paris, is, like Messrs. Monteux and Toscanini, a leader of sound training, long experience, and recognized ability. In any case it is clear that a suitable man will guide the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and contribute at the same time to the further liberation of America from its former humiliating position as a musical vassal of Germany.

From HERALD

Address: New York City

Date SEP 1 9 1918

MR. MONTEUX TO CONDUCT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Mass., Wednesday.—Pierre Monteux, leading French conductor for the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York, has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct eight concerts in October. Announcement of a conductor for the remainder of the season is expected within a few days.

Mr. Monteux's services were obtainable only by consent of the Metropolitan Opera Company, which was given readily.

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City.

Date SEP 1 9 1918

TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Mass., Sept 18.

PIERRE MONTEUX, who is to serve as first French conductor for the Metropolitan Opera Company during the coming season, has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct eight concerts during the month of October. Announcement of a conductor for the remainder of the season is expected within a few days.

From HERALD

Address: New York City

SEP 1 1918

D

AT 26 HE'S CONCERT MASTER OF THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Appointment of Frederick Fradkin to be concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at twenty-six years of age, announced from Boston on Thursday, aroused much interest in musical circles. The young American violinist who succeeds Anton Witek is a native of Troy, N. Y., where he was born in 1892. His first teachers were Henry Schradieck and Max Bendix. From 1905 to 1907 he studied in Paris under Remy and Joseph White, and in the latter year he entered the Conservatoire in the violin class of Professor Lefore. He received the first prize in violin in 1909 and also the present of a fine instrument given by the French government.

Directly he left the Conservatoire he was engaged as concert master and soloist by Pennequin. In the following year Louis Ganne took him to Monte Carlo as soloist, where he attained success. Leaving Monte Carlo, he went to Brussels to work with Eugen Ysaye, and in January, 1911, he made his début in this country as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Society under Gustave Mahler. Since then he has played in London, and for three years was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Concert Verein in Vienna. He returned to this country in 1915 to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post of concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885.

TIMES

New York City

YOUNGEST SINCE KNEISEL.

Boston Symphony Trustees Choose Fradkin in Witek's Place.

By action of the new Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced recently, the young American violinist, Frederick Fradkin, is to succeed Anton Witek as concertmaster of that brilliant organization. Fradkin is a native of Troy, N. Y., where he was born in 1892, and he will be the youngest man to hold the post of concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since a famous youth who was appointed in 1885, and whose name was Franz Kneisel.

Mr. Fradkin's first teachers were Max Bendix and the late Henry Schradieck. From 1905 to 1907 he studied in Paris under Remy and Joseph White, and entered the Conservatoire in the violin class of Professor Lefore. He received the first prize in violin in 1909 and also the present of a fine instrument given by the French Government. Directly he left the Conservatoire he was engaged as concertmaster and soloist by Pennequin.

In the following year Louis Ganne took him as soloist to Monte Carlo. Then he went to Brussels with Ysaye, and in January, 1911, made his début in New York as soloist with the Philharmonic Society under Gustave Mahler. He played in London, and for three years was concertmaster of the Wiener Concert Verein of Vienna. Since the war, Fradkin returned to this country in 1915 with the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

From REPUBLICAN

Address Springfield, Mass.

Date

ENCH, CONDUCTOR ENGAGED

Pierre Monteux to Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra at October Concerts, Including That in Northampton

Esta

Pierre Monteux, a distinguished French conductor, has been engaged by the trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra to conduct the three pairs of concerts to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, October 11 and 12, 18 and 19, 25 and 26, as well as the concert in Cambridge October 17 and in Northampton October 23. The engagement of Mr Monteux as the first French conductor of the Metropolitan opera company makes it impossible for him to remain longer in Boston, but the trustees expect to be able to announce soon the name of conductor for the rest of the season.

Pierre Monteux was born in Paris, April 4, 1875, and received his musical education at the Paris conservatory. He has conducted the Concerts Colonne in Paris. Later he was engaged as conductor of the Ballet Russe, making tours of all the capitals of Europe. Monteux has always had a preference for the modern composers.

The soloists for the year will be Harold Bauer, Joseph Bonnet, Sophie Braslau, Florence Easton, Fredric Fradkin, Mabel Garrison, Emilio De Gogorza, Jascha Heifetz, Josef Hofmann, Mischa Levitzki, Josef Malkin, Arthur Rubinstein, Olga Samaroff and Jacques Tribaud.

AMERICAN SEPTEMBER 28.

NEW PLAYERS IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

The subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall next Monday morning, September 30, at 8:30.

Much curiosity has been shown on the part of the public as to the new members of the orchestra. Last Spring it was announced that five members of the French Military Band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputation will be found in the personnel. In the first violins there will be two faces—Fredric Fradkin, who will be concertmaster, and Ferdinand Thillois. Mr. Thillois came to Boston last Spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville in the Department of Arden, July 19, 1890. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, a pupil of Lefort, who also was Fradkin's teacher, and he won the first prize for violin in 1913.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French Band. It will be remembered that Mr. Mager, when the French Band appeared at the Pop Concert last Spring, sang a solo.

Mr. Malkin, of course, becomes the head of the 'cello section, and sharing the first desk with him will be the veteran, Alwin Schroeder, who needs no introduction in Boston. An interesting member of the section will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French Band, whose playing here made such a profound impression. He is a first-prize winner of the Paris Conservatorie, a veteran, and has been one of the principal 'cellists in the Colonne Orchestra of Paris.

A new contra-bass player is Agesilao Villano, who has had a most distinguished career. Mr. Villano, an Italian, is a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma and began his career in the Scala Orchestra, whose director was then Faccio. He went to South America and played in Brazil, Uruguay and Chile, and for the last fifteen years has been principal contra-bass in the Colon Theatre of Buenos Aires.

A new oboe player is Louis Speyer, also from the French Military Band, and an artists of most unusual gifts. He was a first-prize winner at the Paris Conservatoire in 1911, and, Mr. Longy says, the most promising oboe player the Conservatoire has produced in many years.

The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Mimart, who was called to military duty in France last Spring) and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Mr. Croes served in the Eighth Regiment of Territorial Infantry and was severely wounded at the battle of the Yser in November, 1914. He is a first prize of the Conservatoire of Lille and has played at the Monteux Concerts and at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris. Mr. Stievenard has been a professor at Vincent d'Indy Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureux Concerts and l'Opera Comique. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

From REPUBLICAN

Address

Date

Es 188

Much is made of the fact that the new concertmaster of the Boston symphony orchestra is a native-born American. Mr Fradkin is native-born, but he is not an American "of the old stock." Indeed, he belongs to those newer races which, unless the processes of the melting pot be unfavorable to talent, must in the long run increase considerably the number of America's musicians. Mr Fradkin is of Russian parentage. Though only 26 years old, he has won fame on both sides of the Atlantic. His training, it may be noted, is predominantly French. For, while as a young boy he studied under able teachers in the United States, from his 13th year on he was chiefly under the instruction of French masters, though he also studied with Ysaye, who is a Belgian. The management of the Boston symphony orchestra has apparently got a prize, and if the new conductor proves to be of equal distinction, the reorganized Boston symphony orchestra should start its first season with the promise of being worthy of its predecessor.

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date AUG 30 1918

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HAS NEW CONCERT MASTER

Fredric Fradkin, of Troy, N. Y., Young American, Gets Post Held by Renowned Musicians.

Boston, Mass., Aug. 29 (Special).—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment, as concert master, of the brilliant young American violinist, Frederic Fradkin, to succeed Anton Witek.

Fradkin was born at Troy, N. Y., in 1892. His first teachers were Henry Schradieck and Max Bendix. From 1905 to 1907 he studied in Paris under Remy and Joseph White, and in the latter year he entered the conservatoire in the violin class of Professor Lefore. He recovered the first prizein 1909 and also the present of a fine instrument from the French Government.

On leaving the conservatoire he was engaged as concert master and soloist by Pennequin. In the following year Louis Ganne took him to Monte Carlo as soloist, where he had much success.

Leaving Monte Carlo, he went to Brussels to work with Ysaye, and in January, 1911, he made his debut in this country as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Society under Gustav Mahler. Since then he has played in London and for three years was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Concert Verein of Vienna. He returned to this country in 1915 to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post of concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Trustees Appoint Frederick Fradkin Concert Master.

(Special to The Eagle.)

Boston, August 30—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday the appointment as concertmaster, of the young American violinist, Frederick Fradkin, to succeed Anton Witek. Fradkin is a native of Troy, N. Y., where he was born in 1892. His first teachers were Henry Schradieck and Max Bendix. From 1905 to 1907 he studied in Paris under Remy and Joseph White and in the latter year he entered the Conservatoire in the violin class of Professor Lefore.

He received the first prize in violin in 1909 and also the present of a fine instrument given by the French government. Directly after he left the Conservatoire, he was engaged as concertmaster and soloist by Pennequin.

In January, 1911, he made his debut in this country as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Society under Gustave Mahler. Since then he has played in London and for three years was concertmaster and soloist of the Weiner Concert Verein of Vienna. He returned to this country in 1915 to be concertmaster and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe. Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post of concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885.

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date AUG 30 1918

FRADKIN CONCERTMASTER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

(Special to The Standard Union.)

BOSTON, Mass., Aug. 30.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yestorday the appointment as concertmaster of the brilliant young American violinist, Frederick Fradkin, to succeed Anton Witek. Fradkin is a native of Troy, N. Y., where he was born in 1892 His first teachers were Henry Schradieck and Max Bendix. From 1905 to 1907 he studied in Paris under Remy and Joseph White, and in the latter year he entered the Conservatoire in the violin class of Prof. Lefore. He received the first prize in violin in 1909, and also the present of a fine instrument given by the French Government. Directly he left the Conservatoire he was engaged as concertmaster and soloist by Pennequin. In the following year Louis Ganne took him to Monte Carlo as soloist, where he had much success. Leaving Monte Carlo he went to Brussels to work with Ysaye, and in January, 1911, he made his debut in this country as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Society, under Gustave Mahler. Since then he has played in London, and for three years was concertmaster and soloist of the Weiner Concert Verein of Vienna. He returned to this country in 1915 to be concertmaster and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe. Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post of concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885.

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date AUG 30 191

FRADKIN TO PLAY IN BOSTON ORCHESTRA

New Yorker Selected as Concertmaster of Symphony Organization.

IS BRILLIANT MUSICIAN

Music lovers here will be greatly interested in an announcement made by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the effect that an American has been selected as concertmaster of the orchestra. He is Frederick Fradkin, a native of Troy, N. Y. He will succeed Anton Witek.

News of the selection was contained in a special dispatch to The Star.

Fradkin, although nothing more than a youth, having been born in Troy, in 1892, is said to be one of the most brilliant violinists in the world. His appointment as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony is regarded in music circles as a most successful step by the heads of that organization. Fradkin studied under the leading masters in this country and abroad and made his debut in this country in 1911 as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Society. Later he played in London and other places abroad. He is the youngest man to hold the post of concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

HINT MONTEUX MAY GET MUCK'S POSITION

The report has gained circulation that Pierre Monteux will succeed to the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the post held by Doctor Karl Muck, now interned as an Alien enemy by United States Government. No confirmation of the appointment could be secured from business representatives of the Boston organization who are in New York at present, and no information could be secured from the Metropolitan Opera House except that Mr. Monteux was under contract with them and it was confidently expected that that contract would be fulfilled.

According to a neighbor of Mr. Monteux, who is spending the summer near Stamford, Conn., negotiations have been taking place and Mr. Monteux's friends are hopeful that arrangements can be made which will enable him to accept the position, for it is thought that his appointment would mean much for the further spread of French music in this country.

One other thing that lends credence to the report is the recent appointment of Frederick Fradkin to the position of concert master. Mr. Fradkin's reputation rests to a great extent upon his holding a similar position with the orchestra of the Ballet Russe of which Mr. Monteux was the conductor.

From SUN

Address: New York City.

Date SEP 1 1918

MONTEUX TO DIRECT CONCERTS.

Will Take Charge of Boston Orchestra for Few Weeks.

The directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra some time ago requested Pierre Monteux, conductor of French operat at the Metropolitan Opera House, to take the place of leader of the orchestra which was left vacant by the withdrawal of Dr. Muck. M. Monteux is under contract to the Metropolitan Opera Company and was compelled to refuse.

But yesterday Giulio Gatti-Casazza gave his permission for M. Monteux to direct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during three weeks in October. The conductor will return then to his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House and it is hoped that by that time the orchestra will have obtained a permanent conductor.

From

Address: New York City

Date

AMERICAN VIOLINIST HEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Aug. 30.—The appointment of the American violinist, Frederic Fradkin, as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Anton Witek, is announced by the trustees.

Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885. He was born in Troy in 1892, and studied in Paris and Brussels. For three years he was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Conzert Verein of Vienna. In 1915 he returned to this country to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

HERALD SEPTEMBER 30.

SYMPHONY DIRECTOR NOT YET ENGAGED

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, issued yesterday the following statement concerning the conductorship of the Symphony orchestra for this season:

"It has already been announced that Pierre Monteux will direct he opening concerts of the year. At the time of this announcement it was expected that the name of the permanent conductor could soon be made public. Owing to the entirely abnormal condition of affairs throughout the world, such an announcement is still impossible. On more than one occasion it has taken from four to six weeks to receive answers from cable messages to Europe, but it may, and should, be said that negotiations are in active progress looking toward the continuance of the orchestra in the coming and following seasons upon precisely the high level which it has maintained throughout its history. Just as soon as dates and names can be given with definiteness more will be said."

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 1,

JUDGE Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, addressed the members of the orchestra for the first time in his official capacity this morning. The occasion was the first rehearsal of the season for the orchestra, and Judge Cabot's remarks were especially intended as an introduction to the orchestra of Pierre Monteux, who is to conduct the October concerts. In the course of his brief talk, he paid tribute to Major Henry L. Higginson, whose deep interest in the orchestra contributed in large measure to its preëminence throughout the years.

"There is an old saying," Judge Cabot said, "that it takes nine tailors to make a man. It is a new question whether nine trustees will make one Major Higginson. These nine, representing a much larger number, are making their attempt to do for the art of music in Boston and America something of what he has done, because they feel sure of the orchestra itself. It has the benefit of a succession of able conductors; but what could they have done without just such musicians as the members of this great orchestra? Those members have always been chosen with the greatest care, as artists and as men. Their work in public has proved to all the world what true artists they are; their work in private, at rehearsals, on journeys, in daily intercourse at Symphony Hall, has proved them to be true men, with whom the trustees are looking forward to a long future of friendly collaboration. We all have the same end in view—the continued supremacy of this organization, of which all its members, both players and management, and all music-lovers, both in Boston and throughout the country, have such good reason to be proud.

"The general disturbance of the world has caused many changes, here as everywhere else. For some of the inevitable changes, taking some fellow-players from your side, there must be regret, but we are indeed fortunate in securing new members of highest character and tried excellence. For the coming of M. Monteux to the conductor's stand for the opening concerts there can be nothing but rejoicing. We begin the year under one who brings with him every advantage of experience and authority. He comes as a musician and a gentleman with whom an association of a few weeks will seem altogether too short; he comes also as a representative of a race which has shown itself equally admirable in art and in heroism.

"Gentlemen of the orchestra, and M. Monteux, it is a great pleasure to introduce you to each other—and to leave you together."

Two weeks will be given by the orchestra to vigorous rehearsing. Mr. Monteux announces the programme of the three pairs of concerts he will give in Boston, as follows:

OCT. 11–12

Symphony in D minor.....Franck
Overture to "Manfred".....Schumann
"La Procession Nocturne," Poème Symphonique, Op. 6 (first time at these concerts).....Rabaud
"Iberia," Images pour Orchestre, No. 2..Debussy

OCT. 18–19

Symphony, No. 7, in A major.....Beethoven
"Que tu ne t'en ailles," Symphonic Poem..Loeffler
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in E-flat major.....Liszt
"Daphnis et Cloe," Suite, No. 1 (first time at these concerts).....Ravel
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

OCT. 25–26

Symphony, No. 2, in D major.....Brahms
"Istar," Variations Symphoniques, Op. 42..d'Indy
Symphony, No. 3, in G minor (with organ).....Saint Saëns

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 1,

MONTEUX MEETS SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Pierre Monteux, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was introduced to the members today at the first rehearsal of the season. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, addressed the members for the first time in his official capacity.

Judge Cabot paid high tribute to the members of the orchestra who have entered the service, at the same time commending the others on the supremacy of their organization. He also lauded the art and ability of the new conductor.

RECORD OCTOBER 1,

Pierre Monteux called the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their first rehearsal this morning. These are his first three programs:—

1. Oct. 11-12.

Franck.....Symphony in D minor
Schumann.....Overture to "Manfred"
Rabaud......"La Procession Nocturne" Poem Symphonique, Op. 6.
(First time at these concerts.)
Debussy....."Iberia." Images pour Orchestre, No. 2.

2. Oct. 18-19.

Beethoven....Symphony, No. 7 in A major
Loeffler....."Que tu ne t'en ailles." Symphonic Poem.
Liszt....Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 1, in F flat major.
Ravel...."Daphnis et Cloe." Suite, No. 1.
(First time at these concerts.)
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

3. Oct. 25-26

Brahms.....Symphony, No. 2, in D major
D'Indy.."Istar." Variations Symphoniques, Op. 42.
Saint-Saens...Symphony No. 3, in G minor (with organ).

HERALDOCTOBER 1.

FIRST SYMPHONY

Mr. Monteux calls the Symphony Orchestra together for rehearsal for the first time this (Tuesday) morning, at 10 o'clock. Two weeks will be given to vigorous rehearsing. He also announces the programs of the three pairs of concerts he will give in Boston. They are as follows:

1. Oct. 11-12.

Franck.....Symphony in D minor
Schumann.....Overture to "Manfred"
Rabaud....."La Procession Nocturne." Poem Symphonique, Op. 6.
(First time at these concerts.)
Debussy....."Iberia." Images pour Orchestre, No. 2.

2. Oct. 18-19.

Beethoven....Symphony, No. 7 in A major
Loeffler....."Que tu ne t'en ailles." Symphonic Poem.
Liszt....Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in E flat major.
Ravel....."Daphnis et Cloe," Suite, No. 1.
(First time at these concerts.)
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

3. Oct. 25-26.

Brahms.....Symphony, No. 2, in D major
D'Indy.."Istar." Variations Symphoniques, Op. 42.
Saint-Saens..Symphony No. 3, in G minor (with organ).

GLOBE-OCTOBER 2,

First Symphony Rehearsal

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, met the orchestra yesterday morning and addressed them for the first time in his official capacity. The occasion was the first rehearsal of the season for the orchestra, and the remarks were especially intended as an introduction to the orchestra of Pierre Monteux, who is conducting the orchestra.

HERALD OCTOBER 2

SYMPHONY MEN GREET MONTEUX

New Conductor Welcomed at First Rehearsal

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday at rehearsal introduced Pierre Monteux, who is to conduct the October concerts of the organization, appearing for the first time in his official capacity. There are nine trustees and Judge Cabot humorously raised the question whether, according to the old saying that it takes nine tailors to make a man, these nine trustees will make one Maj. Higginson.

They are making their attempt to do for music in America something of what he has done, he declared, because they feel sure of the orchestra itself. It has had the benefit of a succession of able conductors, and the members themselves have always been chosen with the greatest care as artists and as men. Their work in public has proved to all the world what true artists they are. Their work in private has proved them to be true men with whom the trustees are looking forward to a long future of friendly co-operation, he said.

He referred to the world disturbance that has made some changes in the orchestra, as elsewhere, and while voicing regret declared that the orchestra was fortunate in obtaining new members of the highest character and tried excellence.

"We begin the year," said he, "under one who brings with him every advantage of experience and authority. He comes as a musician and a gentleman, with whom an association of a few weeks will seem altogether too short."

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date AUG 30 1916

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HAS NEW CONCERT MASTER

Fredric Fradkin, of Troy, N. Y., Young American, Gets Post Held by Renowned Musicians.

Boston, Mass., Aug. 29 (Special).—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment, as concert master, of the brilliant young American violinist, Frederic Fradkin, to succeed Anton Witek.

Fradkin was born at Troy, N. Y., in 1892. His first teachers were Henry Schradieck and Max Bendix. From 1905 to 1907 he studied in Paris under Remy and Joseph White, and in the latter year he entered the conservatoire in the violin class of Professor Lefore. He recovered the first prizein 1909 and also the present of a fine instrument from the French Government.

On leaving the conservatoire he was engaged as concert master and soloist by Pennequin. In the following year Louis Ganne took him to Monte Carlo as soloist, where he had much success.

Leaving Monte Carlo, he went to Brussels to work with Ysaye, and in January, 1911, he made his debut in this country as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Society under Gustav Mahler. Since then he has played in London and for three years was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Concert Verein of Vienna. He returned to this country in 1915 to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post of concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Trustees Appoint Frederick Fradkin Concert Master.

(Special to The Eagle.)

Boston, August 30—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday the appointment as concertmaster, of the young American violinist, Frederick Fradkin, to succeed Anton Witek. Fradkin is a native of Troy, N. Y., where he was born in 1892. His first teachers were Henry Schradieck and Max Bendix. From 1905 to 1907 he studied in Paris under Remy and Joseph White and in the latter year he entered the Conservatoire in the violin class of Professor Lefore.

He received the first prize in violin in 1909 and also the present of a fine instrument given by the French government. Directly after he left the Conservatoire, he was engaged as concertmaster and soloist by Pennequin.

In January, 1911, he made his debut in this country as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Society under Gustave Mahler. Since then he has played in London and for three years was concertmaster and soloist of the Weiner Concert Verein of Vienna. He returned to this country in 1915 to be concertmaster and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe. Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post of concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885.

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

FRADKIN CONCERTMASTER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

(Special to The Standard Union.)

BOSTON, Mass., Aug. 30.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday the appointment as concertmaster of the brilliant young American violinist, Frederick Fradkin, to succeed Anton Witek. Fradkin is a native of Troy, N. Y., where he was born in 1892. His first teachers were Henry Schradieck and Max Bendix. From 1905 to 1907 he studied in Paris under Remy and Joseph White, and in the latter year he entered the Conservatoire in the violin class of Prof. Lefore. He received the first prize in violin in 1909, and also the present of a fine instrument given by the French Government. Directly he left the Conservatoire he was engaged as concertmaster and soloist by Pennequin. In the following year Louis Ganne took him to Monte Carlo as soloist, where he had much success. Leaving Monte Carlo he went to Brussels to work with Ysaye, and in January, 1911, he made his debut in this country as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Society, under Gustave Mahler. Since then he has played in London, and for three years was concertmaster and soloist of the Weiner Concert Verein of Vienna. He returned to this country in 1915 to be concertmaster and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe. Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post of concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885.

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date AUG 30 191

FRADKIN TO PLAY IN BOSTON ORCHESTRA

New Yorker Selected as Concertmaster of Symphony Organization.

IS BRILLIANT MUSICIAN

Music lovers here will be greatly interested in an announcement made by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the effect that an American has been selected as concertmaster of the orchestra. He is Frederick Fradkin, a native of Troy, N. Y. He will succeed Anton Witek.

News of the selection was contained in a special dispatch to The Star.

Fradkin, although nothing more than a youth, having been born in Troy, in 1892, is said to be one of the most brilliant violinists in the world. His appointment as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony is regarded in music circles as a most successful step by the heads of that organization. Fradkin studied under the leading masters in this country and abroad and made his debut in this country in 1911 as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Society. Later he played in London and other places abroad. He is the youngest man to hold the post of concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

HINT MONTEUX MAY GET MUCK'S POSITION

The report has gained circulation that Pierre Monteux will succeed to the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the post held by Doctor Karl Muck, now interned as an Alien enemy by United States Government. No confirmation of the appointment could be secured from business representatives of the Boston organization who are in New York at present, and no information could be secured from the Metropolitan Opera House except that Mr. Monteux was under contract with them and it was confidently expected that that contract would be fulfilled.

According to a neighbor of Mr. Monteux, who is spending the summer near Stamford, Conn., negotiations have been taking place and Mr. Monteux's friends are hopeful that arrangements can be made which will enable him to accept the position, for it is thought that his appointment would mean much for the further spread of French music in this country.

One other thing that lends credence to the report is the recent appointment of Frederick Fradkin to the position of concert master. Mr. Fradkin's reputation rests to a great extent upon his holding a similar position with the orchestra of the Ballet Russe of which Mr. Monteux was the conductor.

From SUN

Address: New York City.

Date 1919

MONTEUX TO DIRECT CONCERTS.

Will Take Charge of Boston Orchestra for Few Weeks.

The directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra some time ago requested Pierre Monteux, conductor of French operat at the Metropolitan Opera House, to take the place of leader of the orchestra which was left vacant by the withdrawal of Dr. Muck. M. Monteux is under contract to the Metropolitan Opera Company and was compelled to refuse.

But yesterday Giulio Gatti-Casazza gave his permission for M. Monteux to direct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during three weeks in October. The conductor will return then to his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House and it is hoped that by that time the orchestra will have obtained a permanent conductor.

From

Address: New York City

Date

AMERICAN VIOLINIST HEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Aug. 30.—The appointment of the American violinist, Frederic Fradkin, as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Anton Witek, is announced by the trustees.

Mr. Fradkin is the youngest man to hold the post since Franz Kneisel was appointed in 1885. He was born in Troy in 1892, and studied in Paris and Brussels. For three years he was concert master and soloist of the Weiner Conzert Verein of Vienna. In 1915 he returned to this country to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra of the Ballet Russe.

HERALD SEPTEMBER 30.

SYMPHONY DIRECTOR NOT YET ENGAGED

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, issued yesterday the following statement concerning the conductorship of the Symphony orchestra for this season:

"It has already been announced that Pierre Monteux will direct he opening concerts of the year. At the time of this announcement it was expected that the name of the permanent conductor could soon be made public. Owing to the entirely abnormal condition of affairs throughout the world, such an announcement is still impossible. On more than one occasion it has taken from four to six weeks to receive answers from cable messages to Europe, but it may, and should, be said that negotiations are in active progress looking toward the continuance of the orchestra in the coming and following seasons upon precisely the high level which it has maintained throughout its history. Just as soon as dates and names can be given with definiteness more will be said."

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 1,

JUDGE Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, addressed the members of the orchestra for the first time in his official capacity this morning. The occasion was the first rehearsal of the season for the orchestra, and Judge Cabot's remarks were especially intended as an introduction to the orchestra of Pierre Monteux, who is to conduct the October concerts. In the course of his brief talk, he paid tribute to Major Henry L. Higginson, whose deep interest in the orchestra contributed in large measure to its preëminence throughout the years.

"There is an old saying," Judge Cabot said, "that it takes nine tailors to make a man. It is a new question whether nine trustees will make one Major Higginson. These nine, representing a much larger number, are making their attempt to do for the art of music in Boston and America something of what he has done, because they feel sure of the orchestra itself. It has the benefit of a succession of able conductors; but what could they have done without just such musicians as the members of this great orchestra? Those members have always been chosen with the greatest care, as artists and as men. Their work in public has proved to all the world what true artists they are; their work in private, at rehearsals, on journeys, in daily intercourse at Symphony Hall, has proved them to be true men, with whom the trustees are looking forward to a long future of friendly collaboration. We all have the same end in view—the continued supremacy of this organization, of which all its members, both players and management, and all music-lovers, both in Boston and throughout the country, have such good reason to be proud.

"The general disturbance of the world has caused many changes, here as everywhere else. For some of the inevitable changes, taking some fellow-players from your side, there must be regret, but we are indeed fortunate in securing new members of highest character and tried excellence. For the coming of M. Monteux to the conductor's stand for the opening concerts there can be nothing but rejoicing. We begin the year under one who brings with him every advantage of experience and authority. He comes as a musician and a gentleman with whom an association of a few weeks will seem altogether too short; he comes also as a representative of a race which has shown itself equally admirable in art and in heroism.

"Gentlemen of the orchestra, and M. Monteux, it is a great pleasure to introduce you to each other—and to leave you together."

Two weeks will be given by the orchestra to vigorous rehearsing. Mr. Monteux announces the programme of the three pairs of concerts he will give in Boston, as follows:

OCT. 11-12

Symphony in D minor.....Franck
Overture to "Manfred".....Schumann
"La Procession Nocturne," Poème Symphonique, Op. 6 (first time at these concerts).....Rabaud
"Iberia," Images pour Orchestre, No. 2..Debussy

OCT. 18-19

Symphony, No. 7, in A major.....Beethoven
"Que tu ne t'en ailles," Symphonic Poem..Loeffler
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in E-flat major.....Liszt
"Daphnis et Cloe," Suite, No. 1 (first time at these concerts).....Ravel
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

OCT. 25-26

Symphony, No. 2, in D major.....Brahms
"Istar," Variations Symphoniques, Op. 42..d'Indy
Symphony, No. 3, in G minor (with organ).....Saint Saëns

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 1,

MONTEUX MEETS SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Pierre Monteux, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was introduced to the members today at the first rehearsal of the season. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, addressed the members for the first time in his official capacity.

Judge Cabot paid high tribute to the members of the orchestra who have entered the service, at the same time commending the others on the supremacy of their organization. He also lauded the art and ability of the new conductor.

RECORD OCTOBER 1,

Pierre Monteux called the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their first rehearsal this morning. These are his first three programs:—

1. Oct. 11-12.

Franck.....Symphony in D minor
Schumann.....Overture to "Manfred"
Rabaud.....'La Procession Nocturne" Poem Symphonique, Op. 6.
(First time at these concerts.)
Debussy.....'Iberia." Images pour Orchestre, No. 2.

2. Oct. 18-19.

Beethoven....Symphony, No. 7 in A major
Loeffler.....'Que tu ne t'en ailles." Symphonic Poem.
Liszt....Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 1, in F flat major.
Ravel...."Daphnis et Cloe." Suite, No. 1.
(First time at these concerts.)
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

3. Oct. 25-26

Brahms.....Symphony, No. 2, in D major
D'Indy..'Istar." Variations Symphoniques, Op. 42.
Saint-Saens...Symphony No. 3, in G minor (with organ).

HERALDOCTOBER 1.

FIRST SYMPHONY

Mr. Monteux calls the Symphony Orchestra together for rehearsal for the first time this (Tuesday) morning, at 10 o'clock. Two weeks will be given to vigorous rehearsing. He also announces the programs of the three pairs of concerts he will give in Boston. They are as follows:

1. Oct. 11-12.

Franck.....Symphony in D minor
Schumann.....Overture to "Manfred"
Rabaud.....'La Procession Nocturne." Poem Symphonique, Op. 6.
(First time at these concerts.)
Debussy.....'Iberia." Images pour Orchestre, No. 2.

2. Oct. 18-19.

Beethoven....Symphony, No. 7 in A major
Loeffler.....'Que tu ne t'en ailles." Symphonic Poem.
Liszt....Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in E flat major.
Ravel....."Daphnis et Cloe." Suite, No. 1.
(First time at these concerts.)
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

3. Oct. 25-26.

Brahms.....Symphony, No. 2, in D major
D'Indy..'Istar." Variations Symphoniques, Op. 42.
Saint-Saens..Symphony No. 3, in G minor (with organ).

GLOBE-OCTOBER 2,

First Symphony Rehearsal

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, met the orchestra yesterday morning and addressed them for the first time in his official capacity. The occasion was the first rehearsal of the season for the orchestra, and the remarks were especially intended as an introduction to the orchestra of Pierre Monteux, who is conducting the orchestra.

HERALD OCTOBER 2

SYMPHONY MEN GREET MONTEUX

New Conductor Welcomed at First Rehearsal

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday at rehearsal introduced Pierre Monteux, who is to conduct the October concerts of the organization, appearing for the first time in his official capacity. There are nine trustees and Judge Cabot humorously raised the question whether, according to the old saying that it takes nine tailors to make a man, these nine trustees will make one Maj. Higginson.

They are making their attempt to do for music in America something of what he has done, he declared, because they feel sure of the orchestra itself. It has had the benefit of a succession of able conductors, and the members themselves have always been chosen with the greatest care as artists and as men. Their work in public has proved to all the world what true artists they are. Their work in private has proved them to be true men with whom the trustees are looking forward to a long future of friendly co-operation, he said.

He referred to the world disturbance that has made some changes in the orchestra, as elsewhere, and while voicing regret declared that the orchestra was fortunate in obtaining new members of the highest character and tried excellence.

"We begin the year," said he, "under one who brings with him every advantage of experience and authority. He comes as a musician and a gentleman, with whom an association of a few weeks will seem altogether too short."

POST, OCTOBER 2,

MONTEUX MEETS HIS ORCHESTRA

Introduced by Judge Cabot at First Rehearsal

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, met the orchestra yesterday morning and addressed them for the first time in his official capacity. The occasion was the first rehearsal of the season for the orchestra and the remarks were especially intended as an introduction to the orchestra of Pierre Monteux, who is conducting the October concerts. Judge Cabot spoke as follows:

TRUE ARTISTS AND MEN

"There is an old saying that it takes nine tailors to make a man. It is a new question whether nine trustees will make one Major Higginson. These nine, representing a much larger number, are making their attempt to do for the art of music in Boston and America something of what he has done, because they feel sure of the orchestra itself. It has the benefit of a succession of able conductors; but what could they have done without just such musicians as the members of this great orchestra? Those members have always been chosen with the greatest care, as artists and as men. Their work in public has proved to all the world what true artists they are; their work in private, at rehearsals, on journeys, in daily intercourse at Symphony Hall, has proved them to be true men, with whom the trustees are looking forward to a long future of friendly collaboration. We all have the same end in view—the continued supremacy of this organization, of which all its members, both players and management, and all music lovers, both in Boston and throughout the country, have such good reason to be proud.

"The general disturbance of the world has caused many changes, here as everywhere else. For some of the inevitable changes, taking some fellow-players from your side, there must be regret, but we are indeed fortunate in securing new members of the highest character and tride excellence. For the coming of M. Monteaux to the conductor's stand for the opening concerts there can be nothing but rejoicing. We begin the year under one who brings with him every advantage of experience and authority. He comes as a musician and a gentleman, with whom an association of a few weeks will seem altogether too short; he comes also as a representative of a race which has shown itself equally admirable in art and in heroism.

"Gentlemen of the orchestra, and M. Monteux, it is a great pleasure to introduce you to each other—and to leave you together."

GLOBE OCTOBER 3,

TAK, SYMPHONY PLAYER, PUT IN DRAFT CLASS 1A

The differences between Edward Tak, violin player in the Symphony Orchestra, and the United States Government were all settled amicably yesterday when Tak received back his citizenship papers, waived his claim for exemption and was placed in Class 1A, ready to serve immediately in the Army. It is understood also that he will be reinstated in the orchestra.

The trouble started when Tak, a citizen of Holland, who has taken out his first applications for citizenship in this country, was registered in the draft on Sept 12. He immediately made every effort to be exempted, and finally, in the face of the opposition of Freeman O. Emerson and other draft officials, renounced his first papers and waived all future chances to be either an American citizen or an American soldier.

When Manager A. J. Brennan heard of this action, he discharged Tak. In other ways also, it is understood, Tak came to realize the significance of his act. Yesterday he returned to the draft headquarters at 200 Huntington av, and announced that he had changed his mind and was anxious for immediate service in the Army.

His original reason for trying to avoid service, he said, was that his mother in Holland is sick. He expressed himself as genuinely sorry for his disloyalty and after Mr Emerson had consulted the authorities, received his first citizenship papers, and his questionnaire, on which he waived exemption claims, and was immediately placed in Class 1A. Manager Brennan stated that he would probably reinstate Mr Tak as violin player. Tak's disloyalty, it is said, was due as much to artistic temperament as anything else.

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 22,

Pierre Monteux, Symphony Conductor, and His Wife

Affable, even in the face of the photographer, Pierre Monteux, who is to temporarily conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Monteux, posed for their pictures on the deck of the steamer bearing them Bostonward from somewhere in France.

Snapped on the steamer with his wife en route to Boston, where he is to serve as temporary conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux appeared quite amused, but he gave the keen-eyed photographer credit for singling him out and as a matter of course consented to pose.

Until Karl Muck's successor arrives, Mr. Monteux, the French conductor, who has been borrowed for the time being from the Metropolitan Opera Company, will officiate in place of the former German leader, who is now languishing in interment somewhere in the U. S. A.

GLOBE OCTOBER 5,

CONDUCTOR RABAUD WILL ARRIVE HERE NEXT MONTH

The acceptance by Henri Rabaud of the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the culmination of negotiations that have been in progress for five months.

HENRI RABAUD,
Who Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, received a cablegram yesterday from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, France, saying that Mr Rabaud will sail for America soon, arriving here early next month, when he will relieve Mr Monteaux of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, who conducts here this month.

Mr Rabaud, who is in his 40's, has not only been conductor at the Paris Grand Opera, but he has won the prix de Rome He is a son of a professor at the Paris Conservatoire. The new conductor is a distinguished composer. His opera, "Marouf," was played last Winter by the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York. Another of his works is "La Fille de Roland."

AMERICAN, OCTOBER 4,

RABAUD ACCEPTS LEADERSHIP OF SYMPHONY

New Conductor of Boston Orchestra Will Sail for America at Once

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Grand Opera in Paris, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will sail for America at once. This announcement was made today by Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the Board of Trustees of the orchestra.

The engagement of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera, as conductor for October, has been extended for one week.

Mr. Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father was a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome.

For the past five years he has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris.

As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance, and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr. Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

Last Winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr. Rabaud's opera entitled "Marouf." Another opera that has had much success is "La Fille de Roland."

POST, OCTOBER 5,

RABAUD AS SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Distinguished Parisian Engaged for Rest of Season

HENRI RABAUD,
New Symphony conductor.

The news that Henri Rabaud will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra after Pierre Monteux has relinquished this post to take up his winter duties at the Metropolitan is a sign of the change of policy by which the directors of the Boston orchestra intend to substitute other than German musical ideals and traditions in the future development of that body.

PROMINENT COMPOSER

Mr. Rabaud is not only one of the most prominent figures among the conductors and composers of the day in France, but is well known to the more advanced cult of music lovers of this country as a composer. His opera, "Marouf," composed in 1913, was produced last winter at the Metropolitan in New York. His symphony in E minor, his "Procession Nocturne," which Mr. Monteux, long an intimate friend of Rabaud, will perform on one of his Symphony programmes.

Divertissement, based on Russian airs and an Eclogue for orchestra have been produced and interpreted in this city by Georges Longy.

Born in Paris in 1873, Rabaud quickly rose in his profession. He conducted opera at the Opera Comique and at the Opera in Paris, and also appeared as a leader at orchestral concerts. At the Conservatoire Mr. Monteux knew Rabaud well, and has ever since maintained a close friendship with him. Mr. Monteux remembers his colleague in his youth, a grave and studious lad, an ardent student, but one who could quickly throw off care and become the gayest of playfellows when study hours were over.

Gains Effect Quietly

"Serious," said Mr. Monteux, "in his character, liked by everyone, as he is esteemed by everyone in Paris, today; of engaging manners and an expression that was lofty and idealistic. As a musician, he had from the beginning a love of music of all schools and styles. Bostonians will find him eclectic in his tastes and, I am very sure, an admirable musician and leader.

"As a conductor he is kind with his men, who always love him, but firm. He gains his effects quietly, but none the less surely, and he has an ear of surpassing keenness. In appearance he resembles considerably our previous President, Carnot!"

Father a Musician

Henri Rabaud's father was professor of the cello at the Conservatoire. One of his grandmothers was the famous singer, Mme. Dorus-Gros. At the Paris Conservatoire he was a pupil of Dubois, Massenet and others and gained the Prix de Rome in 1894. For 20 years past he has been one of the most prominent figures in the world of Paris and has conducted, in addition to many operatic performances, at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Collonne and Concerts Monteux. Mr. Monteux, departing on a tour or other musical undertaking, turned always to Rabaud, as a companion and fellow worker, to fill his post in his absences.

Mr. Rabaud has secured the endorsement of the French Ministry of Fine Arts for his Boston engagement. He is to sail very soon and will probably make his first bow to Boston audiences at the concerts of Nov. 15 and 16.

THE NEW CONDUCTOR

In the selection of Henri Rabaud, the French composer and conductor, to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming year, the trustees of that organization have, let us trust, made the best choice possible under the circumstances. Mr. Rabaud has had, so far as the reports show, no experience as a conductor of purely concert music; but his record as a leader of opera is creditable, and it is to be remembered that Dr. Muck was much of the same school when he first came to Boston. As a composer he is of more than ordinary ability, and one of his operas, "Marouf," was given at the Metropolitan last season.

It will be a novelty to see a French conductor holding the baton over the Symphony Orchestra. But the German fetich is no longer powerful and it could not have lasted forever, anyway. Our concert-goers will, no doubt, receive Mr. Rabaud with cordiality and will wish him success with the splendid band of which he comes to be the head.

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 4,

HENRI RABAUD TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY

Noted French Composer Engaged for the Season

Henri Rabaud, one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France, will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season 1918-19.

This announcement was made today by Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who received this morning from the ministry of fine arts in Paris a cable saying that M. Rabaud accepted the conductorship and would sail immediately, so as to be here early in November.

Negotiating Since April

The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since last April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled.

The orchestra was able to secure the services of Mr. Monteux for the first five weeks of the season, his original leave of absence having been extended for a week by Mr. Gatti-Casazza, with whom he has a contract for the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, so that Mr. Monteux can conduct the concerts of the first southern trip. By that time Mr. Rabaud will be in Boston.

Mr. Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties. His father was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors.

Composer of Note

He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamouraux, Colonne and Monteux symphony concerts in Paris. As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr. Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

Last winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr. Rabaud's opera entitled "Marouf." Another opera that has had much success is "La Fille de Roland."

SUNDAY HERALD, OCTOBER 6,

HENRI RABAUD TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced yesterday that Henri Rabaud, distinguished French musician and composer, will be the conductor of the orchestra for the coming season. He is expected to reach America early in November.

The engagement of M. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since last April.

POST, OCTOBER 2,

MONTEUX MEETS HIS ORCHESTRA

Introduced by Judge Cabot at First Rehearsal

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, met the orchestra yesterday morning and addressed them for the first time in his official capacity. The occasion was the first rehearsal of the season for the orchestra and the remarks were especially intended as an introduction to the orchestra of Pierre Monteux, who is conducting the October concerts. Judge Cabot spoke as follows:

TRUE ARTISTS AND MEN

"There is an old saying that it takes nine tailors to make a man. It is a new question whether nine trustees will make one Major Higginson. These nine, representing a much larger number, are making their attempt to do for the art of music in Boston and America something of what he has done, because they feel sure of the orchestra itself. It has the benefit of a succession of able conductors; but what could they have done without just such musicians as the members of this great orchestra? Those members have always been chosen with the greatest care, as artists and as men. Their work in public has proved to all the world what true artists they are; their work in private, at rehearsals, on journeys, in daily intercourse at Symphony Hall, has proved them to be true men, with whom the trustees are looking forward to a long future of friendly collaboration. We all have the same end in view—the continued supremacy of this organization, of which all its members, both players and management, and all music lovers, both in Boston and throughout the country, have such good reason to be proud.

"The general disturbance of the world has caused many changes here as everywhere else. For some of the inevitable changes, taking some fellow-players from your side, there must be regret, but we are indeed fortunate in securing new members of the highest character and tried excellence. For the coming of M. Monteaux to the conductor's stand for the opening concerts there can be nothing but rejoicing. We begin the year under one who brings with him every advantage of experience and authority. He comes as a musician and a gentleman, with whom an association of a few weeks will seem altogether too short; he comes also as a representative of a race which has shown itself equally admirable in art and in heroism.

"Gentlemen of the orchestra, and M. Monteux, it is a great pleasure to introduce you to each other—and to leave you together."

GLOBE OCTOBER 3.

TAK, SYMPHONY PLAYER, PUT IN DRAFT CLASS 1A

The differences between Edward Tak, violin player in the Symphony Orchestra, and the United States Government were all settled amicably yesterday when Tak received back his citizenship papers, waived his claim for exemption and was placed in Class 1A, ready to serve immediately in the Army. It is understood also that he will be reinstated in the orchestra.

The trouble started when Tak, a citizen of Holland, who has taken out his first applications for citizenship in this country, was registered in the draft on Sept 12. He immediately made every effort to be exempted, and finally, in the face of the opposition of Freeman O. Emerson and other draft officials, renounced his first papers and waived all future chances to be either an American citizen or an American soldier.

When Manager A. J. Brennan heard of this action, he discharged Tak. In other ways also, it is understood, Tak came to realize the significance of his act. Yesterday he returned to the draft headquarters at 200 Huntington av, and announced that he had changed his mind and was anxious for immediate service in the Army.

His original reason for trying to avoid service, he said, was that his mother in Holland is sick. He expressed himself as genuinely sorry for his disloyalty and after Mr Emerson had consulted the authorities, received his first citizenship papers, and his questionnaire, on which he waived exemption claims, and was immediately placed in Class 1A. Manager Brennan stated that he would probably reinstate Mr Tak as violin player. Tak's disloyalty, it is said, was due as much to artistic temperament as anything else.

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 22,

Pierre Monteux, Symphony Conductor, and His Wife

Affable, even in the face of the photographer, Pierre Monteux, who is to temporarily conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Monteux, posed for their pictures on the deck of the steamer bearing them Boston-ward from somewhere in France.

Snapped on the steamer with his wife en route to Boston, where he is to serve as temporary conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux appeared quite amused, but he gave the keen-eyed photographer credit for singling him out and as a matter of course consented to pose.

Until Karl Muck's successor arrives, Mr. Monteux, the French conductor, who has been borrowed for the purpose from the Metropolitan Opera Company, will officiate in place of the former German leader, who is now languishing in internment somewhere in the U. S. A.

GLOBE OCTOBER 5.

CONDUCTOR RABAUD WILL ARRIVE HERE NEXT MONTH

The acceptance by Henri Rabaud of the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the culmination of negotiations that have been in progress for five months.

HENRI RABAUD,
Who Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, received a cablegram yesterday from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, France, saying that Mr Rabaud will sail for America soon, arriving here early next month, when he will relieve Mr Monteaux of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, who conducts here this month.

Mr Rabaud, who is in his 40's, has not only been conductor at the Paris Grand Opera, but he has won the prix de Rome. He is a son of a professor at the Paris Conservatoire. The new conductor is a distinguished composer. His opera, "Marouf," was played last Winter by the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York. Another of his works is "La Fille de Roland."

AMERICAN OCTOBER 5.

RABAUD ACCEPTS LEADERSHIP OF SYMPHONY

New Conductor of Boston Orchestra Will Sail for America at Once

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Grand Opera in Paris, has accepted the [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] Arrival [illegible] Rabaud [illegible] Frederick P. Cabot [illegible] Rabaud [illegible] Monteux [illegible] Rabaud [illegible] Monteux [illegible] Rabaud [illegible] Monteux

REDUCTION RATIO

15x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 29,

Olin Downes Describes Experiences of These Eminent Bandsmen Who Fought for France

BY OLIN DOWNES

The subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning, Sept. 30, at 8:30. The renewal of subscriptions, which has been in progress for the last 10 days, fully justifies the belief of the trustees that, despite the many disadvantages under which the orchestra has labored since last spring, the season will be one of great prosperity. There are excellent seats to be had, both for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

Much curiosity has been shown on the part of the public as to the new members of the orchestra. Last spring it was announced that five members of the French Military Band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputation will be found in the personnel. In the first violins there will be two new faces—Fredric Fradkin, who will be concert master, and Ferdinand Thillois. Mr. Thillois came to Boston last spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville, in the Department of Arden, July 19, 1890. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, a pupil of Lefort, who also was Fradkin's teacher, and he won the first prize for violin in 1913. He has been a member of both the Colonne and Lamoureux orchestras. At the outbreak of the war he was called to duty in the 91st Infantry and fought through the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin des Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital, playing for his wounded comrades. Both his parents have been prisoners in Germany since 1914, and he does not know what has become of them.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band. It will be remembered that Mr. Mager, when the French band appeared at the Pop Concert last spring, sang a solo. He is a most versatile musician and, in addition to being a gifted viola player, is regarded as one of the best trombone players in France. Mr. Mager was taken prisoner early in the war and was exchanged in July, 1915. He has since served in Serbia and Salonica.

Mr. Makin, of course, becomes the head of the 'cello section and, sharing the first desk with him will be the veteran Alwin Schroeder, who needs no introduction in Boston. An interesting member of the section will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing here made such a profound impression. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, a veteran, and has been one of the principal 'cellists in the Colonne Orchestra of Paris. Another new comer is the Dutch 'cellist, Philip Abbas, who is a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatoire and a pupil of Mossel. When he was 17 he was solo 'cellist of the orchestra at Aix-la-Chapelle. He has been soloist with Sir Henry Wood of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London; from 1907 to 1911 he was first 'cellist of the Brighton Municipal Orchestra, England, and for three years first 'cellist of the orchestras at Nice, Aix-les-Bains and Biarritz. He has also travelled in France with Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureaux Concerts and l'Opera Comique. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Abdon Laus, the new first bassoon, is just 30 years old. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and has played in the principal orchestras of Paris, beside having given four years to the grand opera.

The new first trombone is Mr. Sordillo of this city.

The 86 members of the "Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris," more popularly known as the Paris Symphony Orchestra, have sailed from "somewhere in France" on a French battleship, and are expected to arrive at an Atlantic port before Oct. 1.

Andre Messager will conduct the concerts in this country. The orchestra will appear in 50 of the principal cities in the United States during its stay here of three months.

Several members of the commission whose efforts made possible the sending of France's most prized musical possession to this country are also on board the battleship, and will accompany the orchestra on its travels through this country.

George Misquelle, 'cello.

Ferdinand Thillois, violin.

Leo Croes, clarinet.

Abdun Laus, first bassoon.

Louis Speyer, oboe.

POST, SEPTEMBER 30,

FRADKIN JOINS THE SYMPHONY

Concert Master Arrives With His $20,000 Violin

FREDRIC FRADKIN,
New concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Guarding his $20,000 Stradivarius violin as though it was his most pre-

RECORD, OCTOBER 4

RABAUD WILL LEAD SYMPHONY THIS SEASON

Henri Rabaud, the French conductor and composer, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will begin his association with the orchestra six weeks after the opening. The first five weeks' concerts will be in charge of Pierre Monteux, the conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, who was loaned to the Boston organization pending its decision of a regular conductor.

The acceptance of the post by Rabaud was made positive by the receipt at Symphony Hall this morning of a cablegram from the Minister of Fine Art of France, stating that France gave Rabaud permission to relinquish his duties in Paris and go to America for the season.

The management of the orchestra in announcing Rabaud's engagement issued this statement: "The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled.

"Mr. Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father before him was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris. As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr. Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

"Last winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr. Rabaud's opera entitled 'Marouf.' Another opera that has had much success is 'La Fille de Roland.'"

GLOBE OCTOBER 4,

HENRI RABAUD WILL CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

Symphony Trustees Get Cable So Announcing

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received this morning from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris a cable saying that Henri Rabaud has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19 and that he would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

The engagement of Mr Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since last April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled. It is fortunate that the orchestra was able to secure the services of Mr Monteux for the first five weeks of the season, his original leave of absence having been extended for a week by Mr Gatti-Casazza, with whom he has a contract for the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, so that Mr Monteux can conduct the concerts of the first Southern trip. By that time Mr Rabaud will be in Boston.

Mr Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father before him was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris.

As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

Last Winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr Rabaud's opera entitled, "Marouf." Another opera that has had much success is "La Fille de Roland."

HERALD OCTOBER

SYMPHONY CONDUC

Henri Rabaud, Principal Conductor of the Paris Grand Opera and Eminent Composer, Who Has Accepted an Offer to Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RABAUD ACCEPTS SYMPHONY POST

Conductor of Paris Grand Opera to Direct Boston's Famed Orchestra

FIRST APPEARANCE PROBABLY ON NOV. 15

Henri Rabaud, principal conductor of the Paris Grand Opera, a composer of very high rank and descendant of celebrated musicians, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1918-19.

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, made the announcement yesterday following a cable from the French ministry of fine arts stating that Mr. Rabaud was pleased to accept the offer made him, and would sail for the United States at once. The ministry added its own appreciation of the fact that the Boston orchestra had chosen an eminent French musician as its conductor.

To Conduct First Concert Nov. 15

Mr. Rabaud was born in Paris in 1873. His father was a celebrated 'cellist and professor of the violoncello in the Conservatoire. Mme. Dorus-Gros, the famous singer, was his grandmother. He was graduated from the Conservatoire and in 1894 won the prix de Rome. For 20 years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the most prominent figues in the musical and artistic life of Paris. Aside from his work at the Grand Opera he has been conductor at the Opera Comique and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne, and the Concerts Monteux.

One of the principals novelties of the last season at the Metropolitan Opera House was his opera, "Marouf," which held its premiere in Paris in 1914. It is expected that Mr. Rabaud will make his debut as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts to be given Nov. 15 and 16. Mr. Monteux will conduct all the concerts on the first southern trip in November.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Es

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR NOTED FRENCHMAN

Henri Rabaud Chosen Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Ministry Accepts.

Muck's successor has been chosen, and he is a Frenchman. In other words, to quote verbatim a telegram dated Boston, October 4, and signed W. E. Walter, press representativ Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"The trustees of the Boston Sym phony Orchestra anounced today tha Henri Rabaud, one of the most em nent of French conductors and com posers, had been engaged to be pe manent conductor of the symphon orchestra.

"A cablegram received from t French Ministry of Fine Arts ye terday stated that Mr. Rabaud a cepted the engagement and wou sail as soon as possible for this cou try. The Ministry of Fine Arts a expressed its appreciation that t Boston Symphony Orchestra h chosen the distinguished Frenchm as its conductor.

"Rabaud is best known in t country as a composer. One of principal novelties at the Metropo tan Opera House last season was opera Marouf, his second sympho is a standard work in orchestral r ertoire. He has written much opera and for orchestra.

"At present he is the principal c ductor at the grand opera in Pa under Messager. This post he filled for seven years. He is a gr uate of the Paris Conservatoire, wh te studied composition with Mas net, and in 1894 he won the Prix Rome.

"Pierre Montaux will conduct orchestra through the first South trip, which ends with its second c cert in New York, Saturday aft noon November 9, and Mr. Rab will take charge of the orchestra mediately on its return to Bos Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud be able to get here in time to pre the program for the important of-town concerts of the orchestra first week of November, Mr. G Cassazza very courteously instru Mr. Montaux's leave of absence one week and thus solved an emb rassing problem."

Muck—Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, decorated by the Kaiser—is "somewhere" in the United States, where, the United States government—and Dr. Muck—know best.

As told by The Star sometime ago, it was announced the orchestra intends giving a series of five concerts in Baltimore this season.

Chevillard, Who May Follow Monteux, Is Noted Conductor

Camille Chevillard.

And now there is talk of Camille Chevillard as the successor of Mr. Monteux at the Boston Symphony concerts. No conductor is more abreast of the latest musical developments of the day, though M. Chevillard's activities as composer and conductor of the Concerts Lamoureux since the death of their founder has rivetted his attention particularly on the activities of present-day composers in France.

Camille Chevillard, son of a celebrated 'cellist, born on the 14th of October, 1859, in Paris, has seen the entire evolution of the modern French school. He was one of the early supporters of Richard Wagner when Wagner was the latest word in music. He assisted Lamoureux, to whom he became related by marriage, in the first production of "Lohengrin" in Paris, in 1887. Chevillard was one of the early proponents of French composers now famous, such as Chabrier and d'Indy, when these composers outraged the conservative. His passion for his art, his unsparing labors to promote the best interests of other composers, many of them less gifted than himself, have become proverbial in Paris.

M. Chevillard became assistant conductor of the Lamoureux concerts in 1890. As the years went by the actual direction of these concerts came more and more into his hands, and the younger composers, finding him their champion in a day of need, flocked in greater and greater numbers to his standard. They found the conductor a man not only of executive genius, but one who was unfailing in his receptivity and enthusiasm for all music, however novel, which showed talent. Such a living spirit would be no small boon to the musical community of Boston.

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 29,

Olin Downes Describes Experiences of These Eminent Bandsmen Who Fought for France

BY OLIN DOWNES

The subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning, Sept. 30, at 8:30. The renewal of subscriptions, which has been in progress for the last 10 days, fully justifies the belief of the trustees that, despite the many disadvantages under which the orchestra has labored since last spring, the season will be one of great prosperity. There are excellent seats to be had, both for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

Much curiosity has been shown on the part of the public as to the new members of the orchestra. Last spring it was announced that five members of the French Military Band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputation will be found in the personnel. In the first violins there will be two new faces—Fredric Fradkin, who will be concert master, and Ferdinand Thillois. Mr. Thillois came to Boston last spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville, in the Department of Arden, July 19, 1890. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, a pupil of Lefort, who also was Fradkin's teacher, and he won the first prize for violin in 1913. He has been a member of both the Colonne and Lamoureux orchestras. At the outbreak of the war he was called to duty in the 91st Infantry and fought through the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin des Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital, playing for his wounded comrades. Both his parents have been prisoners in Germany since 1914, and he does not know what has become of them.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band. It will be remembered that Mr. Mager, when the French band appeared at the Pop Concert last spring, sang a solo. He is a most versatile musician and, in addition to being a gifted viola player, is regarded as one of the best trombone players in France. Mr. Mager was taken prisoner early in the war and was exchanged in July, 1915. He has since served in Serbia and Salonica.

Mr. Makin, of course, becomes the head of the 'cello section and, sharing the first desk with him will be the veteran Alwin Schroeder, who needs no introduction in Boston. An interesting member of the section will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing here made such a profound impression. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, a veteran, and has been one of the principal 'cellists in the Colonne Orchestra of Paris. Another new comer is the Dutch 'cellist, Philip Abbas, who is a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatoire and a pupil of Mossel. When he was 17 he was solo 'cellist of the orchestra at Aix-la-Chapelle. He has been soloist with Sir Henry Wood of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London; from 1907 to 1911 he was first 'cellist of the Brighton Municipal Orchestra, England, and for three years first 'cellist of the orchestras at Nice, Aix-les-Baine and Biarritz. He has also travelled in France with Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureaux Concerts and l'Opera Comique. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Abdon Laus, the new first bassoon, is just 20 years old. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and has played in the principal orchestras of Paris, beside having given four years to the grand opera.

The new first trombone is Mr. Sordillo of this city.

The 86 members of the "Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris," more popularly known as the Paris Symphony Orchestra, have sailed from "somewhere in France" on a French battleship, and are expected to arrive at an Atlantic port before Oct. 1.

Andre Messager will conduct the concerts in this country. The orchestra will appear in 50 of the principal cities in the United States during its stay here of three months.

Several members of the commission whose efforts made possible the sending of France's most prized musical possession to this country are also on board the battleship, and will accompany the orchestra on its travels through this country.

George Misquelle, 'cello.

Ferdinand Thillois, violin.

Leo Croes, clarinet.

Abdun Laus, first bassoon.

Louis Speyer, oboe.

POST, SEPTEMBER 30,

FRADKIN JOINS THE SYMPHONY

Concert Master Arrives With His $20,000 Violin

FREDRIC FRADKIN,
New concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Guarding his $20,000 Stradivarius violin as though it was his most pre-

RECORD, OCTOBER 4

RABAUD WILL LEAD SYMPHONY THIS SEASON

Henri Rabaud, the French conductor and composer, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will begin his association with the orchestra six weeks after the opening. The first five weeks' concerts will be in charge of Pierre Monteux, the conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, who was loaned to the Boston organization pending its decision of a regular conductor.

The acceptance of the post by Rabaud was made positive by the receipt at Symphony Hall this morning of a cablegram from the Minister of Fine Art of France, stating that France gave Rabaud permission to relinquish his duties in Paris and go to America for the season.

The management of the orchestra in announcing Rabaud's engagement issued this statement: "The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled.

"Mr. Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father before him was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Audre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris. As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr. Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

"Last winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr. Rabaud's opera entitled 'Marouf.' Another opera that has had much success is 'La Fille de Roland.'"

GLOBE OCTOBER 4,

HENRI RABAUD WILL CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

Symphony Trustees Get Cable So Announcing

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received this morning from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris a cable saying that Henri Rabaud has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19 and that he would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

The engagement of Mr Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since last April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled. It is fortunate that the orchestra was able to secure the services of Mr Monteux for the first five weeks of the season, his original leave of absence having been extended for a week by Mr Gatti-Casazza, with whom he has a contract for the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, so that Mr Monteux can conduct the concerts of the first Southern trip. By that time Mr Rabaud will be in Boston.

Mr Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father before him was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris.

As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

Last Winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr Rabaud's opera entitled. "Marouf." Another opera that has had much success is "La Fille de Roland."

SYMPHONY CONDUC

Henri Rabaud, Principal Conductor of the Paris Grand Opera and Eminent Composer, Who Has Accepted an Offer to Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RABAUD ACCEPTS SYMPHONY POST

Conductor of Paris Grand Opera to Direct Boston's Famed Orchestra

FIRST APPEARANCE PROBABLY ON NOV. 15

Henri Rabaud, principal conductor of the Paris Grand Opera, a composer of very high rank and descendant of celebrated musicians, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1918-19.

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, made the announcement yesterday following a cable from the French ministry of fine arts stating that Mr. Rabaud was pleased to accept the offer made him, and would sail for the United States at once. The ministry added its own appreciation of the fact that the Boston orchestra had chosen an eminent French musician as its conductor.

To Conduct First Concert Nov. 15

Mr. Rabaud was born in Paris in 1873. His father was a celebrated 'cellist and professor of the violoncello in the Conservatoire. Mme. Dorus-Gros, the famous singer, was his grandmother. He was graduated from the Conservatoire and in 1894 won the prix de Rome. For 20 years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the most prominent figues in the musical and artistic life of Paris. Aside from his work at the Grand Opera he has been conductor at the Opera Comique and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne, and the Concerts Monteux.

One of the principals novelties of the last season at the Metropolitan Opera House was his opera, "Marouf," which held its premiere in Paris in 1914. It is expected that Mr. Rabaud will make his debut as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts to be given Nov. 15 and 16. Mr. Monteux will conduct all the concerts on the first southern trip in November.

HERALD OCTOBER

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR NOTED FRENCHMAN

Henri Rabaud Chosen Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Ministry Accepts.

Muck's successor has been chosen, and he is a Frenchman. In other words, to quote verbatim a telegram dated Boston, October 4, and signed W. E. Walter, press representative Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra anounced today that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra.

"A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts yesterday stated that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The Ministry of Fine Arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

"Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of his principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season was the opera Marouf, his second symphony is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much opera and for orchestra.

"At present he is the principal conductor at the grand opera in Paris under Mossager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied composition with Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

"Pierre Montaux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, which ends with its second concert in New York, Saturday afternoon November 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud being able to get here in time to prepare the program for the important out-of-town concerts of the orchestra the first week of November, Mr. Gatti-Cassazza very courteously instructed Mr. Montaux's leave of absence for one week and thus solved an embarrassing problem."

Muck—Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, decorated by the Kaiser—is "somewhere" in the United States, where, the United States government—and Dr. Muck—know best.

As told by The Star sometime ago, it was announced the orchestra intends giving a series of five concerts in Baltimore this season.

Chevillard, Who May Follow Monteux, Is Noted Conductor

Camille Chevillard.

And now there is talk of Camille Chevillard as the successor of Mr. Monteux at the Boston Symphony concerts. No conductor is more abreast of the latest musical developments of the day, though M. Chevillard's activities as composer and conductor of the Concerts Lamoureux since the death of their founder has riveted his attention particularly on the activities of present-day composers in France.

Camille Chevillard, son of a celebrated 'cellist, born on the 14th of October, 1859, in Paris, has seen the entire evolution of the modern French school. He was one of the early supporters of Richard Wagner when Wagner was the latest word in music. He assisted Lamoureux, to whom he became related by marriage, in the first production of "Lohengrin" in Paris, in 1887. Chevillard was one of the early proponents of French composers now famous, such as Chabrier and d'Indy, when these composers outraged the conservative. His passion for his art, his unsparing labors to promote the best interests of other composers, many of them less gifted than himself, have become proverbial in Paris.

M. Chevillard became assistant conductor of the Lamoureux concerts in 1890. As the years went by the actual direction of these concerts came more and more into his hands, and the younger composers, finding him their champion in a day of need, flocked in greater and greater numbers to his standard. They found the conductor a man not only of executive genius, but one who was unfailing in his receptivity and enthusiasm for all music, however novel, which showed talent. Such a living spirit would be no small boon to the musical community of Boston.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 29,

13

Olin Downes Describes Experiences of These Eminent Bandsmen Who Fought for

BY OLIN DOWNES

The subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning, Sept. 30, at 8:30. The renewal of subscriptions, which has been in progress for the last 10 days, fully justifies the belief of the trustees that, despite the many disadvantages under which the orchestra has labored since last spring, the season will be one of great prosperity. There are excellent seats to be had, both for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

Much curiosity has been shown on the part of the public as to the new members of the orchestra. Last spring it was announced that five members of the French Military Band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputation will be found in the personnel. In the first violins there will be two new faces—Fredric Fradkin, who will be concert master, and Ferdinand Thillois. Mr. Thillois came to Boston last spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville, in the Department of Arden, July 19, 1890. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, a pupil of Lefort, who also was Fradkin's teacher, and he won the first prize for violin in 1913. He has been a member of both the Colonne and Lamoureux orchestras. At the outbreak of the war he was called to duty in the 91st Infantry and fought through the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin des Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital, playing for his wounded comrades. Both his parents have been prisoners in Germany since 1914, and he does not know what has become of them.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band. It will be remembered that Mr. Mager, when the French band appeared at the Pop Concert last spring, sang a solo. He is a most versatile musician and, in addition to being a gifted viola player, is regarded as one of the best trombone players in France. Mr. Mager was taken prisoner early in the war and was exchanged in July, 1915. He has since served in Serbia and Salonica.

Mr. Makin, of course, becomes the head of the 'cello section and, sharing the first desk with him will be the veteran Alwin Schroeder, who needs no introduction in Boston. An interesting member of the section will be Géorges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing here made such a profound impression. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, a veteran, and has been one of the principal 'cellists in the Colonne Orchestra of Paris. Another new comer is the Dutch 'cellist, Philip Abbas, who is a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatoire and a pupil of Mossel. When he was 17 he was solo 'cellist of the orchestra at Aix-la-Chapelle. He has been soloist with Sir Henry Wood of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London; from 1907 to 1911 he was first 'cellist of the Brighton Municipal Orchestra, England, and for three years first 'cellist of the orchestras at Nice, Aix-les-Bains and Biarritz. He has also travelled in France with Vincent d'Indy. In 1916-17 he was at the desk of the first 'cellist of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

A new contra- bass player is Agesilao Villano, who has had a most distinguished career. Mr. Villano, an Italian, is a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma and began his career in the Scala Orchestra, whose director was then Faccio. He went to South America and played in Brazil, Uruguay and Chili, and for the last 15 years has been principal contra-bass in the Colon Theatre of Buenos Ayres. In the winters he returned to Europe and played in France, England, Italy and Germany under the direction of Mascagni, Martucci, Mancinelli, Toscanini, Campanini, Serafin, Saint-Saens, Rabaud, Messager, Leroux and others. In Italy he has also played under distinguished guest conductors — Maestri, Calonne, Chevillard and Richter.

A new oboe player is Louis Speger, also from the French Military Band and an artist of most unusual gifts. He was a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire in 1911 and, Mr. Longy says, the most promising oboe player the Conservatoire has produced in many years.

The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Mimart, who was called to military duty in France last spring) and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Mr. Croes served in the Eighth Regiment of Territorial Infantry and was severely wounded at the battle of the Yser in November, 1914. He is a first prize of the Conservatoire of Lille and has played at the Monteux Concerts and at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris. Mr. Sievenard has been a professor at Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureaux Concerts and l'Opera Comique. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Abdon Laus, the new first bassoon, is just 30 years old. He is a first prize of the ... played i... Paris, b... to the gr...

George Misquelle, 'cello.

Ferdinand Thillois, violin.

Leo Croes, clarinet.

Abdun Laus, firs...

POST, SEPTEMBER 30,

FRADKIN JOINS THE SYMPHONY

Concert Master Arrives With His $20,000 Violin

FREDRIC FRADKIN,
New concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Guarding his $20,000 Stradivarius violin as though it was his most pre-

RECORD, OCTOBER 4

RABAUD WILL LEAD SYMPHONY THIS SEASON

Henri Rabaud, the French conductor and composer, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will begin his association with the orchestra six weeks after the opening. The first five weeks' concerts will be in charge of Pierre Monteux, the conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, who was loaned to the Boston organization pending its decision of a regular conductor.

The acceptance of the post by Rabaud was made positive by the receipt at Symphony Hall this morning of a cablegram from the Minister of Fine Art of France, stating that France gave Rabaud permission to relinquish his duties in Paris and go to America for the season.

The management of the orchestra in announcing Rabaud's engagement issued this statement: "The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled.

"Mr. Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father before him was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris. As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr. Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

"Last winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr. Rabaud's opera entitled 'Marouf.' Another opera that has had much success is 'La Fille de Roland.'"

GLOBE OCTOBER 4,

HENRI RABAUD WILL CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

Symphony Trustees Get Cable So Announcing

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received this morning from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris a cable saying that Henri Rabaud has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19 and that he would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

The engagement of Mr Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since last April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled. It is fortunate that the orchestra was able to secure the services of Mr Monteux for the first five weeks of the season, his original leave of absence having been extended for a week by Mr Gatti-Casazza, with whom he has a contract for the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, so that Mr Monteux can conduct the concerts of the first Southern trip. By that time Mr Rabaud will be in Boston.

Mr Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father before him was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris.

As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

Last Winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr Rabaud's opera entitled, "Marouf." Another opera that has had much success is "La Fille de Roland."

HERALD OCTOBER

SYMPHONY CONDUC...

Henri Rabaud, Principal Conductor of the Paris Grand Opera and Eminent Composer, Who Has Accepted an Offer to Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RABAUD ACCEPTS SYMPHONY POST

Conductor of Paris Grand Opera to Direct Boston's Famed Orchestra

FIRST APPEARANCE PROBABLY ON NOV. 15

Henri Rabaud, principal conductor of the Paris Grand Opera, a composer of very high rank and descendant of celebrated musicians, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1918-19.

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, made the announcement yesterday following a cable from the French ministry of fine arts stating that Mr. Rabaud was pleased to accept the offer made him, and would sail for the United States at once. The ministry added its own appreciation of the fact that the Boston orchestra had chosen an eminent French musician as its conductor.

To Conduct First Concert Nov. 15

Mr. Rabaud was born in Paris in 1873. His father was a celebrated 'cellist and professor of the violoncello in the Conservatoire. Mme. Dorus-Gros, the famous singer, was his grandmother. He was graduated from the Conservatoire and in 1894 won the prix de Rome. For 20 years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the most prominent figues in the musical and artistic life of Paris. Aside from his work at the Grand Opera he has been conductor at the Opera Comique and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne, and the Concerts Monteux.

One of the principals novelties of the

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR NOTED FRENCHMAN

Henri Rabaud Chosen Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Ministry Accepts.

Muck's successor has been chosen, and he is a Frenchman. In other words, to quote verbatim a telegram dated Boston, October 4, and signed W. E. Walter, press representative Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra anounced today that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra.

"A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts yesterday stated that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The Ministry of Fine Arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

"Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season was the opera Marouf, his second symphony is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much opera and for orchestra.

"At present he is the principal conductor at the grand opera in Paris under Mossager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied composition with Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

"Pierre Montaux will conduct the orchestra through the first South trip, which ends with its second concert in New York, Saturday afternoon November 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud being able to get here in time to prepare the program for the important out-of-town concerts of the orchestra the first week of November, Mr. Gatti-Cassazza very courteously instructed Mr. Montaux's leave of absence for one week and thus solved an embarrassing problem."

Muck—Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, decorated by the Kaiser "somewhere" in the United States, where, the United States government—and Dr. Muck—know best.

As told by The Star sometime it was announced the orchestra intends giving a series of five concerts in Baltimore this season.

Che...

And now ... Chevillard ... Monteux at ... certs. No ... of the late ... the day, th... ties as com... Concerts La... their found... particularly ... day compos... Camille C... brated 'celli... tober, 1859, i...

From Address
Date

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 29,

13

Olin Downes Describes Experiences of These Eminent Bandsmen Who Fought for

BY OLIN DOWNES

The subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning, Sept. 30, at 8:30. The renewal of subscriptions, which has been in progress for the last 10 days, fully justifies the belief of the trustees that, despite the many disadvantages under which the orchestra has labored since last spring, the season will be one of great prosperity. There are excellent seats to be had, both for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

Much curiosity has been shown on the part of the public as to the new members of the orchestra. Last spring it was announced that five members of the French Military Band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputation will be found in the personnel. In the first violins there will be two new faces—Fredric Fradkin, who will be concert master, and Ferdinand Thillois. Mr. Thillois came to Boston last spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville, in the Department of Arden, July 19, 1890. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, a pupil of Lefort, who also was Fradkin's teacher, and he won the first prize for violin in 1913. He has been a member of both the Colonne and Lamoureux orchestras. At the outbreak of the war he was called to duty in the 91st Infantry and fought through the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin des Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital, playing for his wounded comrades. Both his parents have been prisoners in Germany since 1914, and he does not know what has become of them.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band. It will be remembered that Mr. Mager, when the French band appeared at the Pop Concert last spring, sang a solo. He is a most versatile musician and, in addition to being a gifted viola player, is regarded as one of the best trombone players in France. Mr. Mager was taken prisoner early in the war and was exchanged in July, 1915. He has since served in Serbia and Salonica.

Mr. Makin, of course, becomes the head of the 'cello section and, sharing the first desk with him will be the veteran Alwin Schroeder, who needs no introduction in Boston. An interesting member of the section will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing here made such a profound impression. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, a veteran, and has been one of the principal 'cellists in the Colonne Orchestra of Paris. Another new comer is the Dutch 'cellist, Philip Abbas, who is a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatoire and a pupil of Mossel. When he was 17 he was solo 'cellist of the orchestra at Aix-la-Chapelle. He has been soloist with Sir Henry Wood of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London; from 1907 to 1911 he was first 'cellist of the Brighton Municipal Orchestra, England, and for three years first 'cellist of the orchestras at Nice, Aix-les-Bains and Biarritz. He has also travelled in France with Vincent d'Indy. In 1916-17 he was at the desk of the first 'cellist of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

A new contra- bass player is Agesilao Villano, who has had a most distinguished career. Mr. Villano, an Italian, is a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma and began his career in the Scala Orchestra, whose director was then Faccio. He went to South America and played in Brazil, Uruguay and Chili, and for the last 15 years has been principal contra-bass in the Colon Theatre of Buenos Ayres. In the winters he returned to Europe and played in France, England, Italy and Germany under the direction of Mascagni, Martucci, Mancinelli, Toscanini, Campanini, Serafin, Saint-Saens, Rabaud, Messager, Leroux and others. In Italy he has also played under distinguished guest conductors — Maestri, Calonne, Chevillard and Richter.

A new oboe player is Louis Speger, also from the French Military Band and an artist of most unusual gifts. He was a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire in 1911 and, Mr. Longy says, the most promising oboe player the Conservatoire has produced in many years.

The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Mimart, who was called to military duty in France last spring) and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Mr. Croes served in the Eighth Regiment of Territorial Infantry and was severely wounded at the battle of the Yser in November, 1914. He is a first prize of the Conservatoire of Lille and has played at the Monteux Concerts and at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris. Mr. Sievenard has been a professor at Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureaux Concerts and l'Opera Comique. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Abdon Laus, the new first bassoon, is just 30 years old. He is a first prize of the played i Paris, b to the gr

George Misquelle, 'cello.

Ferdinand Thillois, violin.

Leo Croes, clarinet.

Abdun Laus, firs

POST, SEPTEMBER 30,

FRADKIN JOINS THE SYMPHONY

Concert Master Arrives With His $20,000 Violin

FREDRIC FRADKIN,
New concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Guarding his $20,000 Stradivarius violin as though it was his most pre-

RECORD, OCTOBER 4

RABAUD WILL LEAD SYMPHONY THIS SEASON

Henri Rabaud, the French conductor and composer, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will begin his association with the orchestra six weeks after the opening. The first five weeks' concerts will be in charge of Pierre Monteux, the conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, who was loaned to the Boston organization pending its decision of a regular conductor.

The acceptance of the post by Rabaud was made positive by the receipt at Symphony Hall this morning of a cablegram from the Minister of Fine Art of France, stating that France gave Rabaud permission to relinquish his duties in Paris and go to America for the season.

The management of the orchestra in announcing Rabaud's engagement issued this statement: "The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled.

"Mr. Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father before him was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris. As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr. Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

"Last winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr. Rabaud's opera entitled 'Marouf.' Another opera that has had much success is 'La Fille de Roland.'"

GLOBE OCTOBER 4,

HENRI RABAUD WILL CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

Symphony Trustees Get Cable So Announcing

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received this morning from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris a cable saying that Henri Rabaud has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19 and that he would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

The engagement of Mr Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since last April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled. It is fortunate that the orchestra was able to secure the services of Mr Monteux for the first five weeks of the season, his original leave of absence having been extended for a week by Mr Gatti-Casazza, with whom he has a contract for the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, so that Mr Monteux can conduct the concerts of the first Southern trip. By that time Mr Rabaud will be in Boston.

Mr Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father before him was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris.

As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

Last Winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr Rabaud's opera entitled, "Marouf." Another opera that has had much success is "La Fille de Roland."

HERALD OCTOBER

SYMPHONY CONDUC

Henri Rabaud, Principal Conductor of the Paris Grand Opera and Eminent Composer, Who Has Accepted an Offer to Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RABAUD ACCEPTS SYMPHONY POST

Conductor of Paris Grand Opera to Direct Boston's Famed Orchestra

FIRST APPEARANCE PROBABLY ON NOV. 15

Henri Rabaud, principal conductor of the Paris Grand Opera, a composer of very high rank and descendant of celebrated musicians, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1918-19.

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, made the announcement yesterday following a cable from the French ministry of fine arts stating that Mr. Rabaud was pleased to accept the offer made him, and would sail for the United States at once. The ministry added its own appreciation of the fact that the Boston orchestra had chosen an eminent French musician as its conductor.

To Conduct First Concert Nov. 15

Mr. Rabaud was born in Paris in 1873. His father was a celebrated 'cellist and professor of the violoncello in the Conservatoire. Mme. Dorus-Gros, the famous singer, was his grandmother. He was graduated from the Conservatoire and in 1894 won the prix de Rome. For 20 years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the most prominent figues in the musical and artistic life of Paris. Aside from his work at the Grand Opera he has been conductor at the Opera Comique and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne, and the Concerts Monteux.

One of the principals novelties of the

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR NOTED FRENCHMAN

Henri Rabaud Chosen Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Ministry Accepts.

Muck's successor has been chosen, and he is a Frenchman. In other words, to quote verbatim a telegram dated Boston, October 4, and signed W. E. Walter, press representative Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra anounced today that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra.

"A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts yesterday stated that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The Ministry of Fine Arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

"Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season was the opera Marouf, his second symphony is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much opera and for orchestra.

"At present he is the principal conductor at the grand opera in Paris under Mossager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied composition with Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

"Pierre Montaux will conduct the orchestra through the first South trip, which ends with its second concert in New York, Saturday afternoon November 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud being able to get here in time to prepare the program for the important out-of-town concerts of the orchestra the first week of November, Mr. Gatti-Cassazza very courteously instructed Mr. Montaux's leave of absence for one week and thus solved an embarrassing problem."

Muck—Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, decorated by the Kaiser "somewhere" in the United States where, the United States government—and Dr. Muck—know best.

As told by The Star sometime it was announced the orchestra intends giving a series of five concerts in Baltimore this season.

Che

And now Chevillard Monteux at certs. No of the late the day, th ties as com Concerts La their found particularly day compos Camille C brated 'celli tober, 1859, i

Describes Experiences of These Eminent Bandsmen Who Fought for France

Ferdinand Thillois, violin.

Leo Croes, clarinet.

Abdun Laus, first bassoon.

Louis Speyer, oboe.

In 1916-17 he was at the first 'cellist of the Philadel- tra.

tra- bass player is Agesilao has had a most distin- er. Mr. Villano, an Ital- aduate of the Royal Con- Parma and began his Scala Orchestra, whose then Faccio. He went to ca and played in Brazil, Chili, and for the last 15 en principal contra-bass in heatre of Buenos Ayres. rs he returned to Europe France, England, Italy under the direction of artucci, Mancinelli, Tos- anini, Serafin, Saint-Saens, ager, Leroux and others. as also played under dis- t conductors — Maestri, Calonne, Chevillard and Richter.

A new oboe player is Louis Speger, also from the French Military Band and an artist of most unusual gifts. He was a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire in 1911 and, Mr. Longy says, the most promising oboe player the Conservatoire has produced in many years.

The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Mimart, who was called to military duty in France last spring) and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Mr. Croes served in the Eighth Regiment of Territorial Infantry and was severely wounded at the battle of the Yser in November, 1914. He is a first prize of the Conservatoire of Lille and has played at the Monteux Concerts and at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris. Mr. Sievenard has been a professor at Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureaux Concerts and l'Opera Comique. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Abdon Laus, the new first bassoon, is just 30 years old. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and has played in the principal orchestras of Paris, beside having given four years to the grand opera.

The new first trombone is Mr. Sordillo of this city.

The 86 members of the "Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris," more popularly known as the Paris Symphony Orchestra, have sailed from "somewhere in France" on a French battleship, and are expected to arrive at an Atlantic port before Oct. 1.

Andre Messager will conduct the concerts in this country. The orchestra will appear in 50 of the principal cities in the United States during its stay here of three months.

Several members of the commission whose efforts made possible the sending of France's most prized musical possession to this country are also on board the battleship, and will accompany the orchestra on its travels through this country.

LOBE OCTOBER 4,

ENRI RABAUD WILL CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

ymphony Trustees Get Cable So Announcing

rederick P. Cabot, chairman of the rd of trustees of the Boston Sym- ny Orchestra, received this morning m the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris able saying that Henri Rabaud has epted the conductorship of the Bos- Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19 and that he would sail imme- tely so as to be here early in No- nber.

he engagement of Mr Rabaud brings n end negotiations which have been progress since last April. The un- al conditions brought about by the r increased the difficulties enormous- but there is a feeling now that the blem of selecting the permanent con- tor for the orchestra has been most isfactorily settled. It is fortunate t the orchestra was able to secure services of Mr Monteux for the first weeks of the season, his original ve of absence having been extended a week by Mr Gatti-Casazza, with om he has a contract for the Metro- itan Opera House, New York, so that Monteux can conduct the concerts of first Southern trip. By that time Mr baud will be in Boston.

r Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties one of the most distinguished com- ers and musicians of France. His her before him was a musician, a fessor in the Paris Conservatoire, Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de me. For the past five years Mr baud has been one of the principal ductors of the Grand Opera in Par- and thus has been closely associated h Andre Messager, dean of French ductors. He has also done much cert work, having conducted at dif- nt times the Lamoureux, Colonne Monteux Symphony Concerts in is.

s a composer he ranks among the t men of France. His Second Sym- ny is a work of greatest importance his "La Procession Nocturne" ich Mr Monteux is playing here in ston in his second program) is one the most popular works in the nch orchestral repertoire.

ast Winter one of the novelties at Metropolitan Opera in New York Mr Rabaud's opera entitled, "Ma- f." Another opera that has had much cess is "La Fille de Roland."

HERALD OCTOBER

SYMPHONY CONDUC

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

E

Henri Rabaud, Principal Conductor of the Paris Grand Opera and Eminent Composer, Who Has Accepted an Offer to Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RABAUD ACCEPTS SYMPHONY POST

Conductor of Paris Grand Opera to Direct Boston's Famed Orchestra

FIRST APPEARANCE PROBABLY ON NOV. 15

Henri Rabaud, principal conductor of the Paris Grand Opera, a composer of very high rank and descendant of celebrated musicians, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1918-19.

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, made the announcement yesterday following a cable from the French ministry of fine arts stating that Mr. Rabaud was pleased to accept the offer made him, and would sail for the United States at once. The ministry added its own appreciation of the fact that the Boston orchestra had chosen an eminent French musician as its conductor.

To Conduct First Concert Nov. 15

Mr. Rabaud was born in Paris in 1873. His father was a celebrated 'cellist and professor of the violoncello in the Conservatoire. Mme. Dorus-Gras, the famous singer, was his grandmother. He was graduated from the Conservatoire and in 1894 won the prix de Rome. For 20 years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the most prominent figures in the musical and artistic life of Paris. Aside from his work at the Grand Opera he has been conductor at the Opera Comique and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne, and the Concerts Monteux.

One of the principals novelties of the last season at the Metropolitan Opera

---

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR NOTED FRENCHMAN

Henri Rabaud Chosen Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Ministry Accepts.

Muck's successor has been chosen, and he is a Frenchman. In other words, to quote verbatim a telegram dated Boston, October 4, and signed W. E. Walter, press representativ Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"The trustees of the Boston Sym phony Orchestra anounced today tha Henri Rabaud, one of the most em nent of French conductors and com posers, had been engaged to be pe manent conductor of the symphon orchestra.

"A cablegram received from t French Ministry of Fine Arts ye terday stated that Mr. Rabaud a cepted the engagement and wou sail as soon as possible for this cou try. The Ministry of Fine Arts a expressed its appreciation that t Boston Symphony Orchestra h chosen the distinguished Frenchm as its conductor.

"Rabaud is best known in t country as a composer. One of principal novelties at the Metrop tan Opera House last season was opera Marouf, his second symph is a standard work in orchestral r ertoire. He has written much opera and for orchestra.

"At present he is the principal c ductor at the grand opera in Pa under Mossager. This post he filled for seven years. He is a gr uate of the Paris Conservatoire, wh te studied composition with Ma net, and in 1894 he won the Prix Rome.

"Pierre Montaux will conduct orchestra through the first South trip, which ends with its second c cert in New York, Saturday aft noon November 9, and Mr. Rab will take charge of the orchestra mediately on its return to Bos Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud b able to get here in time to pre the program for the important of-town concerts of the orchestra first week of November, Mr. G Cassazza very courteously instru Mr. Montaux's leave of absence one week and thus solved an em rassing problem."

Muck—Dr. Karl Muck, former c ductor of the Boston Symphony chestra, decorated by the Kaiser "somewhere" in the United Sta where, the United States governm —and Dr. Muck—know best.

As told by The Star sometime it was announced the orchestra tends giving a series of five conc in Baltimore this season.

Chevillard, Who May Follow Monteux, Is Noted Conductor

Camille Chevillard.

And now there is talk of Camille Chevillard as the successor of Mr. Monteux at the Boston Symphony concerts. No conductor is more abreast of the latest musical developments of the day, though M. Chevillard's activities as composer and conductor of the Concerts Lamoureux since the death of their founder has riveted his attention particularly on the activities of present-day composers in France.

Camille Chevillard, son of a celebrated 'cellist, born on the 14th of October, 1859, in Paris, has seen the entire evolution of the modern French school. He was one of the early supporters of Richard Wagner when Wagner was the latest word in music. He assisted Lamoureux, to whom he became related by marriage, in the first production of "Lohengrin" in Paris, in 1887. Chevillard was one of the early proponents of French composers now famous, such as Chabrier and d'Indy, when these composers outraged the conservative. His passion for his art, his unsparing labors to promote the best interests of other composers, many of them less gifted than himself, have become proverbial in Paris.

M. Chevillard became assistant conductor of the Lamoureux concerts in 1890. As the years went by the actual direction of these concerts came more and more into his hands, and the younger composers, finding him their champion in a day of need, flocked in greater and greater numbers to his standard. They found the conductor a man not only of executive genius, but one who was unfailing in his receptivity and enthusiasm for all music, however novel, which showed talent. Such a living spirit would be no small boon to the musical community of Boston.

Describes Experiences of These Eminent Bandsmen Who Fought for France

Ferdinand Thillois, violin.

Leo Croes, clarinet.

Abdun Laus, first bassoon.

Louis Speyer, oboe.

In 1916-17 he was at the first 'cellist of the Philadel- ra. tra- bass player is Agesilao has had a most distin- er. Mr. Villano, an Ital- aduate of the Royal Con- Parma and began his Scala Orchestra, whose then Faccio. He went to ca and played in Brazil, Chili, and for the last 15 n principal contra-bass in heatre of Buenos Ayres. rs he returned to Europe France, England, Italy under the direction of artucci, Mancinelli, Tos- anini, Serafin, Saint-Saens, ager, Leroux and others. as also played under dis- t conductors — Maestri, Calonne, Chevillard and Richter.

A new oboe player is Louis Speger, also from the French Military Band and an artist of most unusual gifts. He was a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire in 1911 and, Mr. Longy says, the most promising oboe player the Conservatoire has produced in many years.

The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Mimart, who was called to military duty in France last spring) and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Mr. Croes served in the Eighth Regiment of Territorial Infantry and was severely wounded at the battle of the Yser in November, 1914. He is a first prize of the Conservatoire of Lille and has played at the Monteux Concerts and at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris. Mr. Sievenard has been a professor at Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureaux Concerts and l'Opera Comique. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Abdon Laus, the new first bassoon, is just 30 years old. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and has played in the principal orchestras of Paris, beside having given four years to the grand opera.

The new first trombone is Mr. Sordillo of this city.

The 86 members of the "Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris," more popularly known as the Paris Symphony Orchestra, have sailed from "somewhere in France" on a French battleship, and are expected to arrive at an Atlantic port before Oct. 1.

Andre Messager will conduct the concerts in this country. The orchestra will appear in 50 of the principal cities in the United States during its stay here of three months.

Several members of the commission whose efforts made possible the sending of France's most prized musical possession to this country are also on board the battleship, and will accompany the orchestra on its travels through this country.

LOBE OCTOBER 4,

ENRI RABAUD WILL CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

ymphony Trustees Get Cable So Announcing

rederick P. Cabot, chairman of the rd of trustees of the Boston Sym- ny Orchestra, received this morning m the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris able saying that Henri Rabaud has epted the conductorship of the Bos- Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19 and that he would sail imme- tely so as to be here early in No- nber.

he engagement of Mr Rabaud brings n end negotiations which have been progress since last April. The un- al conditions brought about by the r increased the difficulties enormous- but there is a feeling now that the blem of selecting the permanent con- tor for the orchestra has been most isfactorily settled. It is fortunate the orchestra was able to secure services of Mr Monteux for the first weeks of the season, his original ve of absence having been extended a week by Mr Gatti-Casazza, with om he has a contract for the Metro- tan Opera House, New York, so that Monteux can conduct the concerts of first Southern trip. By that time Mr baud will be in Boston.

r Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties one of the most distinguished com- ers and musicians of France. His er before him was a musician, a fessor in the Paris Conservatoire, Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de me. For the past five years Mr baud has been one of the principal ductors of the Grand Opera in Par- nd thus has been closely associated Andre Messager, dean of French ductors. He has also done much cert work, having conducted at dif- nt times the Lamoureux, Colonne Monteux Symphony Concerts in is.

s a composer he ranks among the men of France. His Second Sym- ny is a work of greatest importance his "La Procession Nocturne" ich Mr Monteux is playing here in ston in his second program) is one the most popular works in the nch orchestral repertoire.

ast Winter one of the novelties at Metropolitan Opera in New York Mr Rabaud's opera entitled, "Ma- f." Another opera that has had much cess is "La Fille de Roland."

HERALD OCTOBER

SYMPHONY CONDUC

Henri Rabaud, Principal Conductor of the Paris Grand Opera and Eminent Composer, Who Has Accepted an Offer to Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RABAUD ACCEPTS SYMPHONY POST

Conductor of Paris Grand Opera to Direct Boston's Famed Orchestra

FIRST APPEARANCE PROBABLY ON NOV. 15

Henri Rabaud, principal conductor of the Paris Grand Opera, a composer of very high rank and descendant of celebrated musicians, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1918-19.

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, made the announcement yesterday following a cable from the French ministry of fine arts stating that Mr. Rabaud was pleased to accept the offer made him, and would sail for the United States at once. The ministry added its own appreciation of the fact that the Boston orchestra had chosen an eminent French musician as its conductor.

To Conduct First Concert Nov. 15

Mr. Rabaud was born in Paris in 1873. His father was a celebrated 'cellist and professor of the violoncello in the Conservatoire. Mme. Dorus-Gros, the famous singer, was his grandmother. He was graduated from the Conservatoire and in 1894 won the prix de Rome. For 20 years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the most prominent figues in the musical and artistic life of Paris. Aside from his work at the Grand Opera he has been conductor at the Opera Comique and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne, and the Concerts Monteux.

One of the principals novelties of the last season at the Metropolitan Opera

---

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

E

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR NOTED FRENCHMAN

Henri Rabaud Chosen Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Ministry Accepts.

Muck's successor has been chosen, and he is a Frenchman. In other words, to quote verbatim a telegram dated Boston, October 4, and signed W. E. Walter, press representativ Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"The trustees of the Boston Sym phony Orchestra anounced today tha Henri Rabaud, one of the most em nent of French conductors and com posers, had been engaged to be pe manent conductor of the symphon orchestra.

"A cablegram received from t French Ministry of Fine Arts ye terday stated that Mr. Rabaud a cepted the engagement and wou sail as soon as possible for this cou try. The Ministry of Fine Arts a expressed its appreciation that t Boston Symphony Orchestra h chosen the distinguished Frenchm as its conductor.

"Rabaud is best known in t country as a composer. One of principal novelties at the Metropo tan Opera House last season was opera Marouf, his second sympho is a standard work in orchestral r ertoire. He has written much opera and for orchestra.

"At present he is the principal c ductor at the grand opera in Pa under Mossager. This post he filled for seven years. He is a gr uate of the Paris Conservatoire, wh te studied composition with Mas net, and in 1894 he won the Prix Rome.

"Pierre Montaux will conduct orchestra through the first South trip, which ends with its second c cert in New York, Saturday aft noon November 9, and Mr. Rab will take charge of the orchestra mediately on its return to Bos Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud b able to get here in time to pre the program for the important of-town concerts of the orchestra first week of November, Mr. G Cassazza very courteously instru Mr. Montaux's leave of absence one week and thus solved an em rassing problem."

Muck—Dr. Karl Muck, former c ductor of the Boston Symphony chestra, decorated by the Kaiser "somewhere" in the United Sta where, the United States governm —and Dr. Muck—know best.

As told by The Star sometime it was announced the orchestra tends giving a series of five conc in Baltimore this season.

Chevillard, Who May Follow Monteux, Is Noted Conductor

Camille Chevillard.

And now there is talk of Camille Chevillard as the successor of Mr. Monteux at the Boston Symphony concerts. No conductor is more abreast of the latest musical developments of the day, though M. Chevillard's activities as composer and conductor of the Concerts Lamoureux since the death of their founder has riveted his attention particularly on the activities of present-day composers in France.

Camille Chevillard, son of a celebrated 'cellist, born on the 14th of October, 1859, in Paris, has seen the entire evolution of the modern French school. He was one of the early supporters of Richard Wagner when Wagner was the latest word in music. He assisted Lamoureux, to whom he became related by marriage, in the first production of "Lohengrin" in Paris, in 1887. Chevillard was one of the early proponents of French composers now famous, such as Chabrier and d'Indy, when these composers outraged the conservative. His passion for his art, his unsparing labors to promote the best interests of other composers, many of them less gifted than himself, have become proverbial in Paris.

M. Chevillard became assistant conductor of the Lamoureux concerts in 1890. As the years went by the actual direction of these concerts came more and more into his hands, and the younger composers, finding him their champion in a day of need, flocked in greater and greater numbers to his standard. They found the conductor a man not only of executive genius, but one who was unfailing in his receptivity and enthusiasm for all music, however novel, which showed talent. Such a living spirit would be no small boon to the musical community of Boston.

Olin Downes Describes Experiences of These Eminent Bandsmen Who Fought for France

BY OLIN DOWNES

The subscription sale to the general public of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning, Sept. 30, at 8:30. The renewal of subscriptions, which has been in progress for the last 10 days, fully justifies the belief of the trustees that, despite the many disadvantages under which the orchestra has labored since last spring, the season will be one of great prosperity. There are excellent seats to be had, both for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

Much curiosity has been shown on the part of the public as to the new members of the orchestra. Last spring it was announced that five members of the French Military Band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputation will be found in the personnel. In the first violins there will be two new faces—Fredric Fradkin, who will be concert master, and Ferdinand Thillois. Mr. Thillois came to Boston last spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville, in the Department of Arden, July 19, 1890. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, a pupil of Lefort, who also was Fradkin's teacher, and he won the first prize for violin in 1913. He has been a member of both the Colonne and Lamoureux orchestras. At the outbreak of the war he was called to duty in the 91st Infantry and fought through the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin des Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital, playing for his wounded comrades. Both his parents have been prisoners in Germany since 1914, and he does not know what has become of them.

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band. It will be remembered that Mr. Mager, when the French band appeared at the Pop Concert last spring, sang a solo. He is a most versatile musician and, in addition to being a gifted viola player, is regarded as one of the best trombone players in France. Mr. Mager was taken prisoner early in the war and was exchanged in July, 1915. He has since served in Serbia and Salonica.

Mr. Makin, of course, becomes the head of the 'cello section and, sharing the first desk with him will be the veteran Alwin Schroeder, who needs no introduction in Boston. An interesting member of the section will be Géorges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing here made such a profound impression. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, a veteran, and has been one of the principal 'cellists in the Colonne Orchestra of Paris. Another new comer is the Dutch 'cellist, Philip Abbas, who is a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatoire and a pupil of Mossel. When he was 17 he was solo 'cellist of the orchestra at Aix-la-Chapelle. He has been soloist with Sir Henry Wood of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, London; from 1907 to 1911 he was first 'cellist of the Brighton Municipal Orchestra, England, and for three years first 'cellist of the orchestras at Nice, Aix-les-Bains and Biarritz. He has also travelled in France with Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureaux Concerts and l'Opera Comique. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Abdon Laus, the new first bassoon, i[illegible] just 30 years old. He is a first priz[illegible] of the Paris Conse[illegible] played in the princ[illegible] Paris, beside havin[illegible] to the grand opera.

George Misquelle, 'cello.

Ferdinand Thillois, violin.

Leo Croes, clarinet.

Abdun Laus, first bassoon.

Calonne, Chevillard and Richter.

A new oboe player is Louis Speger, also from the French Military Band and an artist of most unusual gifts. He was a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire in 1911 and, Mr. Longy says, the most promising oboe player the Conservatoire has produced in many years.

The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Mimart, who was called to military duty in France last spring) and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Mr. Croes served in the Eighth Regiment of Territorial Infantry and was severely wounded at the battle of the Yser in November, 1914. He is a first prize of the Conservatoire of Lille and has played at the Monteux Concerts and at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris. Mr. Sievenard has been a professor at cent d'Indy. In 1916-17 he was at the desk of the first 'cellist of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

A new contra- bass player is Agesilao Villano, who has had a most distinguished career. Mr. Villano, an Italian, is a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma and began his career in the Scala Orchestra, whose director was then Faccio. He went to South America and played in Brazil, Uruguay and Chili, and for the last 15 years has been principal contra-bass in the Colon Theatre of Buenos Ayres. In the winters he returned to Europe and played in France, England, Italy and Germany under the direction of Mascagni, Martucci, Mancinelli, Toscanini, Campanini, Serafin, Saint-Saens, Rabaud, Messager, Leroux and others. In Italy he has also played under distinguished guest conductors — Maestri,

POST, SEPTEMBER 30,

FRADKIN JOINS THE SYMPHONY

Concert Master Arrives With His $20,000 Violin

FREDRIC FRADKIN,
New concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Guarding his $20,000 Stradivarius violin as though it was his most pre-

RECORD, OCTOBER 4

RABAUD WILL LEAD SYMPHONY THIS SEASON

Henri Rabaud, the French conductor and composer, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will begin his association with the orchestra six weeks after the opening. The first five weeks' concerts will be in charge of Pierre Monteux, the conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, who was loaned to the Boston organization pending its decision of a regular conductor.

The acceptance of the post by Rabaud was made positive by the receipt at Symphony Hall this morning of a cablegram from the Minister of Fine Art of France, stating that France gave Rabaud permission to relinquish his duties in Paris and go to America for the season.

The management of the orchestra in announcing Rabaud's engagement issued this statement: "The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled.

"Mr. Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father before him was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris. As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr. Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

"Last winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr. Rabaud's opera entitled 'Marouf.' Another opera that has had much success is 'La Fille de Roland.'"

GLOBE OCTOBER 4,

HENRI RABAUD WILL CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

Symphony Trustees Get Cable So Announcing

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received this morning from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris a cable saying that Henri Rabaud has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19 and that he would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

The engagement of Mr Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since last April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled. It is fortunate that the orchestra was able to secure the services of Mr Monteux for the first five weeks of the season, his original leave of absence having been extended for a week by Mr Gatti-Casazza, with whom he has a contract for the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, so that Mr Monteux can conduct the concerts of the first Southern trip. By that time Mr Rabaud will be in Boston.

Mr Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father before him was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris.

As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

Last Winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr Rabaud's opera entitled, "Marouf." Another opera that has had much success is "La Fille de Roland."

HERALD OCTOBER

SYMPHONY CONDUC

Henri Rabaud, Principal Conductor of the Paris Grand Opera and Eminent Composer, Who Has Accepted an Offer to Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RABAUD ACCEPTS SYMPHONY POST

Conductor of Paris Grand Opera to Direct Boston's Famed Orchestra

FIRST APPEARANCE PROBABLY ON NOV. 15

Henri Rabaud, principal conductor of the Paris Grand Opera, a composer of very high rank and descendant of celebrated musicians, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1918-19.

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, made the announcement yesterday following a cable from the French ministry of fine arts stating that Mr. Rabaud was pleased to accept the offer made him, and would sail for the United States at once. The ministry added its own appreciation of the fact that the Boston orchestra had chosen an eminent French musician as its conductor.

To Conduct First Concert Nov. 15

Mr. Rabaud was born in Paris in 1873. His father was a celebrated 'cellist and professor of the violoncello in the Conservatoire. Mme. Dorus-Gros, the famous singer, was his grandmother. He was graduated from the Conservatoire and in 1894 won the prix de Rome. For 20 years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the most prominent figues in the musical and artistic life of Paris. Aside from his work at the Grand Opera he has been conductor at the Opera Comique and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne, and the Concerts Monteux.

One of the principals novelties of the last season at the Metropolitan Opera House was his opera, "Marouf," which held its premiere in Paris in 1914. It is expected that Mr. Rabaud will make his debut as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts to be given Nov. 15 and 16. Mr. Monteux will conduct all the concerts on the first southern trip in November.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Es

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR NOTED FRE

Henri Rabaud Chosen D the Boston Symphony tra; Ministry Acc

Muck's successor has b and he is a Frenchman words, to quote verbatim dated Boston, October 4, W. E. Walter, press re Boston Symphony Orches

"The trustees of the B phony Orchestra anounce Henri Rabaud, one of th nent of French conductor posers, had been engage manent conductor of th orchestra.

"A cablegram receive French Ministry of Fin terday stated that Mr. cepted the engagement sail as soon as possible f try. The Ministry of Fi expressed its appreciati Boston Symphony Or chosen the distinguished as its conductor.

"Rabaud is best kn country as a composer. principal novelties at t tan Opera House last se opera Marouf, his seco is a standard work in o ertoire. He has writt opera and for orchestra.

"At present he is the ductor at the grand op under Mossager. This filled for seven years. uate of the Paris Conse te studied composition net, and in 1894 he wo Rome.

"Pierre Montaux wil orchestra through the trip, which ends with i cert in New York, Sa noon November 9, and will take charge of the mediately on its retur Owing to doubt of Mr. able to get here in ti the program for the i of-town concerts of the first week of Novem Cassazza very courteo Mr. Montaux's leave one week and thus so rassing problem."

Muck—Dr. Karl Muc ductor of the Boston chestra, decorated by "somewhere" in the where, the United Sta —and Dr. Muck—kno

As told by The Sta it was announced t tends giving a series in Baltimore this sea

Chevillar Mo

Camille Ch

And now there is Chevillard as the Monteux at the Bost certs. No conductor of the latest musica the day, though M. ties as composer and Concerts Lamoureux their founder has riv particularly on the ac day composers in Fr

Camille Chevillard, brated 'cellist, born tober, 1859, in Paris,

George Misquelle, 'cello.

Ferdinand Thillois, violin.

Leo Croes, clarinet.

Abdun Laus, first bassoon.

Louis Speyer, oboe.

r, who needs no in-
on. An interesting ion will be Georges
the French band, made such a pro-
le is a first prize of toire, a veteran, and e principal 'cellists estra of Paris. Ans the Dutch 'cellist, is a graduate of the vatoire and a pupil he was 17 he was orchestra at Aixas been soloist with f the Queen's Hall from 1907 to 1911 he the Brighton Municgland, and for three f the orchestras at and Biarritz. He n France with Vincent d'Indy. In 1916-17 he was at the desk of the first 'cellist of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

A new contra-bass player is Agesilao Villano, who has had a most distinguished career. Mr. Villano, an Italian, is a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma and began his career in the Scala Orchestra, whose director was then Faccio. He went to South America and played in Brazil, Uruguay and Chili, and for the last 15 years has been principal contra-bass in the Colon Theatre of Buenos Ayres. In the winters he returned to Europe and played in France, England, Italy and Germany under the direction of Mascagni, Martucci, Mancinelli, Toscanini, Campanini, Serafin, Saint-Saens, Rabaud, Messager, Leroux and others. In Italy he has also played under distinguished guest conductors — Maestri, Calonne, Chevillard and Richter.

A new oboe player is Louis Speger, also from the French Military Band and an artist of most unusual gifts. He was a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire in 1911 and, Mr. Longy says, the most promising oboe player the Conservatoire has produced in many years.

The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Mimart, who was called to military duty in France last spring) and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Mr. Croes served in the Eighth Regiment of Territorial Infantry and was severely wounded at the battle of the Yser in November, 1914. He is a first prize of the Conservatoire of Lille and has played at the Monteux Concerts and at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris. Mr. Sievenard has been a professor at Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureaux Concerts and l'Opera Comique. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Abdon Laus, the new first bassoon, is just 30 years old. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and has played in the principal orchestras of Paris, beside having given four years to the grand opera.

The new first trombone is Mr. Sordillo of this city.

The 86 members of the "Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris," more popularly known as the Paris Symphony Orchestra, have sailed from "somewhere in France" on a French battleship, and are expected to arrive at an Atlantic port before Oct. 1.

Andre Messager will conduct the concerts in this country. The orchestra will appear in 50 of the principal cities in the United States during its stay here of three months.

Several members of the commission whose efforts made possible the sending of France's most prized musical possession to this country are also on board the battleship, and will accompany the orchestra on its travels through this country.

, OCTOBER 4

UD WILL SYMPHONY HIS SEASON

abaud, the French con-l composer, has accepted ctorship of the Boston Orchestra. He will begin ion with the orchestra six r the opening. The first concerts will be in charge Monteux, the conductor of pera at the Metropolitan use, New York, who was the Boston organization s decision of a regular conceptance of the post by as made positive by the re-Symphony Hall this morning gram from the Minister of of France, stating that ave Rabaud permission to his duties in Paris and go a for the season.

anagement of the orchestra
ncing Rabaud's engagement is statement: "The engage-
Mr. Rabaud brings to an end ons which have been in prog-e April. The unusual condi-ought about by the war in-he difficulties enormously, but a feeling now that the probselecting the permanent conor the orchestra has been most orily settled.

Rabaud is a man in his mid-and one of the most dis-ed composers and musicians of His father before him was a n, a professor in the Paris Conire, and Rabaud was a winner Prix de Rome. For the past ars Mr. Rabaud has been one principal conductors of the Opera in Paris, and thus has losely associated with Andre er, dean of French conductors.
s also done much concert work, conducted at different times moureux, Colonne and Monteux ony Concerts in Paris. As a ser he ranks among the first f France. His Second Symphony ork of greatest importance and La Procession Nocturne" (which Monteux is playing here in Bos-n his second program) is one of ost popular works in the French stral repertoire.

ast winter one of the novelties at Metropolitan Opera in New York
Mr. Rabaud's opera entitled ouf.' Another opera that has had n success is 'La Fille de Roland.'"

GLOBE OCTOBER 4,

HENRI RABAUD WILL CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

Symphony Trustees Get Cable So Announcing

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received this morning from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris a cable saying that Henri Rabaud has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19 and that he would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

The engagement of Mr Rabaud brings to an end negotiations which have been in progress since last April. The unusual conditions brought about by the war increased the difficulties enormously, but there is a feeling now that the problem of selecting the permanent conductor for the orchestra has been most satisfactorily settled. It is fortunate that the orchestra was able to secure the services of Mr Monteux for the first five weeks of the season, his original leave of absence having been extended for a week by Mr Gatti-Casazza, with whom he has a contract for the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, so that Mr Monteux can conduct the concerts of the first Southern trip. By that time Mr Rabaud will be in Boston.

Mr Rabaud is a man in his mid-forties and one of the most distinguished composers and musicians of France. His father before him was a musician, a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and Rabaud was a winner of the Prix de Rome. For the past five years Mr Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and thus has been closely associated with Andre Messager, dean of French conductors. He has also done much concert work, having conducted at different times the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux Symphony Concerts in Paris.

As a composer he ranks among the first men of France. His Second Symphony is a work of greatest importance and his "La Procession Nocturne" (which Mr Monteux is playing here in Boston in his second program) is one of the most popular works in the French orchestral repertoire.

Last Winter one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was Mr Rabaud's opera entitled, "Marouf." Another opera that has had much success is "La Fille de Roland."

HERALD OCTOBER

SYMPHONY CONDUC

Henri Rabaud, Principal Conductor of the Paris Grand Opera and Eminent Composer, Who Has Accepted an Offer to Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RABAUD ACCEPTS SYMPHONY POST

Conductor of Paris Grand Opera to Direct Boston's Famed Orchestra

FIRST APPEARANCE PROBABLY ON NOV. 15

Henri Rabaud, principal conductor of the Paris Grand Opera, a composer of very high rank and descendant of celebrated musicians, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1918-19.

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, made the announcement yesterday following a cable from the French ministry of fine arts stating that Mr. Rabaud was pleased to accept the offer made him, and would sail for the United States at once. The ministry added its own appreciation of the fact that the Boston orchestra had chosen an eminent French musician as its conductor.

To Conduct First Concert Nov. 15

Mr. Rabaud was born in Paris in 1873. His father was a celebrated 'cellist and professor of the violoncello in the Conservatoire. Mme. Dorus-Gros, the famous singer, was his grandmother. He was graduated from the Conservatoire and in 1894 won the prix de Rome. For 20 years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the most prominent figues in the musical and artistic life of Paris. Aside from his work at the Grand Opera he has been conductor at the Opera Comique and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne, and the Concerts Monteux.

One of the principals novelties of the last season at the Metropolitan Opera House was his opera, "Marouf," which held its premiere in Paris in 1914. It is expected that Mr. Rabaud will make his debut as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts to be given Nov. 15 and 16. Mr. Monteux will conduct all the concerts on the first southern trip in November.

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Es

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR NOTED FRENCHMAN

Henri Rabaud Chosen Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Ministry Accepts.

Muck's successor has been chosen and he is a Frenchman. In other words, to quote verbatim a telegram dated Boston, October 4, and signed W. E. Walter, press representative Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra anounced today that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra.

"A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts yesterday stated that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The Ministry of Fine Arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

"Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season was his opera Marouf, his second symphony is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra.

"At present he is the principal conductor at the grand opera in Paris under Mossager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied composition with Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

"Pierre Montaux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, which ends with its second concert in New York, Saturday afternoon November 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud being able to get here in time to prepare the program for the important out-of-town concerts of the orchestra the first week of November, Mr. Gatti Cassazza very courteously instructed Mr. Montaux's leave of absence for one week and thus solved an embarrassing problem."

Muck—Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, decorated by the Kaiser—is "somewhere" in the United States where, the United States government—and Dr. Muck—know best.

As told by The Star sometime ago it was announced the orchestra intends giving a series of five concerts in Baltimore this season.

Chevillard, Who May Follow Monteux, Is Noted Conductor

Camille Chevillard.

And now there is talk of Camille Chevillard as the successor of Mr. Monteux at the Boston Symphony concerts. No conductor is more abreast of the latest musical developments of the day, though M. Chevillard's activities as composer and conductor of the Concerts Lamoureux since the death of their founder has riveted his attention particularly on the activities of present-day composers in France.

Camille Chevillard, son of a celebrated 'cellist, born on the 14th of October, 1859, in Paris, has seen the entire evolution of the modern French school. He was one of the early supporters of Richard Wagner when Wagner was the latest word in music. He assisted Lamoureux, to whom he became related by marriage, in the first production of "Lohengrin" in Paris, in 1887. Chevillard was one of the early proponents of French composers now famous, such as Chabrier and d'Indy, when these composers outraged the conservative. His passion for his art, his unsparing labors to promote the best interests of other composers, many of them less gifted than himself, have become proverbial in Paris.

M. Chevillard became assistant conductor of the Lamoureux concerts in 1890. As the years went by the actual direction of these concerts came more and more into his hands, and the younger composers, finding him their champion in a day of need, flocked in greater and greater numbers to his standard. They found the conductor a man not only of executive genius, but one who was unfailing in his receptivity and enthusiasm for all music, however novel, which showed talent. Such a living spirit would be no small boon to the musical community of Boston.

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MONITOR OCTOBER 5,

M. RABAUD TO LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Distinguished Exponent of Modern French School Accepts Offer and Will Sail at Once—His Record as a Composer

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have announced that they have succeeded in obtaining the services of Henri Rabaud, one of the leaders of the modern French school, to conduct the remaining concerts of the season after the leave of absence of M. Monteux from the Metropolitan Opera Company has expired. Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, has received a cable from the French Ministry of Fine Arts saying that M. Rabaud would sail immediately for America. He will probably conduct for the first time in Boston at the concerts of Nov. 15 and 16.

M. Rabaud is a native of Paris and comes from a musical family. His father was a 'cello player and teacher of that instrument in the Conservatoire and one of his grandmothers, Madame Dorus-Gros, was a famous singer. M. Rabaud is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire and in 1894 he won the Grand Prix de Rome. The next four years he spent in Rome living at the Villa Medici, and when his studies there were finished he organized a series of concerts in Rome and in the next year one in Vienna for the purpose of familiarizing the musical publics of those cities with modern French music.

In the last 20 years he has been one of the outstanding figures in the musical and artistic life of Paris. He has been conductor at the Grand Opéra and at the Opéra Comique and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne and the Concerts Monteux.

In the United States M. Rabaud is known through his work as composer. His first symphony was produced in Paris in 1895, his next work of importance was a divertissement for orchestra on Russian folk songs, which was played for the first time at a Concert Colonne in 1901. His second symphony had been performed at a Concert Colonne in 1899. A symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne" appeared in the same year. Two choral works of importance were also produced in Paris, one the oratorio "Job" in 1900 and a setting of the Fourth Psalm for solo, chorus and orchestra in 1901. He has composed three operas, the first, "La Fille de Roland," produced at the Opéra Comique in 1904, the second, "Le Premier Glaive," produced in the Arena at Beziers in 1908, and the third, "Marouf," produced in Paris in 1914 which was one of the novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season. The second symphony had four performances in New York last season and was also heard at the Worcester Festival of 1917. M. Monteux had scheduled Rabaud's symphonic poem "La Procession Nocturne" on the first program in which he was to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From REPUBLICAN
Address Springfield, Mass.
Date

Est

Pierre Monteux, temporary conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, professes his willingness to give up German music if doing so will help to win the war. But he cannot see why the classics of German music should be excluded from symphony programs. Personally, however, he will not play Wagner or the works of any living German or Austrian composer. He objects particularly to the music of Richard Strauss, among contemporaries. He will play Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schumann, Schubert and Brahms. Probably the great majority of concert-goers will acquiesce in the exclusion of works by contemporary Germans, who no doubt receive royalties on all performances, but there are different opinions about the desirability of dropping Wagner. Sir Henry Wood, conductor of the promenade concerts in London, who was eagerly sought as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, put six of Wagner's familiar pieces on the program of one of his recent London concerts.

Drawn for The Christian Science Monitor

Henri Rabaud

Chosen conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 4,

ADVERTISER AMERICAN OCTOBER 6,

SYMPHONY HEAD IS A COMPOSER

M. Rabaud's Orchestration Familiar Already in American Cities

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

After a long period of uncertainty our Symphony Orchestra has been supplied with a head. One cannot say that the mountain has brought forth a mouse, for M. Henri Rabaud, who has been appointed conductor, has an international reputation as a composer, but his attainments as a conductor are by no means as widely established as those of Monteux, Chevillard or Messager.

It is evident that the committee of the concerts was confining its endeavors in the search for a new conductor chiefly to France, and this is peculiarly fitting in these times when the two countries stand closer than any other. It may result in a grace and finesse of interpretation that will contrast with some of the seasons of the past.

That Rabaud is an adept in orchestral work is proved by his works in the large forms. Of his two symphonies one has been heard in several American cities. His operas seem the more important works, however. His "Le Fille de Roland" (first given at the Opera Comique in Paris), had considerable success. His oratorio "Job" has not been so widely known.

He is by no means an old man, since next Thursday will be his forty-fifth birthday.

From RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

14

FRENCHMAN SUCCEEDS MUCK

Henri Rabaud New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. This word was received today by the Symphony trustees in a cable message from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would reach Boston early in November.

For the last five years M. Raboud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris and also has done much concert work. His engagement brings to an end negotiations in progress since last spring, when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

As Paris Sends Him to Boston

Henri Rabaud

Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for 1918-19

HENRI RABAUD, the Parisian composer and conductor, will be the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-1919. The Trustees of the band received this morning by cable his acceptance of their proffer along with acknowledgment from the Department of Fine Arts in the Government of the bestowal of so distinguished a post upon a French musician. Mr. Rabaud expects to be soon on his way to Boston—in time to begin work early in November. In all probability he will conduct for the first time [illegible] his new audience at the [illegible] of Nov. 15 and 16, when Mr. Monteux, the present leader, has returned to the Metropolitan Opera House.

Man and Music

Americans who have frequented the Opéra, the Opéra-Comique and symphony concerts in Paris will readily recall Mr. Rabaud—an unusual and pictorial figure, whether he was conductor or only intent listener, tall, gaunt, bearded, olive-skinned, grave of glance and quick of gesture, oriental rather than Parisian in impression to the eye. None the less, he was born in Paris in 1873, the son of a professor at the Conservatory. In that school he was educated as a musician and in the nineties began the practice of his calling in Paris. As conductor he served with increasing skill and reputation at the Opéra, at the Opéra-Comique and in occasional orchestral concerts. As composer, he wrote symphonies, tone-poems, operas and a single oratorio, "Job." The second of his two symphonies has been heard relatively often in America—at the hands of the Boston Orchestral Club under Mr. Longy, of the New Yory Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Damrosch, of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski, and at the Worcester Festival last autumn. His symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," has been less frequently played in the United States, but Mr. Longy ventured it several years ago in Boston, and it is announced for performance next month at the Symphony Concerts. Of his three operas, only one, "Marouf, Savetier de Caire," produced at the Metropolitan last December, is known by actual representation in America. The other two, "La Fille de Roland" and "Par le Glaive"—heroic pieces drawn from the like-named plays of de Bornier and Richepin—have been heard only in Paris and, possibly, Brussels. In contrast, "Marouf" recounts with no little humor and fantasy a fable from The Arabian Nights.

The Composer

As composer, Mr. Rabaud is neither academic nor ultra-modern. Rather, as his music for both the theatre and the concert-hall suggests, he is eclectic, following no formula, but seeking such forms and procedures as best suit the substance, mood and progress of his music. When his symphony in E minor was played at Worcester a year ago, the reviewer for the Transcript wrote of Mr. Rabaud as the piece disclosed him:

> Mr. Rabaud is of none of the "chapels"—or little groups of Parisian composers, practising like methods and pursuing like ends—that are both bane and blessing to French music. He is too robust-minded to be of the "chapel" of Debussy; too serious-minded to walk in the ways of Saint-Saëns; less austere and cerebral than d'Indyian faith and practice exact; more willing to continue the long symphonic line and to hear the voices of the German romantics than is Ravel. Like Schmitt, his [illegible] quests, standards, procedure are his own and of the accepted goal, quality, ways and means of symphonic music in our time. That is to say, Mr. Rabaud employs the usual modern orchestra, without "additional instruments" and with no arbitrary divisions or abortive unions of the different choirs. In his instrumental coloring, so far as this second symphony, in E minor, goes, he makes no use of the vaporous harmonies, the chordal juxtapositions, the hollow progressions commonly called ultra-modern and Parisian. Yet with an open ear, he has heard the pungent or penetrating semi-tones of Franck. He accepts the orthodox symphonic form—the four movements in the accustomed order, each written with a terseness and economy of matter and means that is curiously Bramsian and not at all of the fashion of this luxuriant tonal day.
>
> On the other hand, Mr. Rabaud seems to treat his first movement as a kind of prologue; while through the rest of the symphony occurs and recurs a "motto-motive" variously treated and transformed that in the finale largely and fervently dominates the music. Side by side with it and ultimately gathered within it returns a stern and sombre motive of the prologue. Thus Mr. Rabaud gives his symphony the unity, justly dear to the Gallic mind; glances slantwise at Tschaikovsky's practice to send a haunting theme through the varying course of a symphony; and accepts in his own fashion the Lisztian gospel of community of music idea and the Franckian "cyclic" theory of ascendant theme in fuller and fuller voice. Academic prescriptions of repetitions and return within the symphonic form he waves aside, like every other sensible composer of today, when they might hinder his musical design and expressive ends; but unlike many a Parisian, he does not eschew the full-throated Wagnerian harmonies or the large Wagnerian climax. Clearly an eclectic symphony.

"Marouf," in the performance at the Metropolitan Opera House, with Mr. Monteux as conductor and with a serviceable cast, made like impression of an eclectic mind and spirit in the composer. Again the reviewer for The Transcript wrote:

> If from time to time the hearer finds himself in doubt whether to take the piece as burlesque, or romantic comedy, or romantic tragedy, the fault lies with the music, which, when it remains one thing for any single extended passage, is usually capital. In the narrower, technical matters of modulation, Rabaud seems impeccable. But in the problems of taste, of style and manner, and in general of musical creation, he is strangely at sea. One can enumerate half a dozen distinct strains of which the music is composed—a process never quite cricket and sometimes misleading, ut in the present case unescapable. Massenet, Puccini, and the Russians, Lalo, Franck and Charpentier, are all there, and in nearly equal proportions. The music is now suave with "Thais"-like melody, now sparkling with the intricate harmonies of Dukas, now throbbing with the breath-like accomplishment which we associate with "Pelléas" And except in a few passages, it never remains the same for more than a few successive seconds.
>
> In the problem of style, no less than this problem of manner, Rabaud seems to be at a loss to come to a clear realization of what he wishes to do. There are moments when the music seems to sparkle as in the old opera-bouffe of Lecocq and Audran. Yet even the early Wagner coud not be more thunderously expressive than is the composer in the passages, such as that of the threat to the vizier, which he chooses to take as dramatic. Again, Thais and Louise never told their loves more ardently than does the Princess in her air in the fourth act. Whether the piece is to be dramatic, or pictorial, or humorous, or exotic or frankly romantic, the composer never seems able to decide. Now he seeks florid expression, now the literalness of realistic comment in voice and orchestra, and again an accompaniment of symphonic breadth and proportions. It is in this latter style that he seems most happy, especially in the really brilliant passage describing the approach of the caravan in the last act.

The Conductor

As conductor, Mr. Rabaud, like many of his predecessors, will come to the Symphony Orchestra, from the opera house rather than the concert-hall. Deservedly his Parisian reputation as orchestral leader is high, if not signal; while here in Boston he will have forces, freedom and opportunity such as he has never enjoyed before and such as are sure to stimulate him. He is practised master of orchestral routine; he is diligent in rehearsal; he wins the respect and the good will of his men as he does, indeed, of all who come into close contact with him. By the warrant of his eclectic music his programmes through twenty pairs of concerts with the Symphony Orchestra, should be catholic enough to please the most exacting. Clearly, in all that pertains to music, he is open-minded. As plainly, by the token of his symphonic pieces and his opera of "Marouf," he lacks neither sense of rhythm nor sense of color—both essential qualities in a conductor. Above all, by many a sign on the pages of his music, Mr. Rabaud has a true Gallic lucidity of mind He sets down unmistakably what he would say in tones and indicates as precisely the manner in which it should be said. A like sense of design, procedure, result, presumably distinguishes him as conductor. In the familiar phrase that orchestras apply to leaders whom they serve willingly, "he will know what he wants and get it."

AMERICAN OCTOBER 5,

UB SYMPHONY READY FOR A NEW SEASON

By FRED J. McISAAC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is bravely facing a new season with a new conductor, two of them, in fact, a greatly changed personnel and tremendously altered ideals.

Everything German has gone overboard.

The Boston Symphony is now a French band. The musical impulses of Paris will henceforth govern this orchestra, not Berlin. Some day, let us hope, that the Boston Symphony will reflect the musical pulse of Boston.

Henri Rabaud, who will conduct all except the first few concerts, is one of the most distinguished of French conductors. Looking at symphonic music through Teutonic glasses as we have been doing for so many years we didn't think much of French conductors. Neither did the Germans. They didn't think much of French generals either, but you can see they were mistaken. Probably they were mistaken about French conductors too. They were mistaken about so many things.

There is no use in blinking at the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra lost prestige and repute last season. Looking backwards it is astonishing to think of the fatuity of the management which imagined it could tour this country, engaged in a righteous war with the obscene Teuton, and present an orchestra led by a celebrated German conductor and containing twenty-five or thirty alien enemies, simply because they were good musicians.

When art bumps up against patriotism it always gets horribly mussed.

But the Boston Symphony Orchestra wasn't any worse than most other symphony orchestras in the country. Nearly all of them were led by Huns and contained large quantities of individuals who muttered "American swine" through their teeth, as they played the "Star Spangled Banner" for their daily bread.

The trouble was that music in America had been under the thumb of German Kultur.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, despite its American location, was as German as the Rhine. So was the Chicago Symphony, the Cincinnati and other orchestras.

To the Germans there was no opera except Wagner, and no symphonic music except their own.

The German conductors told us that our own composers were dreadful, that the Italians didn't know anything about orchestral music, and the French music of the present day was pure "decadence" like the nation. Our music lovers believed them implicitly.

MELODY-STRAFERS.

Meanwhile in Germany melody had been treated chemically, analyzed, and pronounced valueless. We were told that the theme was of no importance compared with the treatment, and to prove it, none of the modern German composers made use of any that were worth listening to. They had a mathematical formula for orchestration, and after four or five years of study any industrious youth could turn out a symphony lasting one hour which kept an orchestra of a hundred men working like Trojans from start to finish.

The laws of music impeding these industrious composers, they treated them like their countrymen have treated the laws of war, trod upon them, maltreated, crucified them.

It got so these modern Germans and their hypnotized followers in this country couldn't abide the strains of Beethoven, Haydn and Mozart. The sweet and gentle classics bored them exceedingly. Regularly Boston Symphony Hall resounded with the outrageous Krupp music of dunderhead composers, graduates of various German symphony foundries. When a classic symphony slipped into the program, the German and the Germanophiles grunted with disgust.

Well, thank heaven, that's all over. No more bad German music; no more Reger; no more Strauss. Something tells me that we shall hear much French music, more Italian and possibly more American works.

RABAUD A PARISIAN.

Rabaud, the permanent conductor, comes from Paris. He was conductor of the National Opera, and has conducted the Lamoureux, Colonne and Monteux orchestras. He has been very prominent musically in the French capital for twenty years and as a composer has written symphonies and operas.

"Marouf," a musical setting of a tale from the Arabian Nights was done last season at the Metropolitan. His second symphony and his "Procession Nocturne" are the best known of his orchestral works in this country.

Rabaud is not a name to conjure with, to be sure, but he was the very best French conductor available, and when you come to think of it the great names in the symphonic world were obliterated from the consideration of the Symphony directors by the fact that they were all German or Austrian.

There is one criticism that can be fairly made regarding the choice of the conductor. When the directors found that there was no surpassingly great man available abroad, and an unknown man had to be tried, why didn't they choose an American? There were several available who would mean more to American audiences than Rabaud.

Some day the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have to be entirely American.

om EVENING GLOBE

dress: New York City

te 1918

FRENCHMAN SUCCEEDS MUCK AS ORCHESTRA LEADER

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Dr. Karl Muck for the season of 1918-19. This word was received to-day by the symphony trustees in a cablegram from the inistry of fine arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would sail immediately to be here early in November.

For the past five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the grand opera in Paris and has also done much concert work. His orchestra compositions include the Second Symphony and "La Procession Nocturne," while among his operas are "Marouf" and "La Fille de Roland."

m SUN

dress: Baltimore, Md.

CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Henri Rabaud, French Composer, Succeeds Muck.

Boston, Oct. 4. — Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. This word was received today by the Symphony trustees in a cable message from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that M. Rabaud would reach Boston early in November.

For the last five years M. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris and also has done much concert work. His engagement brings to an end negotiations in progress since last spring, when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

TRANSCRIPT OCTOBER 5

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Aftermath from Mr. Rabaud—The Next Coming of Mme. Galli-Curci and Mr. McCormack — Mr. Laparra's Spanish Cycle—Concerts in Prospect

A French book of reference misled The Transcript yesterday into the statement that Mr. Rabaud, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, has written an opera, "Par le Glaive," drawn from the like-named play by Richepin. The piece in question actually bears title "Le Premier Glaive" and is an heroic tragedy with music designed for performance on a large scale out of doors. It was, indeed, so represented in the amphitheatre at Béziers. The text is the original verse of a minor poet and not Richepin's.

In view of the confident assertions that Mr. Chevillard was to receive the post now bestowed upon Mr. Rabaud, it is amusing to quote from the Parisian newspaper, Le Temps, the announcement that "the Concerts Colonne-Lamoureux will be resumed on Sunday, Oct. 20, with Messieurs Camille Chevillard and Gabriel Pierné as conductors."

Seemingly, Mr. Rakhmaninov, the Russian conductor, composer and pianist, will not revisit the United States this season. Recent newspapers from England hint as much and announce his appearance in the course of the winter at various concerts in London, Manchester, Liverpool. If the conductorship of the Boston Orchestra was offered to him, he declined it—as some surmise—largely from dread of the physical and nervous strain a hundred concerts a season would lay upon him. In body Mr. Rakhmaninov is not strong; while in work he prefers inclination to routine.

Neither Mme. Galli-Curci nor Mr. McCormack will be heard in Boston until January, when each singer will have a Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The engagements of both were such as to make it impossible to replace earlier the cancelled concerts.

Mr. Bauer, the pianist, unheard in Boston last season, and Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, now more than ever established with this public, are to share the Sunday Concert at Symphony Hall on Oct. 27. Sonatas for piano and violin, in which the two virtuosi are familiar partners, and solo pieces for each of them will fill a "serious" programme.

Sascha Jacobsen, the young violinist, who once interested an audience here in a recital of his own, will appear with Mr. Lazaro at the tenor's concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 20.

The novel concert in which Mr. Laparra's cycle of Spanish songs and dances will be heard for the first time in Boston is appointed for Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, in Symphony Hall. Mr. Laparra, of course, is the French composer, now resident in New York, whose music-dramas, "La Habanera" and "La Jota," proved his imagination and power with grim music of peasant tragedy in Spanish scene. More recently he has written these songs and dances of Spain, province by province, as occasional folk-pieces but oftener his own memories and imagination suggested them. In all there are twenty-three—Basque, Andalusian, Castilian, Catalonian, and Aragonese—music of many moods and as various of image. Miss Helen Stanley, the soprano, occasionally heard here, will sing the songs and Mr. Laparra himself will play the piano part through the whole cycle. The announcements name it "A Musical Journey Through Spain."

The good news comes that Mr. Ornstein will undertake three concerts in Boston in the course of the season. His own music, old and new, will have place on his programmes, but in the main they will be such as any open-minded and eager pianist would make. He has not appeared here for nearly two years and in that time his notable abilities as pianist have ripened with no lessening of his individuality.

In these days a concert calendar is difficult to make since the future depends upon the will of the municipal authorities as to the reopening of theatres and halls and upon the return of the city to its normal life. If reopening is permitted on Oct. 14, the concerts in near prospect are:

Thursday evening, Oct. 17, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the first of the usual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Hofmann as assisting pianist.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 18, in Symphony Hall, the first of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting, and Mr. Hofmann as assisting pianist. The programme will comprise Franck's symphony, Loeffler's early tone-poem, "Que Tu ne t'en Ailles," Liszt's concerto in E-flat and the first suite of dances arranged by Ravel from his ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." Hitherto it has not been heard in Boston.

Saturday evening, Oct. 19, in Symphony Hall, the first of the evening concerts of the Symphony, with Mr. Monteux, Mr. Hofmann and the programme already noted.

Sunday afternoon, Oct. 20, in Symphony Hall, a concert by Mr. Lazaro, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House and of many a record, applauded for full-throated song, resounding high notes and uncommon skill in florid and ornate measures. He will sing operatic airs, French and Spanish songs. Sascha Jacobsen, an interesting young violinist, will assist him.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 25, in Symphony Hall, the second of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting.

Saturday evening, Oct. 26, in Symphony Hall, the second of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting.

POST, OCTOBER 6,

MONTEUX FINDS U. S. MUSICIANS FAST READERS

Rapid Sight Players, He Tells Olin Downes

Conductor Pierre Monteux.

BY OLIN DOWNES

I tried last week to get Pierre Monteux, who will conduct the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season of 1918-19, to speak at some length of his work and the musical policies he intends to pursue while leading the Boston orchestra this fall.

But Mr. Monteux would rather work than talk, and when he talks would rather discuss other things than his work.

He spent the summer as the tenant and guest of John McCormack, the tenor, on Mr. McCormack's place, at Norton, Conn., a small house well in the trees, near the sound, along the shores of which he motored in the intervals of his work.

Working with Mr. McCormack, Mr. Monteux had found him not only a rarely accomplished singer, but an admirable musician—which is not necessarily the same thing—and a very broadminded and thoughtful artist, with a sure taste for the best and most interesting music, new or old.

Mr. Monteux did not share the opinion of the celebrated pianist, who remarked that a tenor was "not a voice, but a disease"! Mr. McCormack was a delightful companion, as well as fellow musician.

When Mr. Monteux talks he looks straight at you, as clearly, frankly, fearlessly as a child, and you know him immediately. At least you know the thing which it is most important to know about anyone. You know his absolute sincerity. You are certain of much human kindness and the loftiest attitude toward his art. You recognize a typical French clarity of vision, which is mental, as well as physical, and you know that if Diogenes had met Monteux he would put out his lantern, realizing for a certainty that he had discovered an honest man.

Also a very unassuming man. Yet the little that he told about his career, or that the little I was able to piece together, has for me an essentially dramatic quality. "Dramatic" because of the manner in which the events of the man's life seem to have dovetailed in with his own most deep-seated desires.

From the time he was 12, when he entered the Paris Conservatoire, he thought and dreamed of one thing—to conduct an orchestra. And not even the war, which interfered so terribly with artistic developments, especially in France, has kept him from advancing very rapidly on a chosen path.

In practically a decade Monteux has progressed from the position of an assistant conductor of the celebrated Colonne concerts in Paris to an appointment which is one of the most important that can be conferred on a musician—and this in addition to his position as a leading conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York.

His Musical Record

He played the violin at the Conservatoire. Among other thing[illegible] he also [illegible] 1893—he is now 43—he became in the same year the violist of the celebrated Geloso String Quartet and first violist of the Colonne Orchestra. For years he and Mr. Longy, present first oboist of the Boston Symphony, were members of this body.

A new generation of musicians was then springing up in France—young men possessed of a holy enthusiasm and curiosity to know intimately the music of all great masters, to understand symphonic and instrumental music, as well as operatic works, which had been in previous years the principal occupation of French musicians.

In course of orchestra rehearsals Colonne became personally interested in Monteux and assisted him to get experience with the baton. It was Colonne, with the enthusiastic assistance of Monteux, who was an early enthusiast for Brahms, who performed that composer's Fourth Symphony for the first time in Paris.

The Russian ballet came to Paris—the organization which was eventually the means of bringing Mr. Monteux to America. Diaghileff wanted someone to prepare the orchestra for performances of "Scheherazade" and also Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." Monteux prepared them, with the understanding that the appointed conductor of the ballet should take the baton when time came for the performances.

"Then," said Mr. Monteaux, "a thing occurred which pleased me very much. Strawinsky came to my rehearsals. We talked over the music—which is very wonderful, and very hard for an orchestra. Strawinsky went to Mr. Diaghileff, 'I wish this man to conduct "Petrouchko." ' Therefore, I conducted the premiere and the following performances of this work, which I shall direct this winter when it is produced at the Metropolitan. Later, the Russian ballet asked me to America and—I am here!

"To go back a little: In 1913 I resolved to conduct concerts of my own. Let me tell you that one of the happiest episodes of my life occurred when a number of my colleagues and supporters met, agreeing to put their influence back of the new orchestral 'societe' I wished to form, and we advertised for young musicians to come and be examined if they wished positions in the new orchestra. The best of the young players of the day came, eagerly, enthusiastically, with the result that I had a really wonderful orchestra to begin with.

Not Placed by Critics

"This orchestra played, under myself and other conductors, for the Boston Opera season of 1914 in Paris. It also gave 10 concerts in Paris of modern music—the most modern music you can imagine.

I asked Mr. Monteux whether he could compare American orchestral musicians with those of France. "As a rule," he replied, "American orchestral players, such as those of the Boston Symphony, are quicker readers at first sight than French players, and they have a commensurate technical facility. This is due, I think, to two important things: First of all, you have here an orchestra of which the musicians are practically bound to give all the time necessary to very exacting rehearsals of music of every imaginable kind. These men are at the service of the conductor at any hour and for as many hours as he wants them. They play music of all countries, of all periods, and all schools. All this develops the quality of reading difficult music at sight in an exceptional degree. Also, for the reason that salaries here are considerably larger than they are, as a rule, in Europe, the musicians can afford to devote their time to constant rehearsal under one conductor, which is very seldom the case on the other side.

TRANSCRIPT OCTOBER 7,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

PROSPECTS OF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Returning Publics and Publics That Needlessly Hesitate—Mr. Stock's Wise and Manly Retirement—A Prospectus from the Chicago Opera Company—Franck's "Rebecca" in the Theatre—Russia Still Hears Music—Items, Incidents, Opinions

THUS far, subscriptions to the Symphony Concerts indicate as lively interest, as warm support on the part of the public as could reasonably be expected. Admittedly, the the Symphony Orchestra is traversing and will traverse a difficult year. It must not only contend against war-time economies and preoccupations, but it must also persuade audiences to new conductors, a reorganized band and a new régime generally. For the first time in nearly forty years, it will begin its concerts with a temporary conductor, Mr. Monteux, from whom, by token of past performance, there is reason to expect no little pleasure, and who is now unifying, schooling and stimulating his forces as has no conductor since the days in which Mr. Gericke first trained the orchestra. If he laid the foundations and established the traditions of the old band, Mr. Monteux is doing likewise, within the limitations of a relatively short stay, for the new. To him in November will succeed for the rest of the season Mr. Rabaud. It is only the truth to say that at present the public of the Symphony Concerts knows little of him and wonders what it may expect of his leading as concert follows concert. It were timely for it to recall that it knew no more of Mr. Nikisch or of Dr. Muck when he came first to Boston; and that if it warmed, as it did, to a Paur and a Fiedler, it has no reason to mistrust a Rabaud. In their day, the orchestra, rather than the conductor, was the prop and the pleasure of the concerts. By every sign that current rehearsals give—and Mr. Monteux's standards are exacting—it will be such, whoever and whatever the conductor, through the season to come.

The public that is hesitating over the Symphony Concerts lest when it takes its usual tickets it is buying "a pig in a poke," may take courage accordingly. It will still hear an orchestra of the first rank; it will still listen to conductors the equals of more than one predecessor. It may take comforting example, moreover, from the disposition of other publics. Back have come in numbers those that forsook the concerts last season rather than listen to a conductor and to players who in the categories of war were "alien enemies." In their places, likewise, will be found many of those to whom the Symphony Concerts have been for years a weekly pleasure, a weekly habit, or a human mingling of both. There are encouraging signs of that younger public essential to the Symphony Concerts and attracted, as its way is, by the very changes that make an older generation superfluously mistrustful. Nothing was expected, nothing is expected of not a few who were loud in agitation over a "German orchestra" last spring. They then discovered the Symphony Concerts. They have now forgotten them and "gone on," after their manner, "to "something else." Another public, which knows the Symphony Concerts as the chief artistic glory of Boston and the Symphony Orchestra as not the least of the "institutions" of the city, which counted the reorganization of the summer as a necessity of the hour and so encouraged it, has now corresponding obligations to fulfill. From it came the trustees who have accomplished a difficult undertaking in a fashion that soon will praise them. From it should now come also the support that is recompense and confidence.

om ENQUIRER

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

Rabaud to Lead Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-1919. This word was received today by the symphony trustees in a cable message from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would reach Boston early in November.

For the last five years M. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris and also has done much concert work. His engagement brings to an end negotiations in progress since last spring when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

ADVERTISER | AMERICAN OCTOBER 6

NEW FIGURES IN SYNPHONY

Top, left to right: Georges Miquelle and Ferdinand Thillois; at bottom, Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster, and Pierre Monteux, conductor.

Leading French Orchestra Coming

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

AS IF to console us for a period of orchestral famine, Boston is to have two important symphony concerts as soon as the "unnecessary gathering" ban is lifted. The famous Paris Conservatory Orchestra, under a celebrated conductor, Andre Messager, is to make its New England debut.

One of the most graceful outcomes of the present war is the art-interchange which is beginning to take place between the allied nations. Only a short time ago we had almost a revelation in the shape of a military orchestra, led by Captain Pares, and now we are to hear what is probably the best French orchestra of the present.

The Paris Conservatory Orchestra is in itself almost a history of orchestral music in France. When it began, in 1828, the French were much better executants than composers. Cherubini, who was not a Frenchman, was the chief influence in Paris, and a very good one, but the public tendency was towards Gretry and Boieldieu, both somewhat sugary writers. Under Habeneck as first conductor, however, this same orchestra introduced a higher standard, and the influence of an outsider, Hector Berlioz, helped the advance.

The three greatest conductors of this orchestra were Habeneck, Lamoureux and Messager. As the last-named is to appear at its Boston concert, it may be well to introduce him to Bostonians.

Andre Charles Prosper Messager was born in Montlucon, France, Dec. 30, 1853, and is therefore about 65 years old. As a composer he is a pupil of St. Saens, and his record in this direction is a remarkably brilliant tone.

He has won prizes innumerable for his works and he has composed everything from symphonies to chansons. His operas have been chiefly in the school of Opera Comique, which means something very much higher in France than comic opera does in America, and his music is not of the asthetic school of D'Indy, nor of the cryptic vein of Debussy, but charmingly melodic and natural, even if less ambitious than that of several of his contemporaries.

He has conducted almost everywhere. Beginning by being an organist at St. Sulpice, he has been conductor at the Opera Comique, at Covent Garden, London, at the Paris Grand Opera, and since 1908 conductor of the orchestra of the Conservatoire, which he is to lead during its American tour.

There is this to be added regarding the coming concert: In the case of the recent French military concerts we had the Garde Republicaine conductor, but not the Garde Republicaine Band, but in the present instance we are to have both conductor and orchestra, intact save for such unavoidable ravages as may have been made by the war.

On the heels of the concert, probably the very next day, we shall have our own orchestra under French leadership and with some infusion of French and Belgian blood, and with some excision of ultra-Teutonic elements. But M. Monteux, by his first three programs, seems anxious to show that he is not narrow-minded. He gives some interesting French music, but he does not taboo the classical German school. We are to have Schumann's "Manfred" overture, which was the composer's favorite symphony, and Brahms' most popular symphony—the second.

We are rather surprised at the inclusion of Brahms in a program by a conductor who discards Richard Strauss and Wagner, for Brahms was more actively anti-Gallic than either of them, since he wrote a "Triumphlied" celebrating the downfall of France before the Prussian hordes, dedicating it to the emperor William I, and introducing "Heil dir im Siegerkranz," which is the German national employment of "God Save the King," as "My Country 'tis of Thee" is the American.

We hope that the Frenchmen will be able to stay over a day or two and hear our own Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will surprise them to find a band in America which has been unequalled by any orchestra of the present. Under Gericke it was the best drilled orchestra of the world with one exception. Von Bulow's Meiningen Orchestra excelled it in technique.

But Von Bulow was a drill-master run mad. He once took the notion that the musicians could not perfectly follow his baton if they were reading their music. Thereupon he forced every member of the band to memorize his part, so that the played at times without a scrap of printed or written music being visible. When Von Bulow himself played a piano concerto he directed intermittently from the instrument rather than have any one else lead his orchestra.

From SUN

Address: New York City.

Date

RABAUD SUCCEEDS DR. MUCK.

Noted French Artist to Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Special Despatch to THE SUN.

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, a French conductor and composer, had been engaged to be permanent conductor to succeed Dr. Muck. A cablegram from the French Ministry of Fine Arts stated that Mr. Rabaud would sail as soon as possible for this country.

One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season was Rabaud's opera "Marouf." His "Second Symphony" is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris under Messager, which post he has filled for seven years.

Pierre Monteaux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York November 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge immediately on its return to Boston.

American October 5

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

First Symphony Concert on Oct. 18

IE order of the authorities, postponing for a week the opening of theatres, music halls, and the e, will necesarily mean postponent for a week of the first pair of ncerts of the Symphony Ohchestra, ich were scheduled to be given on iday afternoon, October 11, and turday evening, October 12. Unss there is a further delay in open-g places of amusement, the first ncerts will be given on Friday ternoon, October 18, and Saturday ening, October 19.

For the information of ticket hold-s, W. H. Brennan, manager of the chestra, announces that for the con-rts on October 18 and 19 respective-the tickets intended for those days ill be used. The whole season will e put back just one week. Original-the twenty-fourth pair of concerts as scheduled for Friday and Satur-ay, May 2 and 3. Now they will ome Friday and Saturday, May 9 and 0, and at this last pair of concerts the twenty-fourth) the tickets in-nded for October 11 and 12 will be sed.

As there is a soloist at the October 8 and 19 concerts in the person of osef Hofmann, the plan is now to pen the season with the program riginally announced for those dates. t is possible, however, that Mr. Mon-ux may change his plans in this re-ect.

The conductor situation has been reatly eased by the receipt of a legram from Mr. Gatti-Cassazza, eneral manager of the Metropolitan pera Company, giving Mr. Monteux n extra week's leave of absence. his will enable Mr. Monteaux not nly to conduct the Boston concerts f November 1, and 2, but to conduct ll the concerts of the first Southern ip.

In the meantime the subscription ale of season tickets continues at ymphony Hall, and will continue up the delayed opening of the season. his sale has progressed admirably nd the prospects of a successful sea-n are very bright.

IGHT SYMPHONY IGHTS IN CAMBRIDGE

otices for renewal of subscriptions e Symphony concerts given in ers Theatre, Harvard University, e been sent to all subscribers of st season and they have until next esday, October 8, to secure the seats ey had last year. The public sale season tickets will open at George Kent's University Book Store, Har-rd square, Friday, October 11.

There will be the usual quota of ght concerts on Thursday evenings, e dates being October 17, November December 12, January 16, February 13, March 6, April 3 and April 24. The first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, who is in Boston at the head of the Symphony Orchestra for the month of October. As to the conductor for the other concerts, the board of trustees hopes soon to be able to make an announcement.

Five soloists are announced: Merle Alcock, contralto; Josef Hofmann and Rosita Renard, pianists; Frederic Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the rchestra, and Joseph Malkin.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Establis

The uncertainty as to the future of the Boston Orchestra is ended by the engagement as its conductor of the French composer Henri Rabaud. His coming promises to restore that most distinguished of our orchestras to the high place which it held in the affection of patriotic Americans and in the confidence of music lovers before the active Germanism of Karl Muck shook its audiences and landed him in an internment camp, where his associations are no doubt more congenial to him than were those of his later months as a conductor.

M. Rabaud is best known in this country by his opera, "Marouf," produced at the Metropolitan last winter, and by his Second Symphony, which has been played by several of our orchestras. He has been one of the principal conductors of the Opera at Paris for five years past and has received the long and thorough training which is a necessary preparation for that post. He is released for his work here by the French Ministry of Fine Arts, even as Dr. Muck was released by the Kaiser, the days of whose influence in American music are over. His coming will no doubt tend to make French music more popular here and to knit closer the artistic and intellectual ties which bind us to France. Of that we can be more certain when we have seen his programs and observed his style.

For this personal acquaintance, however, we shall have to wait. Pierre Monteux, the French conductor at the Metropolitan, had been engaged for the first part of the Boston Symphony season and he will pilot the orchestra through its Southern trip and its first two concerts here and in Manhattan. M. Rabaud will conduct the December concerts in Boston and by January will be firmly in command for his Brooklyn and Manhattan appearances. His welcome is likely to be as hearty as was the disapproval of Dr. Muck last winter, and his appeal will be made to audiences strongly predisposed in his

POST. OCTOBER 13

Monteux Restoring Scores That Muck Tampered With

BY OLIN DOWNES

One thing is certain. The days that are passing with never a symphony concert are not passing to the detriment of the quality of the orchestra. Every day it is rehearsing under Mr. Monteux. He is not an easy man to please. When he commenced rehearsals he was not wholly satisfied with his success in getting exactly what he wanted from an orchestra which had long been trained by a conductor of quite another school and different ideals of orchestral tone than those of Mr. Monteux. It took—perhaps it is still taking—even the sanctified orchestra of Boston Symphony some time to adjust itself to the new delicacies and the fine balances of Mr. Monteux's art—this, at least, is the talk in inside musical circles. But Mr. Monteux is gradually gaining the results he covets, profiting by the delays of the season to impress the more satisfactorily his conceptions on his men.

Probably in another 11 days the accuracy of this gossip will be put to test for its accuracy in public performance. In the meantime this seems to hold true: That no conductor since the time of Wilhelm Gericke, the man who gave the Boston Orchestra its reputation, has rehearsed so meticulously, so scrupulously and with so fine an ear for tonal results. In the absence of that press agentry by which conductors of greater pretensions, if not more talent, than Mr. Monteux often see to it that their doings and characteristics are loudly trumpeted through the land this may be said: That very few orchestra leaders have such an ear.

The acuteness of the ear of Mr. Toscanini, formerly at the Metropolitan Opera House, and possibly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, has been traditional; yet Mr. Monteux, conducting "Carmen," after Mr. Toscanini had conducted this work at the Metropolitan, discovered errors in the orchestral parts which had escaped the famous Italian maestro. He has discovered errors in Boston Symphony parts as well, and we are happy to say—if report is true—that he has restored to their original forms many orchestral works with which Dr. Muck felt free to tamper. Mr. Monteux believes in allowing the composer, and the composer only, to be responsible for his own greatnesses and shortcomings. In his opinion the duty of the conductor is solely that of the reverent and enthusiastic interpreter.

We are happy to hear that he works without a pencil. A man's methods of work may be what they like, provided he gets his results. Dr. Muck got results in ways of his own, though they were sometimes at variance with the intention of the composer. But one of his methods was blue pencilling his scores in practically every measure, and with a geometrical exactitude and elaborateness of which only a German could be suspected. Nothing was left to chance, inspiration, or memory. We know this personally to have been the case. Mr. Monteux does not need or like to mark up a score.

Has the reader ever been annoyed by loaning a book to a friend and having it returned with dashes, question marks, pseudo-profound reflections on the page margins, and all the other indications of the pencil fiend? Why do people do this? If a paragraph impresses them are they going to forget it? If they intend to lecture have they not their subject matter in their mind? Are they school children? If we were a newly appointed conductor at Symphony Hall we should certainly be annoyed to find the library so besmeared. Mr. Monteux's successor will find less "editing" than Dr. Muck's.

Mr. Monteux's sojourn here shows him to be a man of the simple and domestic tastes which characterized other symphony conductors than Dr. Muck. That gentleman lived with some pretension, and on a scale which, if not elaborate, was more or less in conformity with the ideas of those who think carefully about appearances and appurtenances due him who occupies an exalted official position.

He lived first in a pretentious hotel and later in an admirably appointed house on Hemenway street. Mr. Monteux lived also in a hotel—a modest one—for a week or thereabouts after his arrival in Boston for his fall duties, and then went straight out to a pleasant street in a suburb, and ensconced himself in a comfortable apartment and went to "housekeeping." At the rehearsals he has been simple and amiable, has not felt it necessary to intimidate his players to make them obey him, but has made his authority quietly and instantly felt. The gentlemen of the Symphony Orchestra were somewhat surprised, but surprised to their profit, to find him informing them that he was not satisfied with the tone-quality of the first simple, unison passage for strings, which opens the Cesar Franck symphony. He has eyes and ears on all sides of his head. He is not the man for an orchestra to "play horse" with.

The newly announced list of works to be performed by the Chicago Opera Company this season is of local interest since, in all probability, this company will revisit Boston, and, let us hope, repeat brilliant triumphs of last season. The "revivals" are, on the whole, more interesting than the "novelties." A "revival" may indeed be a "novelty" to a younger generation, as are many of Mr. Campanini's offerings, but it is unlikely that many of his "novelties" will have, in future years, "revivals." Certainly one expects little of "Le Vieil Aigle," by Raoul Gunsborg, or from Mascagni's "Le Maschere." Erlanger's "Aphrodite," with Mary Garden in the title role, will draw audiences of those athirst for musical novelties, and those who crave novelties not necessarily of the purely musical order. The same might be said of Massenet's "Cleopatra" with the same singer in the title role. A little better may be hoped of Xavier Leroux's "Le Chemineau" and "Le cadeau de Noel," a one-act opera based on an incident of the present war. But Verdi's "Don Carlos," little known in America, is worth all the other works put together. Other revivals will include Massenet's grim melodrama, "La Navarraise"; Rossini's "William Tell"; Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann"; Verdi's "Falstaff" and "Otello"; Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine"; Bellini's "Norma"; Donizetti's "Linda di Chamounix" and Ricci's comedy in the early Italian opera buffa style, "Crispino e la comare."

ADVERTISER | AMERICAN | OCTOBER 6

NEW FIGURES IN SYNPHONY

Top, left to right: Georges Miquelle and Ferdinand Thillois; at bottom, Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster, and Pierre Monteux, conductor.

© Mishkin

Leading French Orchestra Coming

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

AS IF to console us for a period of orchestral famine, Boston is to have two important symphony concerts as soon as the "unnecessary gathering" ban is lifted. The famous Paris Conservatory Orchestra, under a celebrated conductor, Andre Messager, is to make its New England debut.

One of the most graceful outcomes of the present war is the art-interchange which is beginning to take place between the allied nations. Only a short time ago we had almost a revelation in the shape of a military orchestra, led by Captain Pares, and now we are to hear what is probably the best French orchestra of the present.

The Paris Conservatory Orchestra is in itself almost a history of orchestral music in France. When it began, in 1828, the French were much better executants than composers. Cherubini, who was not a Frenchman, was the chief influence in Paris, and a very good one, but the public tendency was towards Gretry and Boieldieu, both somewhat sugary writers. Under Habeneck as first conductor, however, this same orchestra introduced a higher standard, and the influence of an outsider, Hector Berlioz, helped the advance.

The three greatest conductors of this orchestra were Habeneck, Lamoureux and Messager. As the last-named is to appear at its Boston concert, it may be well to introduce him to Bostonians.

Andre Charles Prosper Messager was born in Montlucon, France, Dec. 30, 1853, and is therefore about 65 years old. As a composer he is a pupil of St. Saens, and his record in this direction is a remarkably brilliant tone.

He has won prizes innumerable for his works and he has composed everything from symphonies to chansons. His operas have been chiefly in the school of Opera Comique, which means something very much higher in France than comic opera does in America, and his music is not of the asthetic school of D'Indy, nor of the cryptic vein of Debussy, but charmingly melodic and natural, even if less ambitious than that of several of his contemporaries.

He has conducted almost everywhere. Beginning by being an organist at St. Sulpice, he has been conductor at the Opera Comique, at Covent Garden, London, at the Paris Grand Opera, and since 1908 conductor of the orchestra of the Conservatoire, which he is to lead during its American tour.

There is this to be added regarding the coming concert: In the case of the recent French military concerts we had the Garde Republicaine conductor, but not the Garde Republicaine Band, but in the present instance we are to have both conductor and orchestra, intact save for such unavoidable ravages as may have been made by the war.

On the heels of the concert, probably the very next day, we shall have our own orchestra under French leadership and with some infusion of French and Belgian blood, and with some excision of ultra-Teutonic elements. But M. Monteux, by his first three programs, seems anxious to show that he is not narrow-minded. He gives some interesting French music, but he does not taboo the classical German school. We are to have Schumann's "Manfred" overture, which was the composer's favorite symphony, and Brahms' most popular symphony—the second.

We are rather surprised at the inclusion of Brahms in a program by a conductor who discards Richard Strauss and Wagner, for Brahms was more actively anti-Gallic than either of them, since he wrote a "Triumphlied" celebrating the downfall of France before the Prussian hordes, dedicating it to the emperor William I, and introducing "Heil dir im Siegerkranz," which is the German national employment of "God Save the King," as "My Country 'tis of Thee" is the American.

We hope that the Frenchmen will be able to stay over a day or two and hear our own Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will surprise them to find a band in America which has been unequalled by any orchestra of the present. Under Gericke it was the best drilled orchestra of the world with one exception. Von Bulow's Meiningen Orchestra excelled it in technique.

But Von Bulow was a drill-master run mad. He once took the notion that the musicians could not perfectly follow his baton if they were reading their music. Thereupon he forced every member of the band to memorize his part, so that they played at times without a scrap of printed or written music being visible. When Von Bulow himself played a piano concerto he directed intermittently from the instrument rather than have any one else lead his orchestra.

American October 5

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

First Symphony Concert on Oct. 18

THE order of the authorities, postponing for a week the opening of theatres, music halls, and the like, will necesarily mean postponement for a week of the first pair of concerts of the Symphony Ohchestra, which were scheduled to be given on Friday afternoon, October 11, and Saturday evening, October 12. Unless there is a further delay in opening places of amusement, the first concerts will be given on Friday afternoon, October 18, and Saturday evening, October 19.

For the information of ticket holders, W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, announces that for the concerts on October 18 and 19 respectively the tickets intended for those days will be used. The whole season will be put back just one week. Originally the twenty-fourth pair of concerts was scheduled for Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3. Now they will come Friday and Saturday, May 9 and 10, and at this last pair of concerts (the twenty-fourth) the tickets intended for October 11 and 12 will be used.

As there is a soloist at the October 18 and 19 concerts in the person of Josef Hofmann, the plan is now to open the season with the program originally announced for those dates. It is possible, however, that Mr. Monteux may change his plans in this respect.

The conductor situation has been greatly eased by the receipt of a telegram from Mr. Gatti-Cassazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, giving Mr. Monteux an extra week's leave of absence. This will enable Mr. Monteaux not only to conduct the Boston concerts of November 1, and 2, but to conduct all the concerts of the first Southern trip.

In the meantime the subscription sale of season tickets continues at Symphony Hail, and will continue up to the delayed opening of the season. This sale has progressed admirably and the prospects of a successful season are very bright.

NIGHT SYMPHONY LIGHTS IN CAMBRIDGE

Notices for renewal of subscriptions for the Symphony concerts given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, have been sent to all subscribers of last season and they have until next Tuesday, October 8, to secure the seats they had last year. The public sale of season tickets will open at George Kent's University Book Store, Harvard square, Friday, October 11.

There will be the usual quota of eight concerts on Thursday evenings, the dates being October 17, November 14, December 12, January 16, February 13, March 6, April 3 and April 24. The first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, who is in Boston at the head of the Symphony Orchestra for the month of October. As to the conductor for the other concerts, the board of trustees hopes soon to be able to make an announcement.

Five soloists are announced: Merle Alcock, contralto; Josef Hofmann and Rosita Renard, pianists; Frederic Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and Joseph Malkin.

Establis

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The uncertainty as to the future of the Boston Orchestra is ended by the engagement as its conductor of the French composer Henri Rabaud. His coming promises to restore that most distinguished of our orchestras to the high place which it held in the affection of patriotic Americans and in the confidence of music lovers before the active Germanism of Karl Muck shook its audiences and landed him in an internment camp, where his associations are no doubt more congenial to him than were those of his later months as a conductor.

M. Rabaud is best known in this country by his opera, "Marouf," produced at the Metropolitan last winter, and by his Second Symphony, which has been played by several of our orchestras. He has been one of the principal conductors of the Opera at Paris for five years past and has received the long and thorough training which is a necessary preparation for that post. He is released for his work here by the French Ministry of Fine Arts, even as Dr. Muck was released by the Kaiser, the days of whose influence in American music are over. His coming will no doubt tend to make French music more popular here and to knit closer the artistic and intellectual ties which bind us to France. Of that we can be more certain when we have seen his programs and observed his style.

For this personal acquaintance, however, we shall have to wait. Pierre Monteux, the French conductor at the Metropolitan, had been engaged for the first part of the Boston Symphony season and he will pilot the orchestra through its Southern trip and its first two concerts here and in Manhattan. M. Rabaud will conduct the December concerts in Boston and by January will be firmly in command for his Brooklyn and Manhattan appearances. His welcome is likely to be as hearty as was the disapproval of Dr. Muck last winter, and his appeal will be made to audiences strongly predisposed

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date

RABAUD SUCCEEDS DR. MUCK.

Noted French Artist to Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Special Despatch to THE SUN.

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, a French conductor and composer, had been engaged to be permanent conductor to succeed Dr. Muck. A cablegram from the French Ministry of Fine Arts stated that Mr. Rabaud would sail as soon as possible for this country.

One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season was Rabaud's opera "Marouf." His "Second Symphony" is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris under Messager, which post he has filled for seven years.

Pierre Monteaux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York November 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge immediately on its return to Boston.

POST. OCTOBER 13

Monteux Restoring Scores That Muck Tampered With

BY OLIN DOWNES

One thing is certain. The days that are passing with never a symphony concert are not passing to the detriment of the quality of the orchestra. Every day it is rehearsing under Mr. Monteux. He is not an easy man to please. When he commenced rehearsals he was not wholly satisfied with his success in getting exactly what he wanted from an orchestra which had long been trained by a conductor of quite another school and different ideals of orchestral tone than those of Mr. Monteux. It took—perhaps it is still taking—even the sanctified orchestra of Boston Symphony some time to adjust itself to the new delicacies and the fine balances of Mr. Monteux's art—this, at least, is the talk in inside musical circles. But Mr. Monteux is gradually gaining the results he covets, profiting by the delays of the season to impress the more satisfactorily his conceptions on his men.

Probably in another 11 days the accuracy of this gossip will be put to test for its accuracy in public performance. In the meantime this seems to hold true: That no conductor since the time of Wilhelm Gericke, the man who gave the Boston Orchestra its reputation, has rehearsed so meticulously, so scrupulously and with so fine an ear for tonal results. In the absence of that press agentry by which conductors of greater pretensions, if not more talent, than Mr. Monteux often see to it that their doings and characteristics are loudly trumpeted through the land this may be said: That very few orchestra leaders have such an ear.

The acuteness of the ear of Mr. Toscanini, formerly at the Metropolitan Opera House, and possibly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, has been traditional; yet Mr. Monteux, conducting "Carmen," after Mr. Toscanini had conducted this work at the Metropolitan, discovered errors in the orchestral parts which had escaped the famous Italian [illegible]. He has discovered errors in Boston Symphony parts as well, and we are happy to say—if report is true—that he has restored to their original forms many orchestral works with which Dr. Muck felt free to tamper. Mr. Monteux believes in allowing the composer, and the composer only, to be responsible for his own greatnesses and shortcomings. In his opinion the duty of the conductor is solely that of the reverent and enthusiastic interpreter.

We are happy to hear that he works without a pencil. A man's methods of work may be what they like, provided he gets his results. Dr. Muck got results in ways of his own, though they were sometimes at variance with the intention of the composer. But one of his methods was blue pencilling his scores in practically every measure, and with a geometrical exactitude and elaborateness of which only a German could be suspected. Nothing was left to chance, inspiration, or memory. We know this personally to have been the case. Mr. Monteux does not need or like to mark up a score.

Has the reader ever been annoyed by loaning a book to a friend and having it returned with dashes, question marks, pseudo-profound reflections on the page margins, and all the other indications of the pencil fiend? Why do people do this? If a paragraph impresses them are they going to forget it? If they intend to lecture have they not their subject matter in their mind? Are they school children? If we were a newly appointed conductor at Symphony Hall we should certainly be annoyed to find the library so besmeared. Mr. Monteux's successor will find less "editing" than Dr. Muck's.

Mr. Monteux's sojourn here shows him to be a man of the simple and domestic tastes which characterized other symphony conductors than Dr. Muck. That gentleman lived with some pretension, and on a scale which, if not elaborate, was more or less in conformity with the ideas of those who think carefully about appearances and appurtenances due him who occupies an exalted official position.

He lived first in a pretentious hotel and later in an admirably appointed house on Hemenway street. Mr. Monteux lived also in a hotel—a modest one—for a week or thereabouts after his arrival in Boston for his fall duties, and then went straight out to a pleasant street in a suburb, and ensconced himself in a comfortable apartment and went to "housekeeping." At the rehearsals he has been simple and amiable, has not felt it necessary to intimidate his players to make them obey him, but has made his authority quietly and instantly felt. The gentlemen of the Symphony Orchestra were somewhat surprised, but surprised to their profit, to find him informing them that he was not satisfied with the tone-quality of the first simple, unison passage for strings, which opens the Cesar Franck symphony. He has eyes and ears on all sides of his head. He is not the man for an orchestra to "play horse" with.

The newly announced list of works to be performed by the Chicago Opera Company this season is of local interest since, in all probability, this company will revisit Boston, and, let us hope, repeat brilliant triumphs of last season. The "revivals" are, on the whole, more interesting than the "novelties." "revival" may indeed be a "novelty" a younger generation, as are many Mr. Campanini's offerings, but it is likely that many of his "novelties" have, in future years, "revivals." Certainly one expects little of "Le V Aigle," by Raoul Gunsborg, or f Mascagni's "Le Maschere." Erlang "Aphrodite," with Mary Garden in title role, will draw audiences of those athirst for musical novelties, and those who crave novelties not necessarily of the purely musical order. The same might be said of Massenet's "Cleopatra" with the same singer in the title role. A little better may be hoped of Xavier Leroux's "Le Chemineau" and "Le cadeau de Noel," a one-act opera based on an incident of the present war. But Verdi's "Don Carlos," little known in America, is worth all the other works put together. Other revivals will include Massenet's grim melodrama, "La N varraise"; Rossini's "William Tell Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann Verdi's "Falstaff" and "Otello"; Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine"; Bellini's "Norma Donizetti's "Linda di Chamounix" an Ricci's comedy in the early Italian oper buffa style, "Crispino e la comare."

ADVERTISER | AMERICAN OCTOBER 6

American October 6

NEW FIGURES IN SYNPHONY

Top, left to right: Georges Miquelle and Ferdinand Thillois; at bottom, Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster, and Pierre Monteux, conductor.

©Mishkin

Leading French Orchestra Coming

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

AS IF to console us for a period of orchestral famine, Boston is to have two important symphony concerts as soon as the "unnecessary gathering" ban is lifted. The famous Paris Conservatory Orchestra, under a celebrated conductor, Andre Messager, is to make its New England debut.

One of the most graceful outcomes of the present war is the art-interchange which is beginning to take place between the allied nations. Only a short time ago we had almost a revelation in the shape of a military orchestra, led by Captain Pares, and now we are to hear what is probably the best French orchestra of the present.

The Paris Conservatory Orchestra is in itself almost a history of orchestral music in France. When it began, in 1828, the French were much better executants than composers. Cherubini, who was not a Frenchman, was the chief influence in Paris, and a very good one, but the public tendency was towards Gretry and Boieldieu, both somewhat sugary writers. Under Habeneck as first conductor, however, this same orchestra introduced a higher standard, and the influence of an outsider, Hector Berlioz, helped the advance.

The three greatest conductors of this orchestra were Habeneck, Lamoureux and Messager. As the last-named is to appear at its Boston concert, it may be well to introduce him to Bostonians.

Andre Charles Prosper Messager was born in Montlucon, France, Dec. 30, 1853, and is therefore about 65 years old. As a composer he is a pupil of St. Saens, and his record in this direction is a remarkably brilliant tone.

He has won prizes innumerable for his works and he has composed everything from symphonies to chansons. His operas have been chiefly in the school of Opera Comique, which means something very much higher in France than comic opera does in America, and his music is not of the asthetic school of D'Indy, nor of the cryptic vein of Debussy, but charmingly melodic and natural, even if less ambitious than that of several of his contemporaries.

He has conducted almost everywhere. Beginning by being an organist at St. Sulpice, he has been conductor at the Opera Comique, at Covent Garden, London, at the Paris Grand Opera, and since 1908 conductor of the orchestra of the Conservatoire, which he is to lead during its American tour.

There is this to be added regarding the coming concert: In the case of the recent French military concerts we had the Garde Republicaine conductor, but not the Garde Republicaine Band, but in the present instance we are to have both conductor and orchestra, intact save for such unavoidable ravages as may have been made by the war.

On the heels of the concert, probably the very next day, we shall have our own orchestra under French leadership and with some infusion of French and Belgian blood, and with some excision of ultra-Teutonic elements. But M. Monteux, by his first three programs, seems anxious to show that he is not narrow-minded. He gives some interesting French music, but he does not taboo the classical German school. We are to have Schumann's "Manfred" overture, which was the composer's favorite symphony, and Brahms' most popular symphony—the second.

We are rather surprised at the inclusion of Brahms in a program by a conductor who discards Richard Strauss and Wagner, for Brahms was more actively anti-Gallic than either of them, since he wrote a "Triumphlied" celebrating the downfall of France before the Prussian hordes, dedicating it to the emperor William I, and introducing "Heil dir im Siegerkranz," which is the German national employment of "God Save the King," as "My Country 'tis of Thee" is the American.

We hope that the Frenchmen will be able to stay over a day or two and hear our own Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will surprise them to find a band in America which has been unequalled by any orchestra of the present. Under Gericke it was the best drilled orchestra of the world with one exception. Von Bulow's Meiningen Orchestra excelled it in technique.

But Von Bulow was a drill-master run mad. He once took the notion that the musicians could not perfectly follow his baton if they were reading their music. Thereupon he forced every member of the band to memorize his part, so that they played at times without a scrap of printed or written music being visible. When Von Bulow himself played a piano concerto he directed intermittently from the instrument rather than have any one else lead his orchestra.

From SUN

Address: New York City.

Date

RABAUD SUCCEEDS DR. MUCK.

Noted French Artist to Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Special Despatch to THE SUN.

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, a French conductor and composer, had been engaged to be permanent conductor to succeed Dr. Muck. A cablegram from the French Ministry of Fine Arts stated that Mr. Rabaud would sail as soon as possible for this country.

One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season was Rabaud's opera "Marouf." His "Second Symphony" is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris under Messager, which post he has filled for seven years.

Pierre Monteaux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York November 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge immediately on its return to Boston.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The uncertainty as to the future of the Boston Orchestra is ended by the engagement as its conductor of the French composer Henri Rabaud. His coming promises to restore that most distinguished of our orchestras to the high place which it held in the affection of patriotic Americans and in the confidence of music lovers before the active Germanism of Karl Muck shook its audiences and landed him in an internment camp, where his associations are no doubt more congenial to him than were those of his later months as a conductor.

M. Rabaud is best known in this country by his opera, "Marouf," produced at the Metropolitan last winter, and by his Second Symphony, which has been played by several of our orchestras. He has been one of the principal conductors of the Opera at Paris for five years past and has received the long and thorough training which is a necessary preparation for that post. He is released for his work here by the French Ministry of Fine Arts, even as Dr. Muck was released by the Kaiser, the days of whose influence in American music are over. His coming will no doubt tend to make French music more popular here and to knit closer the artistic and intellectual ties which bind us to France. Of that we can be more certain when we have seen his programs and observed his style.

For this personal acquaintance, however, we shall have to wait. Pierre Monteux, the French conductor at the Metropolitan, had been engaged for the first part of the Boston Symphony season and he will pilot the orchestra through its Southern trip and its first two concerts here and in Manhattan. M. Rabaud will conduct the December concerts in Boston and by January will be firmly in command for his Brooklyn and Manhattan appearances. His welcome is likely to be as hearty as was the disapproval of Dr. Muck last winter, and his appeal will be made to audiences strongly predisposed in his favor. Aside from the personal side of the matter his coming will probably preserve for the Boston Symphony the pre-eminence which it has long held and continue it as a large asset of our national culture.

irst Symphony Concert on Oct. 18

IE order of the authorities, postponing for a week the opening of theatres, music halls, and the e, will necesarily mean postponent for a week of the first pair of ncerts of the Symphony Ohchestra, hich were scheduled to be given on iday afternoon, October 11, and turday evening, October 12. Unss there is a further delay in openg places of amusement, the first ncerts will be given on Friday ternoon, October 18, and Saturday ening, October 19.

For the information of ticket holds, W. H. Brennan, manager of the chestra, announces that for the conrts on October 18 and 19 respective the tickets intended for those days ill be used. The whole season will e put back just one week. Original the twenty-fourth pair of concerts as scheduled for Friday and Saturay, May 2 and 3. Now they will ome Friday and Saturday, May 9 and , and at this last pair of concerts the twenty-fourth) the tickets inended for October 11 and 12 will be sed.

As there is a soloist at the October 8 and 19 concerts in the person of osef Hofmann, the plan is now to pen the season with the program riginally announced for those dates. t is possible, however, that Mr. Monux may change his plans in this repect.

The conductor situation has been reatly eased by the receipt of a legram from Mr. Gatti-Cassazza, eneral manager of the Metropolitan pera Company, giving Mr. Monteux n extra week's leave of absence. his will enable Mr. Monteaux not nly to conduct the Boston concerts f November 1, and 2, but to conduct ll the concerts of the first Southern ip.

In the meantime the subscription ale of season tickets continues at ymphony Hall, and will continue up the delayed opening of the season. his sale has progressed admirably nd the prospects of a successful seaon are very bright.

IGHT SYMPHONY IGHTS IN CAMBRIDGE

otices for renewal of subscriptions e Symphony concerts given in ers Theatre, Harvard University, e been sent to all subscribers of st season and they have until next onday, October 8, to secure the seats ving her talents to various war fits.

come, her program having been temporarily suspended by the recent decrees.

Aside from her talents she has won

POST. OCTOBER 13

Monteux Restoring Scores That Muck Tampered With

BY OLIN DOWNES

One thing is certain. The days that are passing with never a symphony concert are not passing to the detriment of the quality of the orchestra. Every day it is rehearsing under Mr. Monteux. He is not an easy man to please. When he commenced rehearsals he was not wholly satisfied with his success in getting exactly what he wanted from an orchestra which had long been trained by a conductor of quite another school and different ideals of orchestral tone than those of Mr. Monteux. It took—perhaps it is still taking—even the sanctified orchestra of Boston Symphony some time to adjust itself to the new delicacies and the fine balances of Mr. Monteux's art—this, at least, is the talk in inside musical circles. But Mr. Monteux is gradually gaining the results he covets, profiting by the delays of the season to impress the more satisfactorily his conceptions on his men.

Probably in another 11 days the accuracy of this gossip will be put to test for its accuracy in public performance. In the meantime this seems to hold true: That no conductor since the time of Wilhelm Gericke, the man who gave the Boston Orchestra its reputation, has rehearsed so meticulously, so scrupulously and with so fine an ear for tonal results. In the absence of that press agentry by which conductors of greater pretensions, if not more talent, than Mr. Monteux often see to it that their doings and characteristics are loudly trumpeted through the land this may be said: That very few orchestra leaders have such an ear.

The acuteness of the ear of Mr. Toscanini, formerly at the Metropolitan Opera House, and possibly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, has been traditional; yet Mr. Monteux, conducting "Carmen," after Mr. Toscanini had conducted this work at the Metropolitan, discovered errors in the orchestral parts which had es-it returned with dashes, question marks, pseudo-profound reflections on the page margins, and all the other indications of the pencil fiend? Why do people do this? If a paragraph impresses them are they going to forget it? If they intend to lecture have they not their subject matter in their mind? Are they school children? If we were a newly appointed conductor at Symphony Hall we should certainly be annoyed to find the library so besmeared. Mr. Monteux's successor will find less "editing" than Dr. Muck's.

Mr. Monteux's sojourn here shows him to be a man of the simple and domestic tastes which characterized other symphony conductors than Dr. Muck. That gentleman lived with some pretension, and on a scale which, if not elaborate, was more or less in conformity with the ideas of those who think carefully about appearances and appurtenances due him who occupies an exalted official position.

He lived first in a pretentious hotel and later in an admirably appointed house on Hemenway street. Mr. Monteux lived also in a hotel—a modest one—for a week or thereabouts after his arrival in Boston for his fall duties, and then went straight out to a pleasant street in a suburb, and ensconced himself in a comfortable apartment and went to "housekeeping." At the rehearsals he has been simple and amiable, has not felt it necessary to intimidate his players to make them obey him, but has made his authority quietly and instantly felt. The gentlemen of the Symphony Orchestra were somewhat surprised, but surprised to their profit, to find him informing them that he was not satisfied with the tone-quality of the first simple, unison passage for strings, which opens the Cesar Franck symphony. He has eyes and ears on all sides of his head. He is not the man for an orchestra to "play horse" with.

The newly announced list of works to be performed by the Chicago Opera Company this season is of local interest since, in all probability, this company will revisit Boston, and, let us hope, repeat brilliant triumphs of last season. The "revivals" are, on the whole, more caped the famous Italian [illegible]. He has discovered errors in Boston Symphony parts as well, and we are happy to say—if report is true—that he has restored to their original forms many orchestral works with which Dr. Muck felt free to tamper. Mr. Monteux believes in allowing the composer, and the composer only, to be responsible for his own greatnesses and shortcomings. In his opinion the duty of the conductor is solely that of the reverent and enthusiastic interpreter.

We are happy to hear that he works without a pencil. A man's methods of work may be what they like, provided he gets his results. Dr. Muck got results in ways of his own, though they were sometimes at variance with the intention of the composer. But one of his methods was blue pencilling his scores in practically every measure, and with a geometrical exactitude and elaborateness of which only a German could be suspected. Nothing was left to chance, inspiration, or memory. We know this personally to have been the case. Mr. Monteux does not need or like to mark up a score.

Has the reader ever been annoyed by loaning a book to a friend and having interesting than the "novelties." "revival" may indeed be a "novelty" a younger generation, as are many Mr. Campanini's offerings, but it is likely that many of his "novelties" have, in future years, "revivals." Certainly one expects little of "Le V Aigle," by Raoul Gunsborg, or f Mascagni's "Le Maschere." Erlang "Aphrodite," with Mary Garden in title role, will draw audiences of those athirst for musical novelties, and those who crave novelties not necessarily of the purely musical order. The same might be said of Massenet's "Cleopatra" with the same singer in the title role. A little better may be hoped of Xavier Leroux's "Le Chemineau" and "Le cadeau de Noel," a one-act opera based on an incident of the present war. But Verdi's "Don Carlos," little known in America, is worth all the other works put together. Other revivals will include Massenet's grim melodrama, "La N varraise"; Rossini's "William Tell Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann Verdi's "Falstaff" and "Otello"; Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine"; Bellini's "Norma Donizetti's "Linda di Chamounix" an Ricci's comedy in the early Italian opera buffa style, "Crispino e la comare."

REDUCTION RATIO

16x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 1.1 1.25 1.4 1.6 1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

SOME SOLOISTS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Left to Right, Mischa Levitzki, Pianist; Sophie Braslau, Contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, Baritone; Harold Bauer, Pianist; Jacques Thibaud, Violinist.

SUNDAY HERALD OCTOBER 6. NEW YORK TIMES, SEPTEMBER 22. n HERALD

Many are curious concerning the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. Mr. Monteux has expressed his opinion about music by Germans and Austrians that should and should not be performed during the year. He speaks sensibly. Some really believe that a symphony by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, an overture by Weber or Schumann should come under the espionage act. Hearing this music, poor, misguided Americans will forget the atrocities in Belgium, the Lusitania, the bombing of hospitals and the sinking of hospital ships. No German need apply, whether his name happens to be Bach, Bachlich, or Backhaus.

No American is anxious or even willing to hear the music of living Germans that signed the famous manifesto of professors and others. Any American that refuses to hear music by any living German or Austrian shows patriotic fervor that is not wildly extravagant. But why should a sane person object to music by the old masters, by the old that are still young? If there is to be no music by Beethoven and the rest, who are to be heard? Will there be 24 interesting programs drawn only from French, Russian, Scandinavian, Italian, British and American sources?

The programs of the Promenade Concerts conducted by Sir Henry Wood in Queen's Hall, London, have long been famous. This year there are many protests against them. Mr. Robin H. Legge discussed the matter in the Daily Telegraph of Sept. 7. He found a wonderful unanimity in the large number of pleasing letters; "their unanimity is based upon the hopeless monotony and conventionality of the entire scheme."

Legge quotes from two letters. The first should interest Bostonians, for it thought at one time that Sir Henry would conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck, leaving Boston, recommended him; but Dr. Muck, after his first sojourn in Boston, recommended Mr. Max Fiedler; Dr. Muck also brought over Mr. Schmidt to be the assistant conductor. Dr. Muck was a humorist when he was not an ironist.

Mr. Legge's correspondent wrote: "It is a great loss to the country that Sir Henry Wood could not see his way to accept the Boston offer. I had hoped against hope that he would go and afford us some relief, taking, of course, his British sea songs and Tschaikowsky with him. What is the matter with the direction of these concerts? They seem to start with, almost unique in Europe. . . . Yet when everyone is talking of keeping the foreign article out these people gaily insist on the same old stuff we have heard for years and years. . . . I am getting sick to death of hearing the eternal Tchaikowsky, Grieg, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Saint-Saëns, Handel, the same old 'Peer Gynt,' Hungarian Rhapsodies, Pathetic Symphony—and I protest vehemently it is playing down to the public. Fancy five new native works, small trifles carefully selected not to disturb the main Tschaikowsky, Rachmaninoff-Wood pieces in the program." The writer pointed out by way of comparison Beecham's last Philharmonic program, "a delight even to look at, the main piece nearly always by an Englishman and a full house!" He ended in a fine burst: "If you critics do your duty you will point out that Vaughan Williams, Edgar, Bantock, Gardiner, Holbrooke—even Stanford and Parry! prefer to the everlasting Rachmaninoff-Wood business—are real English composers, as fine as the formerly popular played Strauss, who, of course, will be reinstated the day peace is signed."

Some of us feared the coming of Sir Henry Wood, lest under his consulship there would be orgies of British music in Symphony Hall. There are compositions by Englishmen that one would gladly hear. William Wallace is known here only by his "Villon." The Irresistible and irascible Mr. Holbrooke has been represented by only one of his many works. There is music by the younger school; some of the members are ultra-modern in their expression; this orchestral music is wholly unknown here. We feared Sir Henry bringing with him scores by Parry, Stanford, Mackenzie and other ancient worthies, including cathedral organists who have written overtures and even symphonies, not to mention gifted beings that have [illegible] Dan.

[illegible] Legge comments was [illegible] by Sir Ernest Palmer, "the founder of the patrons' and patronesses in Musica Nova." He wrote: "These (promenade) concerts are entirely supported by the British public and British money, and the orchestra is also English. It is, then, indeed strange that so little room is paid to our own composers and their works. I am quite sure there must be many frequenting them who are patriotic enough to see fair play and wish a reasonable supply of English music, but which no one who looks over the programs can honestly say is forthcoming. A Wagner night, a Russian night, a Symphony night are set forth, and two nights are devoted to so-called 'popular,' whatever that may mean; but these also are mainly devoted to foreign works. Can anyone think a British night would be unreasonable? Surely no difficulty could be suggested in finding good and attractive works, and, I venture to say, with as much appreciation as many of the foreign. The policy adopted I fail to understand; it is not patriotic or complimentary or encouraging to our own composers, or instructive, from a national point of view, to the audiences, whatever the reason may be assigned. I think one night a week ought to be devoted to British works."

Mr. Legge agrees with this correspondent. It is strange that the chamber concerts of the London String Quartet, the improvement of the English Chorus Society, "the institution" since Dr. Beecham, the late "H. T. Finck, the Boston critic, contributor to the Evening Post, and author of a book on Chopin, Wagner and Grieg," the performance of "many modern works" by the Philharmonic Society, the performance of works by Elgar, Bantock, Holbrooke, Delius, Bantock and others, Arnold Bax, Cyril Scott, Eugene Goossens, Frederick Austin, Ernest Farrar, Ernest Bloch, Ethel Smyth, Rutland Boughton, Granville Bantock, Cyril Rootham, Frank Bridge, Ernest Walker, Percy Grainger, Cyril Jenkins, Ernest Moeran, Arthur Bliss, Eugene Goossens, Arthur Alexander

SOME SOLOISTS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Left to Right, Mischa Levitzki, Pianist; Sophie Braslau, Contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, Baritone; Harold Bauer, Pianist; Jacques Thibaud, Violinist.

SUNDAY HERALD OCTOBER 6.

Many are curious concerning the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. Mr. Monteux has expressed his opinion about music by Germans and Austrians that should and should not be performed during the war. He spoke sensibly. Some really believe that a symphony by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, an overture by Weber or Schumann should become under the espionage act. Hearing this music, poor, misguided Americans will forget the atrocities in Belgium, the Lusitania, the bombing of hospitals and the sinking of hospital ships. No German need apply, whether his name happens to be Bach, Bachrich, or Rachmaus.

No American is anxious or even willing to hear the music of living Germans that signed the famous manifesto of professors and others. Any American that refuses to hear music by any living German or Austrian shows patriotic fervor that is not wildly extravagant. But why should a sane person objected to music by the old masters, by the old that are still young? If there is to be no music by Beethoven and the great, who are to be heard? Will there be 24 interesting programs drawn only from French, Russian, Scandinavian, Italian, British and American sources?

The programs of the Promenade Concerts conducted by Sir Henry Wood in Queen's Hall, London, have long been famous. This year there are many protests against them. Mr. Robin H. Legge discussed the matter in the Daily Telegraph of Sept. 7. He found a wonderful unanimity in the large number of protesting letters; "their unanimity lay in the hopeless monotony and conventionality of the entire scheme." Legge quotes from two letters. The first should interest Bostonians, for it thought at one time that Sir Henry would conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck, leaving Boston, recommended him; but after his first sojourn in Boston he recommended Mr. Max Fiedler; but Muck also brought over Mr. Schmidt to be the assistant conductor. Dr. Muck was a humorist when he was not a pianist.

Mr. Legge's correspondent wrote: "It is a great loss to the country that Sir Henry Wood could not see his way to accept the Boston offer. I had hoped against hope that he would go and afford us some relief, taking, of course, his British sea songs and Tschaikowsky with him. What is the matter with the direction of these concerts? They are, to start with, almost unique in Europe. . . . Yet when everyone is talking of keeping the foreign article out these people gaily insist on the same old stuff we have heard for years and years. . . . I am getting sick to death of hearing the eternal Tchaikowsky, Grieg, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Saint-Saëns, Handel, the same old 'Peer Gynt,' Hungarian Rhapsodies, Pathetic Symphony—and I protest vehemently that playing down to the public. Give us new native works, small trifles carefully selected not to disturb the Tchaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Wood pieces in the program." The writer pointed out by way of comparison Beecham's last Philharmonic program, "a delight even to look at, the main piece nearly always by an Englishman and a full house!" He ended in a fine burst: "If you critics do your duty you will point out that Vaughan Williams, Edgar, Bantock, Gardiner, Holbrooke—even Stanford and Parry I prefer to the everlasting Rachmaninoff-Wood business—are real English composers, as fine as the formerly overplayed Strauss, who, of course, will be reinstated the day peace is signed!"

Some of us feared the coming of Sir Henry Wood, lest under his consulship there would be orgies of British music in Symphony Hall. There are compositions by Englishmen that one would gladly hear. William Wallace is known here only by his "Villon." The impressible and irascible Mr. Holbrooke has been represented by only one of his many works. There is music by the younger school; some of the members are ultra-modern in their expression; this orchestral music is wholly unknown here. We feared Sir Henry bringing with him scores by Parry, Stanford, Mackenzie and other ancient worthies, including cathedral organists who have written overtures and even symphonies, not to mention gifted beings that have been composers of Mass Doc-

[illegible] which Mr. Legge [illegible] by Sir Ernest [illegible], "the founder of the patrons' and and Fanatics per is Musica Nova." He wrote: "These (promenade) concerts are entirely supported by the British public and British money, and the orchestra is also English. It is, indeed strange that so little reward is paid to our own composers and works. I am quite sure there must be frequenting them who are patient enough to see fair play and wish a reasonable supply of English music, but which no one who looks over the programs can honestly say is forthcoming. A Wagner night, a Russian night, a Symphony night are set forth, and two nights are devoted to or named 'popular,' whatever that may mean, but these also are mainly devoted to foreign works. Can anyone in a British night would be unreasonable? Surely no difficulty could be suggested in finding good and attractive works, and, I venture to say, with as much appreciation as many of the foreign. The policy adopted I fail to understand; it is not patriotic or complimentary or encouraging to our own composers, or instructive, from a national point of view, to the audiences, whatever the reason may be assigned. I think one night a week ought to be devoted to British works."

Mr. Legge agrees with this correspondent. It is his belief that the chamber concerts of the London String Quartet have the improvement of the English ears of musical connoisseurship since it began. He asks: "If, as it seems to be the case, our classical composers are losing in the quality alike of performance and program, why are we not [illegible] these men [illegible] replace the seats of [illegible] Bach, Beethoven, no serious effort [illegible] Prince asks for a 'reasonable supply of English music.' There are [illegible] Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt, Tchaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Wagner, Strauss, Grieg, Saint-Saëns, Dvorak, Sibelius, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Franck, Tschaikowsky, Mussorgsky, Borodin, Glazounoff, Rachmaninoff, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Ravel, Debussy, Dukas, Chabrier, Chausson, Fauré, Lalo, Saint-Saëns, Franck, Vincent d'Indy, Ernest Chausson, Lekeu, Ropartz, Guy Ropartz, Bantock, Elgar, Delius, Holbrooke, Vaughan Williams, Stanford, Parry, Mackenzie, Bax, Bantock, Gardiner, Ireland, Bridge, Boughton, Ethel Smyth, Coleridge-Taylor, Dvorak, Smetana, Janacek, Novak, Suk, Ondricek, Ondrasek, Kovarovic, Foerster, Ostrcil, Jirak, Nedbal, Fibich, Zdenek Fibich

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A4

A5

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

SOME SOLOISTS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Left to Right, Mischa Levitzki, Pianist; Sophie Braslau, Contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, Baritone; Harold Bauer, Pianist; Jacques Thibaud, Violinist.

SUNDAY HERALD OCTOBER 6.

Many are curious concerning the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. Mr. Monteux has expressed his opinion about music by Germans and Austrians that should and should not be performed during the war. He spoke sensibly. Some really believe that a symphony by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, an overture by Weber or Schumann should come under the espionage act. Hearing this music, poor, misguided Americans will forget the atrocities in Belgium, the Lusitania, the bombing of hospitals and the sinking of hospital ships. No German need apply, whether his name happens to be Bach, Bachrich, or Backhaus.

No American is anxious or even willing to hear the music of living Germans that signed the famous manifesto of professors and others. Any American that refuses to hear music by any living German or Austrian shows patriotic fervor that is not wildly extravagant. But why should a sane person object to music by the old masters, by the old that are still young? If there is to be no music by Beethoven and the rest, who are to be heard? Will there be 24 interesting programs drawn only from French, Russian, Scandinavian, Italian, British and American sources?

The programs of the Promenade Concerts conducted by Sir Henry Wood in Queen's Hall, London, have long been famous. This year there are many protests against them. Mr. Robin H. Legge discussed the matter in the Daily Telegraph of Sept. 7. He found a wonderful unanimity in the large number of protesting letters; "their unanimity is based upon the hopeless monotony and conventionality of the entire scheme." Legge quotes from two letters. The first should interest Bostonians, for it thought at one time that Sir Henry Wood would conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck, leaving Boston, recommended him; but Dr. Muck, after his first sojourn in Boston, recommended Mr. Max Fiedler; Dr. Muck also brought over Mr. Schmidt to be the assistant conductor. Dr. Muck was a humorist when he was not an ironist.

Mr. Legge's correspondent wrote: "It is a great loss to the country that Sir Henry Wood could not see his way to accept the Boston offer. I had hoped against hope that he would go and afford us some relief, taking, of course, his British sea songs and Tschaikowsky with him. What is the matter with the direction of these concerts? They are, to start with, almost unique in Europe. . . . Yet when everyone is talking of keeping the foreign article out these people gaily insist on the same old stuff we have heard for years and years. . . . I am getting sick to death of hearing the eternal Tchaikowsky, Grieg, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Saint-Saens, Handel, the same old 'Peer Gynt,' Hungarian Rhapsodies, Pathetic Symphony—and I protest vehemently it is playing down to the public. Fancy five new native works, small trifles carefully selected not to disturb the plain Tschaikowsky, Rachmaninoff-Wood pieces in the program." The writer pointed out by way of comparison Beecham's last Philharmonic program, "a delight even to look at, the main piece nearly always by an Englishman and a full house!" He ended in a fine burst: "If you critics do your duty you will point out that Vaughan Williams, Edgar, Bantock, Gardiner, Holbrooke—even Stanford and Parry I prefer to the everlasting Rachmaninoff-Wood business—are real English composers, as fine as the formerly overplayed Strauss, who, of course, will be reinstated the day peace is signed!"

Some of us feared the coming of Sir Henry Wood, lest under his consulship there would be orgies of British music in Symphony Hall. There are compositions by Englishmen that one would gladly hear. William Wallace is known here only by his "Villon." The irrepressible and irascible Mr. Holbrooke has been represented by only one of his many works. There is music by the younger school; some of the members are ultra-modern in their expression; this orchestral music is wholly unknown here. We feared Sir Henry bringing with him scores by Parry, Stanford, Mackenzie and other ancient worthies, including cathedral organists who have written overtures and even symphonies, not to mention gifted beings that have the degree of Mus. Doc.

[illegible] which Mr. Legge [illegible] by Sir Ernest [illegible], "the founder of the patrons' [illegible] and Fanatica per la Musica Na[illegible]." He wrote: "These (promenade) concerts are entirely supported by the British public and British money, and the orchestra is also English. It is, then, indeed strange that so little regard is paid to our own composers and their works. I am quite sure there must be many frequenting them who are patriotic enough to see fair play and wish for a reasonable supply of English music, but which no one who looks over the programs can honestly say is forthcoming. A Wagner night, a Russian night, a Symphony night are set forth, and two nights are devoted to or [illegible]med 'popular,' whatever that may [illegible]ply; but these also are mainly devoted to foreign works. Can anyone [illegible] a British night would be unreasonable? Surely no difficulty could be suggested in finding good and attractive works, and, I venture to say, with as much appreciation as many of the foreign. The policy adopted I fail to understand; it is not patriotic or complimentary or encouraging to our own composers, or instructive, from a national point of view, to the audiences. [illegible] whatever the reason may be assigned, I think one night a week ought to be devoted to British works."

[illegible] with this correspond[illegible]

Brahms. We hasten to add, for the sake of the hypersensitive, that Beethoven and Brahms are dead; neither one was connected with the Hohenzollern family. Schumann, whose overture to "Manfred" will be performed died some years ago. He was not Prussian; Nor was Byron's hero Prussian. Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne" will be played for the first time at these concerts. It was played here in January, 1903, by the Orchestra Club, Mrs. Longy, conductor.

Liszt wrote music illustrative of the same subject, to go with his "Mephisto waltz. Loefler's music suggested by a poem of Verlaine has not been performed here since it was brought out at a Symphony concert with his "Devil's Villanelle." For some reason or other he has been unwilling to publish it, yet we thought when it was played that it was singularly poetic. It is a pleasure to know that Vincent d'Indy's gorgeously colored "Istar" will be played at the third concert. No one of d'Indy's orchestral compositions was performed at the Symphony concerts in the last years of Dr. Muck, who, taking offence at remarks by M. d'Indy about the musical Germanization of the United States, thus deprived the audiences of a great pleasure. Liszt's concerto in E flat major will be played by Mr. Hofmann. If any chauvinists should object to Liszt because he was a Hungarian by birth, let him recall the fact that Liszt spent many years in Paris and in Rome, was greatly influenced by the French, wrote essays and the great bulk of his letters in French, and, incidentally, was the father of children by a French countess. It might be added that neither Berlin nor Vienna enjoyed his music; that Weimar is not in Prussia; that he is buried in Bavaria. The concerto will be played by Mr. Hofmann, and there-by hangs a tale.

The New York Times of Sept. 29, publishes the following paragraph:

"That Josef Hofmann will reappear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season is good news today and a good deal of a departure, as well, from some previous misunderstandings. Those differences were serious enough to have led to a severance of relations practically since the war, and on one occasion to a controversy in print and even a formal statement that it is true that Mr. Hofmann will not again appear with the Boston Symphony. Now the wounds are healed, whatever they were."

Mr. Hofmann played in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Dec. 12 1913. He then gave a [illegible] Schumann's concerto. At the concert of the following Saturday night his performance of the concerto was deliberately grotesque in rhythm and in phrasing. It was evidently his purpose to disconcert the conductor and the orchestra. This he did not succeed in doing, but by his conduct he wantonly insulted an orchestra that had always supported him loyally and an audience that had applauded him for many years. Various reasons were given for his behavior. No one of them was a sufficient excuse. It was reported at the time—and the report was not idle gossip—that Mr. Hofmann boasted of "the trick that he had played on Dr. Muck." About the same time Mr. Hofmann had much to say in various periodicals about the duty of a conductor towards the pianist of a concert directed by him. Let us hope that since his last appearance with the orchestra Mr. Hofmann, like Saul of Tarsus journeying to Damascus, has seen a great light; that he will treat Mr. Monteux and the audience courteously and prove himself an artist without personal prejudices and injurious caprices.

Mr. Stransky, the Philharmonic, and the Chronicle of New York

Some have wondered why certain New Yorkers, that were shocked by the thought of Dr. Muck conducting

NEW YORK TIMES, SEPTEMBER 22,

New Orchestra Year

ALREADY the season of orchestra concerts is drawing nearer, and the time of rehearsals is at hand. The Philharmonic Society, dean of local bands and veteran of all but one or two abroad, will open as late as Nov. 14 next, which is later than the opera, for its seventy-seventh year. There will be forty-four concerts in its various subscriptions at Carnegie Hall. Josef Stransky will conduct and the soloists will be Louise Homer, Guiomar Novaes, Josef Hofmann, Jascha Heifetz, Efrem Zimbalist, Max Rosen, Mischa Levitzki, Yolanda Mero, Raoul Vidas, Harold Bauer, Mischa Elman, Ethel Leginska, and Hulda Lashanska.

The Symphony Society announcements, out today, include twenty-two concerts in Carnegie Hall, twenty at Aeolian Hall, and five in Brooklyn. Walter Damrosch, who enters on his thirty-fourth year as conductor this October, has returned from France, bringing among interesting novelties a dramatic scene, "Faust and Helena," by the late Lili Boulanger. As soloists with the Symphony Orchestra there are Alfred Cortot and Heni Casadosus, who appeared with Mr. Damrosch last July at the Conservatoire; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Hofmann, Bauer, and Levitzki, Heifetz and Toscha Seidel, Mabel Garrison, Schumann-Heink, Lucy Gates, Lashanska, and Emilio de Gogorza.

Willem Willcke of the Kneisele, a new first 'cellist in the Damrosch orchestra, and also the new first flute. Daniel [illegible]

The London Daily Telegraph in advance gave him such greeting as it might to returning prodigal:

"Welcome to the 'Proms,' which start on their way this evening, under Mr. Robert Newman's management once again, and with Sir Henry Wood once more in command. It is good hearing that Queen's Hall is practically sold out for the opening concert, though there will be accommodation, of course, for promenaders—or rather, as will probably be the case, the occupants of standing room."

Such popular things as the "William Tell" overture, Handel's so-called "Largo," and the "Peer Gynt" suite were in the opening program, and as soloists there were to be heard Lalla Miranda in "Lucia's" mad scene, and Mr. Moiseiwitsch, pianist, in Liszt's E flat concerto.

***

John Bull and John Carpenter.

In its general scheme the London season "falls into line with precedent." Mondays will again be Wagner nights, barring casual raids by the late composer's interesting countrymen, the Tuesday programs are devoted to Russian composers, and the classics "claim a hearing" on Fridays, with Beethoven to the fore.

Looking through the list of works to be performed in a London season of ten weeks, the British critic finds the names of twenty-six native composers. The list may be reckoned fairly representative, though it would be more so if it embraced the names of Stanford, Vaughan Williams, and Frank Bridge. The Russian composers number fifteen, with Tchaikovsky, of course, prominent, and Scriabin and Stravinsky among them. A Polish work is included, Paderewski's concerto in A minor, in which Miss Rachel Owen will be the soloist.

Among foreigners, the first of the season's novelties to be heard in London was Jacques-Dalcroze's "Allegory" for orchestra. "On the following evening we are to hear for the first time John Alden Carpenter's oddly-named suite, 'Adventures in a Perambulator,' this being one of the American works." Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and Brahms's double concerto were among others set down for Friday classics. The critic concluded by wishing the "Proms" luck.

***

All-American for Worcester.

When the Worcester County Medical Association holds its sixty-first annual festival from Sept. 30 to Oct. 4 next there will be widespread interest in that city's plan of giving five days of American music, sung and played by Americans. This is the most ambitious attempt of the Massachusetts town, as President Arthur J. Bassett believes it is also the first in America, to combine patriotism with serious art on an equal scale. As a war measure, the nearest approach in this Yankee nation was perhaps the post-bellum Jubilee.

The public of Worcester has shown approval in advance, and the managers have avoided any charge of falling below their own high standards by simply making up their programs from the best of sixty years. The choral works at Mechanics Hall will be George Chadwick's "Judith," originally sung at the 1900 festival, and Henry Hadley's "Ode to Music," given for the first time last year. The artists engaged are Louise Homer, Mabel Garrison, Reinald Werrenrath, George Hamlin, Arthur Hackett, Frances Nash, Milton Snyder, Emma Roberts, and Edgar Schofield.

Dr. Arthur Mees will conduct the mixed chorus of 400 voices and a band of sixty players from the Philadelphia Orchestra, with their concertmaster and associate conductor, Thaddeus Rich.

***

[illegible] in this neighborhood that the Brooklyn Institute directors voted they would be glad to see the Boston Symphony Orchestra back in future, but "with another leader than Dr. Muck." This, both Brooklyn and Manhattan will soon do, though the conductor's name is not yet [illegible] the trustees who [illegible] told in Boston, where the trustees [illegible] succeeded Major Higginson in control of his famous organization have borrowed Pierre Monteux from the Metropolitan for eight of their own October dates.

This season in Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New York Symphony Orchestra will both give their usual five concerts, starting in November. Other features in the institute's annual music program just issued, are recitals by Mischa Elman, Lucy Gates, Marie Sundelius, Herman Sandby, May Peterson, Yvette Guilbert, Reinald Werrenrath, Leo Ornstein, Arthur Shattuck, Kathleen Parlow, Marcella Craft, Mary Jordan, Maria Gimbrère, Gerard Duberta, Singers Club of New York, Sawyer Quartet, Letz Quartet, and Trio de Lutèce.

Fourteen lecture recitals by Professor W. R. Spalding of Harvard, Professor David S. Smith of Yale, Professor L. R. Lewis of Tufts College, Victor Biart and Alma Webster Powell, complete the list, so far as music is concerned in the annual prospectus.

***

London Welcomes Sir Henry.

When Neighbor Boston invited Sir Henry Wood to this country the London musician was at first said to have ac-

[illegible] HERALD

[illegible] ress: New York City

[illegible] Estab[illegible]

Henri Rabaud Coming to Direct Boston Orchestra

French Composer and Conductor Selected to Succeed the German Dr. Muck—Government Assents.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Society announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors

HENRI RABAUD

and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A cable message from the French Ministry of Fine Arts, in Paris, this morning stated that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement and would leave France as soon as possible for this country. The Ministry of Fine Arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boston Symphony Society had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

Mr. Rabaud will take the place made vacant when Dr. Karl Muck was interned as an alien enemy.

Mr. Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York last season was his opera, "Marouf." His Second Symphony is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris under Andre Messager, now in this country with the Conservatoire Orchestra. This post he has filled seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied composition with Jules Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

Pierre Monteux, French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the Boston Orchestra through its first Southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York on Saturday afternoon, November 9. Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt that Mr. Rabaud could come in time to prepare the programmes for important concerts of the orchestra outside of Boston in the first week of November, Giulio Gatti Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan, extended Mr. Monteux's leave of absence for one week and thus solved the problem.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

Left to Right, Mischa Levitzki, Pianist; Sophie Braslau, Contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, Baritone; Harold Bauer, Pianist; Jacques Thibaud, Violinist.

SUNDAY HERALD OCTOBER 6. NEW YORK TIMES, SEPTEMBER 22. n HERALD
ress: New York City
e
Establ

Many are curious concerning the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. Mr. Monteux has expressed his opinion about music by Germans and Austrians that should and should not be performed during the war. He spoke sensibly. Some really believe that a symphony by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, an overture by Weber or Schumann should come under the espionage act. Hearing this music, poor, misguided Americans will forget the atrocities in Belgium, the Lusitania, the bombing of hospitals and the sinking of hospital ships. No German need apply, whether his name happens to be Bach, Bachrich, or Backhaus.

No American is anxious or even willing to hear the music of living Germans that signed the famous manifesto of professors and others. Any American that refuses to hear music by any living German or Austrian shows patriotic fervor that is not wildly extravagant. But why should a sane person object to music by the old masters, by the old that are still young? If there is to be no music by Beethoven and the rest, who are to be heard? Will there be 24 interesting programs drawn only from French, Russian, Scandinavian, Italian, British and American sources?

The programs of the Promenade Concerts conducted by Sir Henry Wood in Queen's Hall, London, have long been famous. This year there are many protests against them. Mr. Robin H. Legge discussed the matter in the Daily Telegraph of Sept. 7. He found a wonderful unanimity in the large number of protesting letters; "their unanimity is based upon the hopeless monotony and conventionality of the entire scheme."

Legge quotes from two letters. The first should interest Bostonians, for it is thought at one time that Sir Henry Wood would conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck, leaving Boston, recommended him; but Dr. Muck, after his first sojourn in Boston, recommended Mr. Max Fiedler; Dr. Muck also brought over Mr. Schmidt to be the assistant conductor. Dr. Muck was a humorist when he was not an ironist.

Mr. Legge's correspondent wrote: "It is a great loss to the country that Sir Henry Wood could not see his way to accept the Boston offer. I had hoped against hope that he would go and afford us some relief, taking, of course, his British sea songs and Tschaikowsky with him. What is the matter with the direction of these concerts? They are, to start with, almost unique in Europe. . . . Yet when everyone is talking of keeping the foreign article out these people gaily insist on the same old stuff we have heard for years and years. . . . I am getting sick to death of hearing the eternal Tchaikowsky, Grieg, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Saint-Saëns, Handel, the same old 'Peer Gynt,' Hungarian Rhapsodies, Pathetic Symphony—and I protest vehemently it is playing down to the public. Fancy five new native works, small trifles carefully selected not to disturb the main Tschaikowsky, Rachmaninoff-Wood pieces in the program." The writer pointed out by way of comparison Beecham's last Philharmonic program, "a delight even to look at, the main piece nearly always by an Englishman and a full house!" He ended in a fine burst: "If you critics do your duty you will point out that Vaughan Williams, Edgar, Bantock, Gardiner, Holbrooke—even Stanford and Parry I prefer to the everlasting Rachmaninoff-Wood business—are real English composers, as fine as the formerly overplayed Strauss, who, of course, will be reinstated the day peace is signed!"

Some of us feared the coming of Sir Henry Wood, lest under his consulship there would be orgies of British music in Symphony Hall. There are compositions by Englishmen that one would gladly hear. William Wallace is known here only by his "Villon." The irrepressible and irascible Mr. Holbrooke has been represented by only one of his many works. There is music by the younger school; some of the members are ultra-modern in their expression; this orchestral music is wholly unknown here. We feared Sir Henry bringing with him scores by Parry, Stanford, Mackenzie and other ancient worthies, including cathedral organists who have written overtures and even symphonies, not to [illegible] gifted beings that have [illegible] degree of Mus. Doc.

[illegible] which Mr. Legge [illegible]mments was [illegible] by Sir Ernest [illegible]almer, "the founder of the patrons' [illegible] and Fanatica per la Musica Nazionale." He wrote: "These (promenade) [illegible]oncerts are entirely supported by the [illegible]ritish public and British money, and [illegible]e orchestra is also English. It is, [illegible]en, indeed strange that so little re[illegible] is paid to our own composers and [illegible] works. I am quite sure there must [illegible]my frequenting them who are pa[illegible] enough to see fair play and wish [illegible] reasonable supply of English mu[illegible] but which no one who looks over [illegible]e programs can honestly say is forthcoming. A Wagner night, a Russian [illegible]ght, a Symphony night are set forth, [illegible]d two nights are devoted to or [illegible]rmed 'popular,' whatever that may [illegible]ply; but these also are mainly de[illegible]d to foreign works. Can anyone [illegible] British night would be unreason[illegible]? Surely no difficulty could be sug[illegible]ed in finding good and attractive [illegible]rks, and, I venture to say, with as [illegible]ch appreciation as many of the for[illegible]n. The policy adopted I fail to understand; it is not patriotic or complimentary or encouraging to our own [illegible]mposers, or instructive, from a na[illegible]al point of view, to the audiences. [illegible] whatever the reason may be as[illegible]ned, I think one night a week ought [illegible] be devoted to British works."

[illegible]r. Legge agrees with this correspond[illegible] It is his belief that the chamber [illegible]rts of the London String Quartet [illegible] the improvement of the English [illegible]rs of musical appreciation" since [illegible]r began. He asks: "If, as it seems [illegible] to be the case, our chamber con[illegible]re improving in the quality alike [illegible]formance and program, why are [illegible] concerts, save those men[illegible] as being under the aegis of [illegible]m, at least making no serious ef[illegible] aim higher?"

[illegible]rnest Palmer asks for a "reason[illegible]ply of English music." There [illegible]me in the United States that [illegible] have an unreasonable amount of [illegible] orchestral works performed at [illegible] concerts. We say "unreasonable" [illegible] they would have all works of [illegible] nature by Americans performed, [illegible]rthy or unworthy, that the composers [illegible]ht at least hear them, learn their [illegible]gs, and thus be encouraged to write [illegible]. Sir Ernest Palmer does not [illegible] a "British night" would be unrea[illegible]ble. Some of our chauvinists would [illegible] American months. We do not be[illegible] in any particular "night," French, [illegible]ndinavian, Russian, British or Amer[illegible]. Some years ago Dr. Muck ar[illegible]ed a Czech program. The concert [illegible] a tiresome one, not because the [illegible]positions themselves were dull, but [illegible]re was a monotonous flavor; there [illegible] a lack of contrast.

[illegible]eat conductors often fail in pro[illegible]making. In the history of the [illegible]on Symphony Orchestra Messrs. [illegible]schel and Fiedler were by no means [illegible] most illustrious conductors, yet [illegible]r programs were better arranged [illegible] more pleasing than those provided [illegible] Mr. Nikisch or Dr. Muck.

[illegible]r. Monteux has announced the pro[illegible]s for the first three concerts. [illegible] are interesting; not too conserva[illegible] not too radical. The symphonies [illegible] by Cesar Franck, Beethoven and Brahms. We hasten to add, for the sake of the hypersensitive, that Beethoven and Brahms are dead; neither one was connected with the Hohenzollern family. Schumann, whose overture to "Manfred" will be performed, died some years ago. He was not a Prussian; Nor was Byron's hero a Prussian. Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne" will be played for the first time at these concerts. It was played here in January, 1903, by the Orchestra Club, Mrs. Longy, conductor.

Liszt wrote music illustrative of the same subject, to go with his "Mephisto" waltz. Loefler's music suggested by a poem of Verlaine has not been performed here since it was brought out at a Symphony concert with his "Devil's Villanelle." For some reason or other he has been unwilling to publish it, yet we thought when it was played that it was singularly poetic. It is a pleasure to know that Vincent d'Indy's gorgeously colored "Istar" will be played at the third concert. No one of d'Indy's orchestral compositions was performed at the Symphony concerts in the last years of Dr. Muck, who, taking offence at remarks by M. d'Indy about the musical Germanization of the United States, thus deprived the audiences of a great pleasure. Liszt's concerto in E flat major will be played by Mr. Hofmann. If any chauvinists should object to Liszt because he was a Hungarian by birth, let him recall the fact that Liszt spent many years in Paris and in Rome, was greatly influenced by the French, wrote essays and the great bulk of his letters in French, and, incidentally, was the father of children by a French countess. It might be added that neither Berlin nor Vienna enjoyed his music; that Weimar is not in Prussia; that he is buried in Bavaria. The concerto will be played by Mr. Hofmann, and there-by hangs a tale.

The New York Times of Sept. 29, publishes the following paragraph:

"That Josef Hofmann will reappear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season is good news today and a good deal of a departure, as well, from some previous misunderstandings. Those differences were serious enough to have led to a severance of relations practically since the war, and on one occasion to a controversy in print and even a formal statement that it is true that Mr. Hofmann will not again appear with the Boston Symphony. Now the wounds are healed, whatever they were."

Mr. Hofmann played in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Dec. 12 1913. He then gave [illegible] Schumann's concerto. At the concert of the following Saturday night his performance of the concerto was deliberately grotesque in rhythm and in phrasing. It was evidently his purpose to disconcert the conductor and the orchestra. This he did not succeed in doing, but by his conduct he wantonly insulted an orchestra that had always supported him loyally and an audience that had applauded him for many years. Various reasons were given for his behavior. No one of them was a sufficient excuse. It was reported at the time—and the report was not idle gossip—that Mr. Hofmann boasted of "the trick that he had played on Dr. Muck." About the same time Mr. Hofmann had much to say in various periodicals about the duty of a conductor towards the pianist of a concert directed by him. Let us hope that since his last appearance with the orchestra Mr. Hofmann, like Saul of Tarsus journeying to Damascus, has seen a great light; that he will treat Mr. Monteux and the audience courteously and prove himself an artist without personal prejudices and injurious caprices.

Mr. Stransky, the Philharmonic, and the Chronicle of New York

Some have wondered why certain New Yorkers, that were shocked by the thought of Dr. Muck conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were not vexed by the sight of Mr. Josef Stransky at the head of the Philharmonic Society of New York.

The editor of the Chronicle freed his mind on this subject as long ago as last May. His article included a letter from the secretary of the American Red Cross war fund.

"The opposition to Stransky's remaining at the head of this 76-year-old orchestra will not be abandoned until the conductor explains away much evidence against his claim of pro-Americanism. It is true he now bleats of a belated and unconvincing loyalty to the United States. To quote a witty New Yorker, 'Stransky now expresses fervent admiration for every atrocious billboard in the Hudson valley and each bump in the road he compares to a symphony of Beethoven.' But the allies have been bitten too often by 'military' and 'musical necessities,' not to be a bit shy of Mr. Stransky's 'spring defensive.' Over his signature this conductor stated that he was a contributing member of the American Red Cross."

Then follows the letter of the secretary to the editor of the Chronicle:

"I have made a very careful search of our records and do not find that Josef Stransky nor Dr. Karl Muck have ever contributed to the American Red Cross war fund through New York headquarters. We also checked up against the Philharmonic Society and the Boston Symphony to see if there was any possibility of a concealed contribution coming in through that source, but did not find anything to warrant our saying that we have received a contribution from either of these men.

"I have arranged with the proper person at the Red Cross headquarters here in New York city to see if by any chance a contribution should have come in through that source, which would be a direct contribution to the Red Cross and not in any way identified with the Red Cross war fund campaign. I am also writing to Washington headquarters to see if any information can be brought out down there."

The editor called upon "the stubborn directors" of the Philharmonic to investigate further the status of their protege.

"How many and what Liberty bonds has Mr. Stransky bought?

"Why are so many of his associates identified constantly with revelations which have led to punishment by the generous officials?

"Why should any musician who admits a pro-German attitude up to the time of America's declaration of right be employed in so high a capacity?

"Why this discourteous neglect of musicians from allied countries, many of whom are undeniably Stransky's superior in skill and inspiration?

"Will the Philharmonic directorate not profit by the facts that the enemy employs German music and Teutonic musicians to propagate Kultur in America? * * *

"Are the Philharmonic concerts next season to be known as a rendezvous for enemy sympathizers?"

Yet we read in the N. Y. Times of Sept. 29 that the Philharmonic Society would give a concert soon under the auspices of the New York Liberty loan committee. "The entire orchestra and its conductor, Josef Stransky, now in his seventh year of service, have been 'donated' to the committee and will be the feature of a loan meeting. On Nov. 13 the society will give a concert exclusively to and for soldiers, sailors and marines in the service of the United States government. Mr. Felix Leifels says the activities of the orchestra for this season "will conform in every possible way with the exigencies of the hour." There will be "patriotic concerts." The orchestra "will be made up entirely of American musicians or those whose countrymen are fighting in this war for the cause of the allies." We may yet see Mr. Stransky draped becomingly with an American flag when he comes upon the concert platform.

New Orchestra Year

ALREADY the season of orchestra concerts is drawing nearer, and the time of rehearsals is at hand. The Philharmonic Society, dean of local bands and veteran of all but one or two abroad, will open as late as Nov. 14 next, which is later than the opera, for its seventy-seventh year. There will be forty-four concerts in its various subscriptions at Carnegie Hall. Josef Stransky will conduct and the soloists will be Louise Homer, Guiomar Novaes, Josef Hofmann, Jascha Heifetz, Efrem Zimbalist, Max Rosen, Mischa Levitzki, Yolanda Mero, Raoul Vidas, Harold Bauer, Mischa Elman, Ethel Leginska, and Hulda Lashanska.

The Symphony Society announcements, out today, include twenty-two concerts in Carnegie Hall, twenty at Aeolian Hall, and five in Brooklyn. Walter Damrosch, who enters on his thirty-fourth year as conductor this October, has returned from France, bringing among interesting novelties a dramatic scene, "Faust and Helena," by the late Lili Boulanger. As soloists with the Symphony Orchestra there are Alfred Cortot and Heni Casadosus, who appeared with Mr. Damrosch last July at the Conservatoire; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Hofmann, Bauer, and Levitzki, Heifetz and Toscha Seidel, Mabel Garrison, Schumann-Heink, Lucy Gates, Lashanska, and Emilio de Gogorza.

Willem Willcke of the Kneisele, a new first 'cellist in the Damrosch orchestra, and also the new first flute. Daniel

The London Daily Telegraph in advance gave him such greeting as it might to returning prodigal:

"Welcome to the 'Proms,' which start on their way this evening, under Mr. Robert Newman's management once again, and with Sir Henry Wood once more in command. It is good hearing that Queen's Hall is practically sold out for the opening concert, though there will be accommodation, of course, for promenaders—or rather, as will probably be the case, the occupants of standing room."

Such popular things as the "William Tell" overture, Handel's so-called "Largo," and the "Peer Gynt" suite were in the opening program, and as soloists there were to be heard Lalla Miranda in "Lucia's" mad scene, and Mr. Moiseiwitsch, pianist, in Liszt's E flat concerto.

***

John Bull and John Carpenter.

In its general scheme the London season "falls into line with precedent."

Mondays will again be Wagner nights, barring casual raids by the late composer's interesting countrymen, the Tuesday programs are devoted to Russian composers, and the classics "claim a hearing" on Fridays, with Beethoven to the fore.

Looking through the list of works to be performed in a London season of ten weeks, the British critic finds the names of twenty-six native composers. The list may be reckoned fairly representative, though it would be more so if it embraced the names of Stanford, Vaughan Williams, and Frank Bridge. The Russian composers number fifteen, with Tchaikovsky, of course, prominent, and Scriabin and Stravinsky among them. A Polish work is included, Paderewski's concerto in A minor, in which Miss Rachel Owen will be the soloist.

Among foreigners, the first of the season's novelties to be heard in London was Jacques-Dalcroze's "Allegory" for orchestra. "On the following evening we are to hear for the first time John Alden Carpenter's oddly-named suite, 'Adventures in a Perambulator,' this being one of the American works." Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and Brahms's double concerto were among others set down for Friday classics. The critic concluded by wishing the "Proms" luck.

***

All-American for Worcester.

When the Worcester County Medical Association holds its sixty-first annual festival from Sept. 30 to Oct. 4 next there will be widespread interest in that city's plan of giving five days of American music, sung and played by Americans. This is the most ambitious attempt of the Massachusetts town, as President Arthur J. Bassett believes it is also the first in America, to combine patriotism with serious art on an equal scale. As a war measure, the nearest approach in this Yankee nation was perhaps the post-bellum Jubilee.

The public of Worcester has shown approval in advance, and the managers have avoided any charge of falling below their own high standards by simply making up their programs from the best of sixty years. The choral works at Mechanics Hall will be George Chadwick's "Judith," originally sung at the 1900 festival, and Henry Hadley's "Ode to Music," given for the first time last year. The artists engaged are Louise Homer, Mabel Garrison, Reinald Werrenrath, George Hamlin, Arthur Hackett, Frances Nash, Milton Snyder, Emma Roberts, and Edgar Schofield.

Dr. Arthur Mees will conduct the mixed chorus of 400 voices and a band of sixty players from the Philadelphia Orchestra, with their concertmaster and associate conductor, Thaddeus Rich.

***

in this neighborhood that the Brooklyn Institute directors voted they would be glad to see the Boston Symphony Orchestra back in future, but "with another leader than Dr. Muck." This, both Brooklyn and Manhattan will soon do, though the conductor's name is not yet [illegible] the trustees who told in Boston, where the trustees succeeded Major Higginson in control of his famous organization have borrowed Pierre Monteux from the Metropolitan for eight of their own October dates.

This season in Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New York Symphony Orchestra will both give their usual five concerts, starting in November. Other features in the institute's annual music program just issued, are recitals by Mischa Elman, Lucy Gates, Marie Sundelius, Herman Sandby, May Peterson, Yvette Guilbert, Reinald Werrenrath, Leo Ornstein, Arthur Shattuck, Kathleen Parlow, Marcella Craft, Mary Jordan, Maria Gimbrère, Gerard Duberta, Singers Club of New York, Sawyer Quartet, Letz Quartet, and Trio de Lutèce.

Fourteen lecture recitals by Professor W. R. Spalding of Harvard, Professor David S. Smith of Yale, Professor L. R. Lewis of Tufts College, Victor Biart and Alma Webster Powell, complete the list, so far as music is concerned in the annual prospectus.

***

London Welcomes Sir Henry.

When Neighbor Boston invited Sir Henry Wood to this country the London musician was at first said to have accepted, and only after days or weeks declined. His way quite reversed that of the hesitant maiden in the old song, who first said she wouldn't, then whispered she couldn't, and finally murmured, "Well, I'll see." Wood's "no" was long withheld, but it is apparently final.

Sir Henry has just resumed his concerts in the British metropolis, where

Henri Rabaud Coming to Direct Boston Orchestra

French Composer and Conductor Selected to Succeed the German Dr. Muck—Government Assents.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Society announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors

and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A cable message from the French Ministry of Fine Arts, in Paris, this morning stated that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement and would leave France as soon as possible for this country. The Ministry of Fine Arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boston Symphony Society had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

Mr. Rabaud will take the place made vacant when Dr. Karl Muck was interned as an alien enemy.

Mr. Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York last season was his opera, "Marouf." His Second Symphony is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris under Andre Messager, now in this country with the Conservatoire Orchestra. This post he has filled seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied composition with Jules Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

Pierre Monteux, French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the Boston Orchestra through its first Southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York on Saturday afternoon, November 9. Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt that Mr. Rabaud could come in time to prepare the programmes for important concerts of the orchestra outside of Boston in the first week of November, Giulio Gatti Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan, extended Mr. Monteux's leave of absence for one week and thus solved the problem.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

Left to Right, Mischa Levitzki, Pianist; Sophie Braslau, Contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, Baritone; Harold Bauer, Pianist; Jacques Thibaud, Violinist.

SUNDAY HERALD OCTOBER 6. NEW YORK TIMES, SEPTEMBER 22, n HERALD
ress: New York City
e

Many are curious concerning the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. Mr. Monteux has expressed his opinion about music by Germans and Austrians that should and should not be performed during the war. He spoke sensibly. Some really believe that a symphony by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, an overture by Weber or Schumann should come under the espionage act. Hearing this music, poor, misguided Americans will forget the atrocities in Belgium, the Lusitania, the bombing of hospitals and the sinking of hospital ships. No German need apply, whether his name happens to be Bach, Bachrich, or Backhaus.

No American is anxious or even willing to hear the music of living Germans that signed the famous manifesto of professors and others. Any American that refuses to hear music by any living German or Austrian shows patriotic fervor that is not wildly extravagant. But why should a sane person object to music by the old masters, by the old that are still young? If there is to be no music by Beethoven and the rest, who are to be heard? Will there be 24 interesting programs drawn only from French, Russian, Scandinavian, Italian, British and American sources?

The programs of the Promenade Concerts conducted by Sir Henry Wood in Queen's Hall, London, have long been famous. This year there are many protests against them. Mr. Robin H. Legge discussed the matter in the Daily Telegraph of Sept. 7. He found a wonderful unanimity in the large number of protesting letters; "their unanimity is based upon the hopeless monotony and conventionality of the entire scheme."

Legge quotes from two letters. The first should interest Bostonians, for it was thought at one time that Sir Henry Wood would conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck, leaving Boston, recommended him; but Muck, after his first sojourn in Boston, recommended Mr. Max Fiedler; Muck also brought over Mr. Schmidt to be the assistant conductor. Dr. Muck was a humorist when he was not an ironist.

Mr. Legge's correspondent wrote: "It is a great loss to the country that Sir Henry Wood could not see his way to accept the Boston offer. I had hoped against hope that he would go and afford us some relief, taking, of course, his British sea songs and Tschaikowsky with him. What is the matter with the direction of these concerts? There are, to start with, almost unique in Europe. . . . Yet when everyone is talking of keeping the foreign artists out these people gaily insist on the same old stuff we have heard for years and years. . . . I am getting sick to death of hearing the eternal Tchaikowsky, Grieg, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Saint-Saens, Handel, the same old 'Peer Gynt,' Hungarian Rhapsodies, Pathetic Symphony—and I protest vehemently it is playing down to the public. Fancy five new native works, small trifles, carefully selected not to disturb the plain Tschaikowsky, Rachmaninoff-Wood pieces in the program." The writer pointed out by way of comparison Beecham's last Philharmonic program, "a delight even to look at, the main piece nearly always by an Englishman and a full house!" He ended in a fine burst: "If you critics do your duty you will point out that Vaughan Williams, Edgar, Bantock, Gardiner, Holbrooke—even Stanford and Parry I prefer to the everlasting Rachmaninoff-Wood business—are real English composers, as fine as the formerly overplayed Strauss, who, of course, will be reinstated the day peace is signed!"

Some of us feared the coming of Sir Henry Wood, lest under his consulship there would be orgies of British music in Symphony Hall. There are compositions by Englishmen that one would gladly hear. William Wallace is known here only by his "Villon." The irrepressible and irascible Mr. Holbrooke has been represented by only one of his many works. There is music by the younger school; some of the members are ultra-modern in their expression; this orchestral music is wholly unknown here. We feared Sir Henry bringing with him scores by Parry, Stanford, Mackenzie and other ancient worthies, including cathedral organists who have written overtures and even symphonies, not to mention gifted beings that have taken degree of Mus. Doc.

While the Germans have been able to assign their task in this region to the Bulgars, who were not available for service in France or Belgium. Only a few German troops, and not many more Austrians, have been employed in the Balkans, while the British and French alone have had nearly a quarter of a million locked up in what the Germans have not inaptly described as the greatest internment camp in Europe."

But now, when Ludendorff is fighting for his life in France and Austrian troops are aiding him, or are massed in Italy against a possible Italian offensive, the Balkan situation makes an imperative demand upon German reserves, urgently needed in Flanders and in Lorraine, and, as a result, Germany has to weaken her armies in France to save her position in Bulgaria. As a consequence the Balkans cease to be a "side show" for the allies; they have become a very important circumstance in the main drama. If you desire a parallel it is to be found in the Spanish situation of 1813, when Napoleon, fighting desperately in Germany, was obliged to send troops to Spain, which, had they been under his hands in Saxony, might have prevented the disaster which overtook the great Emperor at Leipsic.

Means a Long Step Toward Peace

We shall do well to be wary of too great immediate expectations in the Balkans. Bulgaria may have sought by the threat of surrender to compel her German ally to send troops, although [illegible] and refused, while at [illegible] occasion to a controversy in print and even a formal statement that it is true that Mr. Hofmann will not again appear with the Boston Symphony. Now the wounds are healed, whatever they were."

Mr. Hofmann played in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Dec. 12 1913. He then gave a [illegible]

New Orchestra Year

ALREADY the season of orchestra concerts is drawing nearer, and the time of rehearsals is at hand. The Philharmonic Society, dean of local bands and veteran of all but one or two abroad, will open as late as Nov. 14 next, which is later than the opera, for its seventy-seventh year. There will be forty-four concerts in its various subscriptions at Carnegie Hall. Josef Stransky will conduct and the soloists will be Louise Homer, Guiomar Novaes, Josef Hofmann, Jascha Heifetz, Efrem Zimbalist, Max Rosen, Mischa Levitzki, Yolanda Mero, Raoul Vidas, Harold Bauer, Mischa Elman, Ethel Leginska, and Hulda Lashanska.

The Symphony Society announcements, out today, include twenty-two concerts in Carnegie Hall, twenty at Aeolian Hall, and five in Brooklyn. Walter Damrosch, who enters on his thirty-fourth year as conductor this October, has returned from France, bringing among interesting novelties a dramatic scene, "Faust and Helena," by the late Lili Boulanger. As soloists with the Symphony Orchestra there are Alfred Cortot and Heni Casadosus, who appeared with Mr. Damrosch last July at the Conservatoire; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Hofmann, Bauer, and Levitzki, Heifetz and Toscha Seidel, Mabel Garrison, Schumann-Heink, Lucy Gates, Lashanska, and Emilio de Gogorza.

Willem Willcke of the Kneisele, a new first 'cellist in the Damrosch orchestra, and also the new first flute. Daniel Maquarre, will be heard as soloists either at Carnegie or Aeolian Halls.

***

Miss Wilson Aids Russians.

With the belief that a better understanding of Russia and its people could be reached by a more general appreciation of that country's artistic resources, Colonel William Boyce Thompson has accepted the Presidency of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, founded by Modest Altschuler, its present conductor, fifteen years ago. Colonel Thompson announces that the Russian Symphony has been particularly fortunate in having the patronage of Miss Margaret Woodrow Wilson, who has been indefatigable in obtaining support for the society's work so that these concerts should be a permanent feature of American musical life.

It was Colonel Thompson's timely generosity, however, that enabled Mr. Altschuler to give his subscription concerts in New York last Winter. While some contributions had been received, there was still lacking $10,000, and this he contributed when the matter was brought to his attention. He took the ground that in every way the bonds between this country and struggling Russia should be strengthened and that Russian music should be encouraged to this end.

As head of the Red Cross mission to Russia, Colonel Thompson spent nearly a year in the country now under the Bolsheviki and gained a knowledge of Russian character and of the political affairs of that bewildered nation. The mission obtained an insight into the psychology underlying the Russian revolution, and, in spite of the social upheaval, Colonel Thompson was able to bring back to America some important Russian musical scores.

***

Musical Plans in Brooklyn.

When excitement ran high last season over the case of Dr. Carl Muck, it happened at one of the last of his concerts in this neighborhood that the Brooklyn Institute directors voted they would be glad to see the Boston Symphony Orchestra back in future, but "with another leader than Dr. Muck." This, both Brooklyn and Manhattan will soon do, though the conductor's name is not yet told in Boston, where the trustees who succeeded Major Higginson in control of his famous organization have borrowed Pierre Monteux from the Metropolitan for eight of their own October dates.

This season in Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New York Symphony Orchestra will both give their usual five concerts, starting in November. Other features in the institute's annual music program just issued, are recitals by Mischa Elman, Lucy Gates, Marie Sundelius, Herman Sandby, May Peterson, Yvette Guilbert, Reinald Werrenrath, Leo Ornstein, Arthur Shattuck, Kathleen Parlow, Marcella Craft, Mary Jordan, Maria Gimbrère, Gerard Duberta, Singers Club of New York, Sawyer Quartet, Letz Quartet, and Trio de Lutèce.

Fourteen lecture recitals by Professor W. R. Spalding of Harvard, Professor David S. Smith of Yale, Professor L. R. Lewis of Tufts College, Victor Biart and Alma Webster Powell, complete the list, so far as music is concerned in the annual prospectus.

***

London Welcomes Sir Henry.

When Neighbor Boston invited Sir Henry Wood to this country the London musician was at first said to have accepted, and only after days or weeks declined. His way quite reversed that of the hesitant maiden in the old song, who first said she wouldn't, then whispered she couldn't, and finally murmured, "Well, I'll see." Wood's "no" was long withheld, but it is apparently final.

Sir Henry has just resumed his concerts in the British metropolis, where The London Daily Telegraph in advance gave him such greeting as it might to returning prodigal:

"Welcome to the 'Proms,' which start on their way this evening, under Mr. Robert Newman's management once again, and with Sir Henry Wood once more in command. It is good hearing that Queen's Hall is practically sold out for the opening concert, though there will be accommodation, of course, for promenaders—or rather, as will probably be the case, the occupants of standing room."

Such popular things as the "William Tell" overture, Handel's so-called "Largo," and the "Peer Gynt" suite were in the opening program, and as soloists there were to be heard Lalla Miranda in "Lucia's" mad scene, and Mr. Moiseiwitsch, pianist, in Liszt's E flat concerto.

***

John Bull and John Carpenter.

In its general scheme the London season "falls into line with precedent."

Mondays will again be Wagner nights, barring casual raids by the late composer's interesting countrymen, the Tuesday programs are devoted to Russian composers, and the classics "claim a hearing" on Fridays, with Beethoven to the fore.

Looking through the list of works to be performed in a London season of ten weeks, the British critic finds the names of twenty-six native composers. The list may be reckoned fairly representative, though it would be more so if it embraced the names of Stanford, Vaughan Williams, and Frank Bridge. The Russian composers number fifteen, with Tchaikovsky, of course, prominent, and Scriabin and Stravinsky among them. A Polish work is included, Paderewski's concerto in A minor, in which Miss Rachel Owen will be the soloist.

Among foreigners, the first of the season's novelties to be heard in London was Jacques-Dalcroze's "Allegory" for orchestra. "On the following evening we are to hear for the first time John Alden Carpenter's oddly-named suite, 'Adventures in a Perambulator,' this being one of the American works." Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and Brahms's double concerto were among others set down for Friday classics. The critic concluded by wishing the "Proms" luck.

***

All-American for Worcester.

When the Worcester County Medical Association holds its sixty-first annual festival from Sept. 30 to Oct. 4 next there will be widespread interest in that city's plan of giving five days of American music, sung and played by Americans. This is the most ambitious attempt of the Massachusetts town, as President Arthur J. Bassett believes it is also the first in America, to combine patriotism with serious art on an equal scale. As a war measure, the nearest approach in this Yankee nation was perhaps the post-bellum Jubilee.

The public of Worcester has shown approval in advance, and the managers have avoided any charge of falling below their own high standards by simply making up their programs from the best of sixty years. The choral works at Mechanics Hall will be George Chadwick's "Judith," originally sung at the 1900 festival, and Henry Hadley's "Ode to Music," given for the first time last year. The artists engaged are Louise Homer, Mabel Garrison, Reinald Werrenrath, George Hamlin, Arthur Hackett, Frances Nash, Milton Snyder, Emma Roberts, and Edgar Schofield.

Dr. Arthur Mees will conduct the mixed chorus of 400 voices and a band of sixty players from the Philadelphia Orchestra, with their concertmaster and associate conductor, Thaddeus Rich.

***

Henri Rabaud Coming to Direct Boston Orchestra

French Composer and Conductor Selected to Succeed the German Dr. Muck—Government Assents.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Society announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors

HENRI RABAUD

and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A cable message from the French Ministry of Fine Arts, in Paris, this morning stated that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement and would leave France as soon as possible for this country. The Ministry of Fine Arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boston Symphony Society had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

Mr. Rabaud will take the place made vacant when Dr. Karl Muck was interned as an alien enemy.

Mr. Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York last season was his opera, "Marouf." His Second Symphony is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris under Andre Messager, now in this country with the Conservatoire Orchestra. This post he has filled seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied composition with Jules Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

Pierre Monteux, French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the Boston Orchestra through its first Southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York on Saturday afternoon, November 9. Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt that Mr. Rabaud could come in time to prepare the programmes for important concerts of the orchestra outside of Boston in the first week of November, Giulio Gatti Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan, extended Mr. Monteux's leave of absence for one week and thus solved the problem.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

SUNDAY HERALD, OCTOBER 13,

The Herald published last Sunday extracts from letters written to the Daily Telegraph of London protesting against the character of the programs arranged for the Promenade concerts. It may be remembered that in one of the letters the writer shouted for the British composer and insisted that men like Messrs. Vaughan Williams, Gardiner, Bantock and other British worthies are superior to the foreign composers represented and even to old man Richard Strauss, whose music had been "over played" before the war.

The Daily Telegraph of Sept. 14 published a letter in reply written by Chappell & Co. The matter discussed is of interest in Boston and in other American cities in which, it is said, the American composer is shamefully neglected.

We now quote from the letter of Chappell & Co.

"In reply to Mr. Legge's criticism of the Promenade program, the moment we are convinced by receipts that the public prefer Mr. Joseph Holbrook's music to that of Beethoven, or Mr. Granville Bantock's composition to those of Tchaikovsky, we are perfectly prepared radically to alter the character of the Queen's Hall program.

"Mr. Legge asks who is responsible for the drawing up of these programs. They are drawn up by Mr. Robert Newman, whose long experience thoroughly qualifies him for the task. Mr. Newman has general instructions from us to draw up the programs upon the most popular lines, and they are finally submitted to us for our approval.

"The musical public, which quite well knows what it wants, will not be dictated to by us, or even by eminent musical critics. Sir Henry Wood every season submits to us a large number of novelties, including English works. We have to point out to Sir Henry Wood that novelties, particularly British ones, do not attract, and that as, more particularly during such a war as this, it costs thousands of pounds to run orchestral concerts, it is not possible, unless you are a millionaire, to exploit novelties and at the same time find the money to pay your artists.

"We would remind Mr. Legge that there are over sixty orchestral works by English composers in this season's programs, in spite of the melancholy fact that Sir Edward Elgar, and in another school, Edward German, are the only two English composers whose orchestral works are any attraction.

"Sir Ernest Palmer's generous contributions in aid of British modern music are well known. May we remind him, however, of certain endowment concerts of his, expressly organized some years ago to introduce new English works, which concerts, if we remember rightly, were given at the Queen's Hall and elsewhere? He will not have forgotten that these concerts had to be discontinued, owing to the total lack of public support. If Sir Ernest Palmer thinks that times have changed, we would suggest that he should lease from us at cost price the Queen's Hall, the Queen's Hall Orchestra, and the incidental expenses, and experiment upon a week of programs of modern British music at the Promenade concerts. We would willingly see him successful. We, as English publishers, have much more to gain by exploiting copyright works by modern English composers rather than non-copyright works by the dead masters. Unfortunately, as we said before, the obstinate British public, who will not be dictated to, still stand in the way. They still prefer Beethoven to Joseph Holbrooke, and Tchaikovsky to Villers Stanford and Granville Bantock."

In other words the statement of a writer who discussed the problem of the British composer in the London Times two years ago holds good in London, Paris, Boston, New York; the majority of those who habitually attend orchestral concerts do not care a rap about the source of any work. "They merely ask themselves vaguely whether it appeals to their senses, and if it does, they applaud it and expect to hear it again before long. . . . In the case of the forthcoming Promenade concerts the future depends on the capacity of the audiences—to show a sense of responsibility, for the scheme admirably rests on a policy of giving the public what it desires."

It has been said that in view of the close relationship now existing between France and the United States, French music should be "cultivated" in Boston, especially as there are so many Frenchmen in the orchestra and there are French conductors for the season.

Boston has been well disposed toward French music from the early orchestral days. In no other American city, and in no foreign city outside of France has the music of Berlioz been so much played and so greatly appreciated. And it should be remembered that even in Paris the music of this genius was not "in fashion" until the end of the Franco-Prussian war, when Berlioz was pitted through national pride against Wagner.

Before Saint-Saens wrote his symphonic poems there was little French purely orchestral music of importance except that by Berlioz. The music of France was represented in our concert halls chiefly by the overtures of Auber, Herold and earlier composers. Since the days of the Theodore Thomas concerts in the old Music Hall, music by French composers has been heard often and gladly in Symphony concerts. No one of the conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been remiss in this respect. Mr. Paur may have been prejudiced in favor of Chabrier; Dr. Muck may have been prejudiced against Vincent d'Indy on account of the latter's biting but true remarks about the undue Germanic influence on musical conditions in this country, but the programs of the orchestra from the beginning show the affectionate attention paid to the music of France.

Messrs. Loeffler and Adamowski were never weary of introducing violin concertos and chamber music by French composers. Even the Kneisel Quartet at last realized the existence of Cesar Franck and gave memorable performances of his quartet and piano quintet. Then came Mr. Longy, who acquainted us with many interesting chamber and orchestral works of his countrymen.

We have had the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reorganized and under Mr. Monteux's direction. Already it is a remarkable orchestra, although the men have played but little together: remarkable for euphony, sense of proportion, sensuous quality of the strings in purely melodic passages, feeling for rhythm, brilliance, plasticity. Mr. Monteux in rehearsal has proved himself the conductor for the occasion. May his successor, Mr. Rabaud, be as catholic in taste, as skilful and sympathetic as an interpreter!

The Evening Bulletin of Providence, R. I., would not have any German music played even in the back room of a top flat. It is moved to this editorial opinion by aesthetic as well as patriotic convictions. The editorial article is headed, "The German Music-Blight." It is delightful reading.

It appears that "the average man and a few independent observers have been telling the country for years that the 'Germanic craze' was smothering the musical taste and talent of the people." The rest of us were criminally deaf. We had ears, but we heard not.

"Now music," writes this close reasoner, "is wholly—first, last, all the time—merely a matter of sound, whether actual or only imaginary. If not pleasant to you, it is not music to you, though it may be pleasant, therefore music, to somebody else. The Anglo-Saxon, the Latin and the German, as to music, are basically different in this: The Anglo-Saxon and the Latin love harmony, the German loves discord. In other words, the highest musical expression for the German is wrought out of basically inharmonious sounds. To the typical Anglo-Saxon this is only noise—a high grade of noise, perhaps—but noise, not music. To him, when sounds are basically discordant, they are all the time discordant, whether for an hour or for eternity. This difference, because a matter of racial psychology, can never be bridged. Hence the attempt to develop an American musical literature on a German stock is like raising peaches on plum trees by grafting. Though it could be done, what would be the use of it? There are, or may be, plenty of peach trees. In his preference for concord over discord the Anglo-Saxon has the support of the Italians, the most musical of all nationalities, of the French, the Poles and the Russians to an extent. But even if wholly unsupported we need not vex our ears and rack our sleep with the fretful din just because first 'made in Germany.' A caterwaul is not musical to us, regardless of its source."

Our young men and women have been made to believe that German music is the only music, "and to profess to like it, largely because such hypocrisy was 'good form.' * * * We do not as a people enjoy this so-called music that sounds like the rattle of tin pans at a charivari. * * * Why not cultivate our own music and work in harmony with our own racial genius, instead of spending time, effort and money trying to contradict it?"

EARLY LIFE OF YOUNG HEIFETZ

Some Facts Concerning Famous Young Russian Violinist

Jascha Heifetz, the young Russian violinist, who first reached this country on Sept. 5, 1917, and then had phenomenal artistic success wherever he appeared in concert, has figured in press notices almost beyond count, but rarely, strange to say, have they contained facts about his earlier life.

He was born in Vilna, Russia, almost 19 years ago. He began his study of the violin at the age of 3 with his father, who was a fine violinist. When he was 5 years old Heifetz entered the Royal School of Music in his native city, and during the same year he made his first public appearance. When 6 years old he played the Mendelssohn Concerto, and two years later he was graduated from the conservatory. A short time after this he was taken to Petrograd, where after repeated disappointments he secured a coveted hearing with Leopold Auer, and it is said that this great teacher after hearing him proclaimed him to be an astonishing genius.

Within the next two years young Heifetz made his formal debut in a recital at Petrograd, and thereby drew to himself the attention of musical Russia. In Odessa alone he played seven times with the Odessa Symphony orchestra. In 1911 he went on a tour through many cities

Jascha Heifetz.

GLOBE—OCTOBER 13,

SYMPHONY PLAN AGAIN CHANGED

Further Postponement of Season's Opening to Oct. 25

Again must the opening of the Symphony season be postponed. It is a great disappointment to the patrons, but it is a very necessary feature of the work to subdue the epidemic.

According to present plans, the season will now open on Friday afternoon, Oct. 25, and Saturday evening, Oct. 26. Health Commissioner Woodward has held out hope that this week will be the last week of the ban on theatres, music halls and other places of public assemblage.

The postponement means another reconstruction of programs. Josef Hofman's appearance in Cambridge and Boston must be postponed, but arrangements will be made by which he will appear later. Under present conditions there are only two concerts before the orchestra leaves on its first southern trip. There will be no soloist at the first concerts Oct. 25-26, and at the next pair of concerts on Nov. 1 and 2 the soloist will be Florence Easton, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Subscribers to the Symphony season will not lose the two concerts in October which have been postponed; at least, they will be given in May, and it is within the realm of possibility that one pair may be given during the winter.

The first concert of the Cambridge series will be given either one or two weeks later.

Mr. Monteux is hard at work with the orchestra. Rehearsals are held every morning of the six weekdays from 10 to 1. The orchestra is rapidly getting into prime condition, and Mr. Monteux expresses himself as being more than satisfied.

No word has yet been received regarding the sailing of Mr. Rabaud. It is expected that he will sail within the next 10 days, which will bring him to Boston in ample time to make himself familiar with his new environment and begin his work with the orchestra in the second week of November.

BAUER AND THIBAUD AT SYMPHONY HALL

Will Open Series of Sunday Afternoon Concerts Oct. 27

Two weeks from today, in Symphony Hall, the regular Sunday afternoon series of concerts will commence for the season. Instead of Mme. Galli-Curci, who was to have opened the season on Sept. 29 (and whose concert was postponed on account of the health department ruling), the first of the concerts will be given by Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. It was in April, 1917, that these artists were last heard in joint concert, and, as in past seasons, they appeared together on the Jordan Hall stage. They have now been engaged for a Symphony Hall concert.

It was in London some years ago that Bauer and Thibaud inaugurated the policy of appearing in joint concert, and the unusual success of the venture has followed them closely in all parts of this country.

Jascha Heifetz, whose success compares with that of Mme. Galli-Curci, will give the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, on Nov. 3.

"A Musical Journey Through Spain," one of the successful novelties produced in New York last spring, is the title of the afternoon's program announced for Saturday, Nov. 2, in Symphony Hall. Raoul Laparra, the French composer of piano numbers, songs and two operas, will appear with Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, in a series of songs of Spanish theme, Mr. Laparra playing the piano accompaniments, and Mme. Stanley wearing the costumes of the periods. Twelve songs, in dialect, comprise Mme. Stanley's part of the program, to which Mr. Laparra will add piano solos of his own composition, entitled "Spanish Rhythms."

Mr. Henri Leon Berger, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 28 years, having resigned his position, is now living in Hartford, Ct., as instructor in the violin department of the Hartford School of Music. A pupil of Charles Dancla, he was a member of the Colonne Orchestra in Paris, before he came to Boston. He is an American citizen. In Hartford he hopes to organize a Quartet or Trio to give chamber concerts.

SYMPHONY AND OTHER CONCERT ANNOUNCEMENTS

According to present expectations the Symphony concert season will begin Friday afternoon, Oct 25, and Saturday evening, Oct 26.

The postponement means another reconstruction of program. There will be no soloist at the first concert and at the next pair of concerts the soloist will be Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Subscribers to the Symphony season will not lose the two concerts in October which have been postponed; at least they will be given in May, and it is within the realms of possibility that one pair may be given during the Winter.

The first concert of the Cambridge series will be given either one or two weeks later.

In the meantime Mr Monteux is hard at work with the orchestra. Rehearsals are held every morning of the six weekdays from 10 to 1, so the orchestra will not suffer from the postponement of the opening of the season. It is rapidly getting into prime condition, and Mr Monteux expresses himself as being more than satisfied with it.

No word has yet been received regarding the sailing of Mr Rabaud, but it is expected that he will sail within the next 10 days, which will bring him to Boston in ample time to make himself familiar with his new environment and begin his work with the orchestra in the second week of November.

The Sunday afternoon series of Symphony Hall concerts are now announced to begin Oct 27. Instead of Mme Galli-Curci, who was to have opened the season on Sept 29, the first of the concerts will be given by Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. It was in April, 1917, that these artists were last heard here in joint concert.

Jacob Heifetz, whose flights to fame have been almost unprecedented, will give the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts on Nov 3.

"A Musical Journey Through Spain" is the title of the afternoon's program announced for Saturday, Nov 2, in Symphony Hall. Raoul Laparra, the French composer of piano numbers, songs and two operas, will appear with Mme Helen Stanley, soprano, in a series of songs of Spanish theme, Mr Laparra playing the piano accompaniments and Mme Stanley garbed in the costumes of the periods.

HERALD, OCTOBER 13,

SYMPHONY PLAN AGAIN CHANGED

Further Postponement of Season's Opening to Oct. 25

Again must the opening of the Symphony season be postponed. It is a great disappointment to the patrons, but it is a very necessary feature of the work to subdue the epidemic.

According to present plans, the season will now open on Friday afternoon, Oct. 25, and Saturday evening, Oct. 26. Health Commissioner Woodward has held out hope that this week will be the last week of the ban on theatres, music halls and other places of public assemblage.

The postponement means another reconstruction of programs. Josef Hofman's appearance in Cambridge and Boston must be postponed, but arrangements will be made by which he will appear later. Under present conditions there are only two concerts before the orchestra leaves on its first southern trip. There will be no soloist at the first concerts Oct. 25-26, and at the next pair of concerts on Nov. 1 and 2 the soloist will be Florence Easton, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Subscribers to the Symphony season will not lose the two concerts in October which have been postponed; at least, they will be given in May, and it is within the realm of possibility that one pair may be given during the winter.

The first concert of the Cambridge series will be given either one or two weeks later.

Mr. Monteux is hard at work with the orchestra. Rehearsals are held every morning of the six weekdays from 10 to 1. The orchestra is rapidly getting into prime condition, and Mr. Monteux expresses himself as being more than satisfied.

No word has yet been received regarding the sailing of Mr. Rabaud. It is expected that he will sail within the next 10 days, which will bring him to Boston in ample time to make himself familiar with his new environment and begin his work with the orchestra in the second week of November.

BAUER AND THIBAUD AT SYMPHONY HALL

Will Open Series of Sunday Afternoon Concerts Oct. 27

Two weeks from today, in Symphony Hall, the regular Sunday afternoon series of concerts will commence for the season. Instead of Mme. Galli-Curci, who was to have opened the season on Sept. 29 (and whose concert was postponed on account of the health department ruling), the first of the concerts will be given by Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. It was in April, 1917, that these artists were last heard in joint concert, and, as in past seasons, they appeared together on the Jordan Hall stage. They have now been engaged for a Symphony Hall concert.

It was in London some years ago that Bauer and Thibaud inaugurated the policy of appearing in joint concert, and the unusual success of the venture has followed them closely in all parts of this country.

Jascha Heifetz, whose success compares with that of Mme. Galli-Curci, will give the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, on Nov. 3.

"A Musical Journey Through Spain," one of the successful novelties produced in New York last spring, is the title of the afternoon's program announced for Saturday, Nov. 2, in Symphony Hall. Raoul Laparra, the French composer of piano numbers, songs and two operas, will appear with Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, in a series of songs of Spanish theme, Mr. Laparra playing the piano accompaniments, and Mme. Stanley wearing the costumes of the periods. Twelve songs, in dialect, comprise Mme. Stanley's part of the program, to which Mr. Laparra will add piano solos of his own composition, entitled "Spanish Rhythms."

REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON'S CONDUCTOR

Henri Rabaud, New Leader of Symphony Orchestra, Is Famed as Composer

It was announced on Friday that the new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra would be Henri Rabaud of Paris. It is expected that M. Rabaud will arrive in Boston in time to conduct the concerts of November 15 and 16. As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, conductor at the Metropolitan opera house, is to direct the orchestra until the permanent conductor begins work.

Speculation as to the choice of a successor to Dr Muck had not fas-

HENRI RABAUD

New Conductor of Boston Symphony

tened on M Rabaud. It was expected that a French musician would be chosen, but Camille Chevillard had been "prominently mentioned," as the phrase goes, while M Rabaud had not. This fact is unimportant. M Rabaud is a conductor and composer of note, though hardly pre-eminent, and the trustees of the orchestra have apparently been both wise in selecting him and fortunate in procuring his services.

As M Rabaud is relatively little known in the United States, though his music has been frequently performed, there will be widespread interest in all first-hand information regarding him. On Friday night the music editor of the Boston Transcript, who is familiar with continental opera houses and concert halls, was able to give the musical public the information that it sought.

"Americans who have frequented the Opera, the Opera Comique and symphony concerts in Paris," says the Transcript writer, "will readily recall Mr Rabaud—an unusual and pictorial figure, whether he was conductor or only intent listener, tall, gaunt, bearded, olive-skinned, grave of glance and quick of gesture, oriental rather than Parisian in impression to the eye. None the less, he was born in Paris in 1873, the son of a professor at the Conservatory. In that school he was educated as a musician and in the '90s began the practice of his calling in Paris. As conductor he served with increasing skill and reputation at the Opera, at the Opera Comique and in occasional orchestral concerts. As composer, he wrote symphonies, tone-poems, operas and a single oratorio, 'Job.'

"The second of his two symphonies has been heard relatively often in America—at the hands of the Boston orchestral club under Mr Longy, of the New York symphony orchestra under Mr Damrosch, of the Philadelphia orchestra under Mr Stokowski and at the Worcester festival last autumn. His symphonic poem, 'La Procession Nocturne,' has been less frequently played in the United States, but Mr Longy ventured it several years ago in Boston, and it is announced for performance next month at the symphony concerts. Of his three operas, only one, 'Marouf, Savetier de Caire,' produced at the Metropolitan last December, is known by actual representation in America. The other two, 'La Fille de Roland,' and 'Par le Glaive,'—heroic pieces drawn from the like-named plays of De Bornier and Richepin—have been heard only in Paris and, possibly, Brussels. In contrast, 'Marouf' recounts with no little humor and fantasy a fable from the Arabian Nights.

"As composer, Mr Rabaud is neither academic nor ultra-modern. Rather, as his music for both the theater and the concert hall suggests, he is eclectic, following no formula, but seeking such forms and procedures as best suit the substance, mood and progress of his music.

"As conductor Mr Rabaud, like many of his predecessors, will come to the symphony orchestra from the opera house rather than the concert hall. Deservedly his Parisian reputation as orchestral leader is high, if not signal; while here in Boston he will have forces, freedom and opportunity such as he has never enjoyed before and such as are sure to stimulate him. He is a practiced master of orchestral routine; he is diligent in rehearsal; he wins the respect and the good will of his men as he does, indeed, of all who come into close contact with him.

"By the warrant of his eclectic music his programs through 20 pairs of concerts with the symphony orchestra should be catholic enough to please the most exacting. Clearly, in all that pertains to music he is open-

SUNDAY HERALD, OCTOBER 13,

The Herald published last Sunday extracts from letters written to the Daily Telegraph of London protesting against the character of the programs arranged for the Promenade concerts. It may be remembered that in one of the letters the writer shouted for the British composer and insisted that men like Messrs. Vaughan Williams, Gardiner, Bantock and other British worthies are superior to the foreign composers represented and even to old man Richard Strauss, whose music had been "over played" before the war.

The Daily Telegraph of Sept. 14 published a letter in reply written by Chappell & Co. The matter discussed is of interest in Boston and in other American cities in which, it is said, the American composer is shamefully neglected.

We now quote from the letter of Chappell & Co.

"In reply to Mr. Legge's criticism of the Promenade program, the moment we are convinced by receipts that the public prefer Mr. Joseph Holbrook's music to that of Beethoven, or Mr. Granville Bantock's composition to those of Tchaikovsky, we are perfectly prepared radically to alter the character of the Queen's Hall program.

"Mr. Legge asks who is responsible for the drawing up of these programs. They are drawn up by Mr. Robert Newman, whose long experience thoroughly qualifies him for the task. Mr. Newman has general instructions from us to draw up the programs upon the most popular lines, and they are finally submitted to us for our approval.

"The musical public, which quite well knows what it wants, will not be dictated to by us, or even by eminent musical critics. Sir Henry Wood every season submits to us a large number of novelties, including English works. We have to point out to Sir Henry Wood that novelties, particularly British ones, do not attract, and that as, more particularly during such a war as this, it costs thousands of pounds to run orchestral concerts, it is not possible, unless you are a millionaire, to exploit novelties and at the same time find the money to pay your artists.

"We would remind Mr. Legge that there are over sixty orchestral works by English composers in this season's programs, in spite of the melancholy fact that Sir Edward Elgar, and in another school, Edward German, are the only two English composers whose orchestral works are any attraction.

"Sir Ernest Palmer's generous contributions in aid of British modern music are well known. May we remind him, however, of certain endowment concerts of his, expressly organized some years ago to introduce new English works, which concerts, if we remember rightly, were given at the Queen's Hall and elsewhere? He will not have forgotten that these concerts had to be discontinued, owing to the total lack of public support. If Sir Ernest Palmer thinks that times have changed, we would suggest that he should lease from us at cost price the Queen's Hall, the Queen's Hall Orchestra, and the incidental expenses, and experiment upon a week of programs of modern British music at the Promenade concerts. We would willingly see him successful. We, as English publishers, have much more to gain by exploiting copyright works by modern English composers rather than non-copyright works by the dead masters. Unfortunately, as we said before, the obstinate British public, who will not be dictated to, still stand in the way. They still prefer Beethoven to Joseph Holbrooke, and Tchaikovsky to Villers Stanford and Granville Bantock."

In other words the statement of a writer who discussed the problem of the British composer in the London Times two years ago holds good in London, Paris, Boston, New York; the majority of those who habitually attend orchestral concerts do not care a rap about the source of any work. "They merely ask themselves vaguely whether it appeals to their senses, and if it does, they applaud it and expect to hear it again before long. . . . In the case of the forthcoming Promenade concerts the future depends on the capacity of the audiences—to show a sense of responsibility, for the scheme admirably rests on a policy of giving the public what it desires."

It has been said that in view of the close relationship now existing between France and the United States, French music should be "cultivated" in Boston, especially as there are so many Frenchmen in the orchestra and there are French conductors for the season.

Boston has been well disposed toward French music from the early orchestral days. In no other American city, and in no foreign city outside of France has the music of Berlioz been so much played and so greatly appreciated. And it should be remembered that even in Paris the music of this genius was not "in fashion" until the end of the Franco-Prussian war, when Berlioz was pitted through national pride against Wagner.

Before Saint-Saens wrote his symphonic poems there was little French purely orchestral music of importance except that by Berlioz. The music of France was represented in our concert halls chiefly by the overtures of Auber, Herold and earlier composers. Since the days of the Theodore Thomas concerts in the old Music Hall, music by French composers has been heard often and gladly in Symphony concerts. No one of the conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been remiss in this respect. Mr. Paur may have been prejudiced in favor of Chabrier; Dr. Muck may have been prejudiced against Vincent d'Indy on account of the latter's biting but true remarks about the undue Germanic influence on musical conditions in this country, but the programs of the orchestra from the beginning show the affectionate attention paid to the music of France.

Messrs. Loeffler and Adamowski were never weary of introducing violin concertos and chamber music by French composers. Even the Kneisel Quartet at last realized the existence of Cesar Franck and gave memorable performances of his quartet and piano quintet. Then came Mr. Longy, who acquainted us with many interesting chamber and orchestral works of his countrymen.

We have had the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reorganized and under Mr. Monteux's direction. Already it is a remarkable orchestra, although the men have played but little together; remarkable for euphony, sense of proportion, sensuous quality of the strings in purely melodic passages, feeling for rhythm, brilliance, plasticity. Mr. Monteux in rehearsal has proved himself the conductor for the occasion. May his successor, Mr. Rabaud, be as catholic in taste, as skillful and sympathetic as an interpreter!

The Evening Bulletin of Providence, R. I., would not have any German music played even in the back room of a top flat. It is moved to this editorial opinion by aesthetic as well as patriotic convictions. The editorial article is headed, "The German Music-Blight." It is delightful reading.

It appears that "the average man and a few independent observers have been telling the country for years that the 'Germanic craze' was smothering the musical taste and talent of the people." The rest of us were criminally deaf. We had ears, but we heard not.

"Now music," writes this close reasoner, "is wholly—first, last, all the time—merely a matter of sound, whether actual or only imaginary. If not pleasant to you, it is not music to you, though it may be pleasant, therefore music, to somebody else. The Anglo-Saxon, the Latin and the German, as to music, are basically different in this: The Anglo-Saxon and the Latin love harmony, the German loves discord. In other words, the highest musical expression for the German is wrought out of basically inharmonious sounds. To the typical Anglo-Saxon this is only noise—a high grade of noise, perhaps—but noise, not music. To him, when sounds are basically discordant, they are all the time discordant, whether for an hour or for eternity. This difference, because a matter of racial psychology, can never be bridged. Hence the attempt to develop an American musical literature on a German stock is like raising peaches on plum trees by grafting. Though it could be done, what would be the use of it? There are, or may be, plenty of peach trees. In his preference for concord over discord the Anglo-Saxon has the support of the Italians, the most musical of all nationalities, of the French, the Poles and the Russians to an extent. But even if wholly unsupported we need not vex our ears and rack our sleep with the fretful din just because first 'made in Germany.' A caterwaul is not musical to us, regardless of its source."

Our young men and women have been made to believe that German music is the only music, "and to profess to like it, largely because such hypocrisy was 'good form.' * * * We do not as a people enjoy this so-called music that sounds like the rattle of tin pans at a charivari. * * * Why not cultivate our own music and work in harmony with our own racial genius, instead of spending time, effort and money trying to contradict it?"

EARLY LIFE OF YOUNG HEIFETZ

Some Facts Concerning Famous Young Russian Violinist

Jascha Heifetz, the young Russian violinist, who first reached this country on Sept. 5, 1917, and then had phenomenal artistic success wherever he appeared in concert, has figured in press notices almost beyond count, but rarely, strange to say, have they contained facts about his earlier life.

He was born in Vilna, Russia, almost 19 years ago. He began his study of the violin at the age of 3 with his father, who was a fine violinist. When he was 5 years old Heifetz entered the Royal School of Music in his native city, and during the same year he made his first public appearance. When 6 years old he played the Mendelssohn Concerto, and two years later he was graduated from the conservatory. A short time after this he was taken to Petrograd, where after repeated disappointments he secured a coveted hearing with Leopold Auer, and it is said that this great teacher after hearing him proclaimed him to be an astonishing genius.

Within the next two years young Heifetz made his formal debut in a recital at Petrograd, and thereby drew to himself the attention of musical Russia. In Odessa alone he played seven times with the Odessa Symphony orchestra. In 1911 he went on a tour through many cities

Jascha Heifetz.

GLOBE—OCTOBER 13,

SYMPHONY PLAN AGAIN CHANGED

Further Postponement of Season's Opening to Oct. 25

Again must the opening of the Symphony season be postponed. It is a great disappointment to the patrons, but it is a very necessary feature of the work to subdue the epidemic.

According to present plans, the season will now open on Friday afternoon, Oct. 25, and Saturday evening, Oct. 26. Health Commissioner Woodward has held out hope that this week will be the last week of the ban on theatres, music halls and other places of public assemblage.

The postponement means another reconstruction of programs. Josef Hofman's appearance in Cambridge and Boston must be postponed, but arrangements will be made by which he will appear later. Under present conditions there are only two concerts before the orchestra leaves on its first southern trip. There will be no soloist at the first concerts Oct. 25-26, and at the next pair of concerts on Nov. 1 and 2 the soloist will be Florence Easton, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Subscribers to the Symphony season will not lose the two concerts in October which have been postponed; at least they will be given in May, and it is within the realm of possibility that one pair may be given during the winter.

The first concert of the Cambridge series will be given either one or two weeks later.

Mr Monteux is hard at work with the orchestra. Rehearsals are held every morning of the six weekdays from 10 to 1. The orchestra is rapidly getting into prime condition, and Mr Monteux expresses himself as being more than satisfied.

No word has yet been received regarding the sailing of Mr. Rabaud. It is expected that he will sail within the next 10 days, which will bring him to Boston in ample time to make himself familiar with his new environment and begin his work with the orchestra in the second week of November.

BAUER AND THIBAUD AT SYMPHONY HALL

Will Open Series of Sunday Afternoon Concerts Oct. 27

Two weeks from today, in Symphony Hall, the regular Sunday afternoon series of concerts will commence for the season. Instead of Mme. Galli-Curci, who was to have opened the season on Sept. 29 (and whose concert was postponed on account of the health department ruling), the first of the concerts will be given by Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. It was in April, 1917, that these artists were last heard in joint concert, and, as in past seasons, they appeared together on the Jordan Hall stage. They have now been engaged for a Symphony Hall concert.

It was in London some years ago that Bauer and Thibaud inaugurated the policy of appearing in joint concert, and the unusual success of the venture has followed them closely in all parts of this country.

Jascha Heifetz, whose success compares with that of Mme. Galli-Curci, will give the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, on Nov. 3.

"A Musical Journey Through Spain," one of the successful novelties produced in New York last spring, is the title of the afternoon's program announced for Saturday, Nov. 2, in Symphony Hall. Raoul Laparra, the French composer of piano numbers, songs and two operas, will appear with Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, in a series of songs of Spanish theme, Mr. Laparra playing the piano accompaniments, and Mme. Stanley wearing the costumes of the periods. Twelve songs, in dialect, comprise Mme. Stanley's part of the program, to which Mr. Laparra will add piano solos of his own composition, entitled "Spanish Rhythms."

Mr. Henri Leon Berger, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 28 years, having resigned his position, is now living in Hartford, Ct., as instructor in the violin department of the Hartford School of Music. A pupil of Charles Dancla, he was a member of the Colonne Orchestra in Paris, before he came to Boston. He is an American citizen. In Hartford he hopes to organize a Quartet or Trio to give chamber concerts.

SYMPHONY AND OTHER CONCERT ANNOUNCEMENTS

According to present expectations the Symphony concert season will begin Friday afternoon, Oct 25, and Saturday evening, Oct 26.

The postponement means another reconstruction of program. There will be no soloist at the first concert and at the next pair of concerts the soloist will be Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Subscribers to the Symphony season will not lose the two concerts in October which have been postponed; at least they will be given in May, and it is within the realms of possibility that one pair may be given during the Winter.

The first concert of the Cambridge series will be given either one or two weeks later.

In the meantime Mr Monteux is hard at work with the orchestra. Rehearsals are held every morning of the six weekdays from 10 to 1, so the orchestra will not suffer from the postponement of the opening of the season. It is rapidly getting into prime condition, and Mr Monteux expresses himself as being more than satisfied with it.

No word has yet been received regarding the sailing of Mr Rabaud, but it is expected that he will sail within the next 10 days, which will bring him to Boston in ample time to make himself familiar with his new environment and begin his work with the orchestra in the second week of November.

The Sunday afternoon series of Symphony Hall concerts are now announced to begin Oct 27. Instead of Mme Galli-Curci, who was to have opened the season on Sept 29, the first of the concerts will be given by Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. It was in April, 1917, that these artists were last heard here in joint concert.

Jacob Heifetz, whose flights to fame have been almost unprecedented, will give the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts on Nov 3.

"A Musical Journey Through Spain" is the title of the afternoon's program announced for Saturday, Nov 2, in Symphony Hall. Raoul Laparra, the French composer of piano numbers, songs and two operas, will appear with Mme Helen Stanley, soprano, in a series of songs of Spanish theme, Mr Laparra playing the piano accompaniments and Mme Stanley garbed in the costumes of the periods.

HERALD, OCTOBER 13,

SYMPHONY PLAN AGAIN CHANGED

Further Postponement of Season's Opening to Oct. 25

Again must the opening of the Symphony season be postponed. It is a great disappointment to the patrons, but it is a very necessary feature of the work to subdue the epidemic.

According to present plans, the season will now open on Friday afternoon, Oct. 25, and Saturday evening, Oct. 26. Health Commissioner Woodward has held out hope that this week will be the last week of the ban on theatres, music halls and other places of public assemblage.

The postponement means another reconstruction of programs. Josef Hofman's appearance in Cambridge and Boston must be postponed, but arrangements will be made by which he will appear later. Under present conditions there are only two concerts before the orchestra leaves on its first southern trip. There will be no soloist at the first concerts Oct. 25-26, and at the next pair of concerts on Nov. 1 and 2 the soloist will be Florence Easton, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Subscribers to the Symphony season will not lose the two concerts in October which have been postponed; at least, they will be given in May, and it is within the realm of possibility that one pair may be given during the winter.

The first concert of the Cambridge series will be given either one or two weeks later.

Mr. Monteux is hard at work with the orchestra. Rehearsals are held every morning of the six weekdays from 10 to 1. The orchestra is rapidly getting into prime condition, and Mr. Monteux expresses himself as being more than satisfied.

No word has yet been received regarding the sailing of Mr. Rabaud. It is expected that he will sail within the next 10 days, which will bring him to Boston in ample time to make himself familiar with his new environment and begin his work with the orchestra in the second week of November.

BAUER AND THIBAUD AT SYMPHONY HALL

Will Open Series of Sunday Afternoon Concerts Oct. 27

Two weeks from today, in Symphony Hall, the regular Sunday afternoon series of concerts will commence for the season. Instead of Mme. Galli-Curci, who was to have opened the season on Sept. 29 (and whose concert was postponed on account of the health department ruling), the first of the concerts will be given by Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. It was in April, 1917, that these artists were last heard in joint concert, and, as in past seasons, they appeared together on the Jordan Hall stage. They have now been engaged for a Symphony Hall concert.

It was in London some years ago that Bauer and Thibaud inaugurated the policy of appearing in joint concert, and the unusual success of the venture has followed them closely in all parts of this country.

Jascha Heifetz, whose success compares with that of Mme. Galli-Curci, will give the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, on Nov. 3.

"A Musical Journey Through Spain," one of the successful novelties produced in New York last spring, is the title of the afternoon's program announced for Saturday, Nov. 2, in Symphony Hall. Raoul Laparra, the French composer of piano numbers, songs and two operas, will appear with Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, in a series of songs of Spanish theme, Mr. Laparra playing the piano accompaniments, and Mme. Stanley wearing the costumes of the periods. Twelve songs, in dialect, comprise Mme. Stanley's part of the program, to which Mr. Laparra will add piano solos of his own composition, entitled "Spanish Rhythms."

REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON'S CONDUCTOR

Henri Rabaud, New Leader of Symphony Orchestra, Is Famed as Composer

It was announced on Friday that the new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra would be Henri Rabaud of Paris. It is expected that M. Rabaud will arrive in Boston in time to conduct the concerts of November 15 and 16. As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, conductor at the Metropolitan opera house, is to direct the orchestra until the permanent conductor begins work.

Speculation as to the choice of a successor to Dr Muck had not fastened on M Rabaud. It was expected that a French musician would be chosen, but Camille Chevillard had been "prominently mentioned," as the phrase goes, while M Rabaud had not. This fact is unimportant. M Rabaud is a conductor and composer of note, though hardly pre-eminent, and the trustees of the orchestra have apparently been both wise in selecting him and fortunate in procuring his services.

HENRI RABAUD

New Conductor of Boston Symphony

As M Rabaud is relatively little known in the United States, though his music has been frequently performed, there will be widespread interest in all first-hand information regarding him. On Friday night the music editor of the Boston Transcript, who is familiar with continental opera houses and concert halls, was able to give the musical public the information that it sought.

"Americans who have frequented the Opera, the Opera Comique and symphony concerts in Paris," says the Transcript writer, "will readily recall Mr Rabaud—an unusual and pictorial figure, whether he was conductor or only intent listener, tall, gaunt, bearded, olive-skinned, grave of glance and quick of gesture, oriental rather than Parisian in impression to the eye. None the less, he was born in Paris in 1873, the son of a professor at the Conservatory. In that school he was educated as a musician and in the '90s began the practice of his calling in Paris. As conductor he served with increasing skill and reputation at the Opera, at the Opera Comique and in occasional orchestral concerts. As composer, he wrote symphonies, tone-poems, operas and a single oratorio, 'Job.'

"The second of his two symphonies has been heard relatively often in America—at the hands of the Boston orchestral club under Mr Longy, of the New York symphony orchestra under Mr Damrosch, of the Philadelphia orchestra under Mr Stokowski and at the Worcester festival last autumn. His symphonic poem, 'La Procession Nocturne,' has been less frequently played in the United States, but Mr Longy ventured it several years ago in Boston, and it is announced for performance next month at the symphony concerts. Of his three operas, only one, 'Marouf, Savetier de Caire,' produced at the Metropolitan last December, is known by actual representation in America. The other two, 'La Fille de Roland,' and 'Par le Glaive,'—heroic pieces drawn from the like-named plays of De Bornier and Richepin—have been heard only in Paris and, possibly, Brussels. In contrast, 'Marouf' recounts with no little humor and fantasy a fable from the Arabian Nights.

"As composer, Mr Rabaud is neither academic nor ultra-modern. Rather, as his music for both the theater and the concert hall suggests, he is eclectic, following no formula, but seeking such forms and procedures as best suit the substance, mood and progress of his music.

"As conductor Mr Rabaud, like many of his predecessors, will come to the symphony orchestra from the opera house rather than the concert hall. Deservedly his Parisian reputation as orchestral leader is high, if not signal; while here in Boston he will have forces, freedom and opportunity such as he has never enjoyed before and such as are sure to stimulate him. He is a practiced master of orchestral routine; he is diligent in rehearsal; he wins the respect and the good will of his men as he does, indeed, of all who come into close contact with him.

"By the warrant of his eclectic music his programs through 20 pairs of concerts with the symphony orchestra should be catholic enough to please the most exacting. Clearly, in all that pertains to music he is open-

REDUCTION RATIO

13x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 1.1 1.25 1.4 1.6 1.8

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

POST, OCTOBER 13,

Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, returns to Boston for his first concert the leaders of the violinists who visit America yearly. (P

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, OCTOBER 13,

Symphony Now Due to Open Oct. 25

AGAIN must the opening of the Symphony season be postponed. It is a great disappointment to the patrons of the concerts, but is a necessary feature of the work now going on to subdue the epidemic of influenza. According to present plans, the season will open on Friday afternoon, October 25 and Saturday evening, October 26.

The postponement means another reconstruction of programs. Josef Hofmann was to appear this week as soloist, both in Cambridge on Thursday night and in Boston. His appearance must necessarily be postponed until later.

Under present conditions there remain but two concerts before the orchestra leaves on its first Southern trip. There will be no soloist at the first pair of concerts, October 25-26. At the next pair, on November 1 and 2, the soloist will be Florence Easton, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Subscribers to the Symphony season will not lose the concerts in October which have been postponed; at least, they will be given in May, and it is possible that one pair may be given during the winter.

The first concert of the Cambridge series, which was to be given next Thursday evening, will be given either one or two weeks later.

SUNDAY CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL.

Two weeks from today, in Symphony Hall, the regular Sunday afternoon series of concerts will commence, with Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, French violinist, as soloists.

Jascha Heifetz, whose remarkable flights to fame have been almost unprecedented, will give the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts on November 3.

LAPARRA, COMPOSER AND PIANAIST, COMING

A concert that offers unusual novelty is announced for Saturday afternoon, November 2, in Symphony Hall, when Raoul Laparra, the French composer-pianist, will appear in concert with Mme. Helen Stanley, the American soprano, in past seasons prima donna of the Chicago Opera company. The program will be entitled "A Musical Journey Through Spain," a unique cycle of Mr. Laparra's compositions for voice and piano. Laparra's "La Habanera" was presented by the Boston Opera company several years ago.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, OCTOBER

LAZARO CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

The Spanish army lost a good soldier ten years ago when Hipolito Lazaro was released in order to pursue his vocal studies in Barcelona. Spain was at war with Morocco when the young singer, then twenty years old, enlisted and went off to do his patriotic duty. Today Lazaro is known in half a dozen different countries as a rarely gifted tenor. The young artist made his first operatic appearance in this country at the Metropolitan Opera last Winter and was heard in Boston with that organization last Spring. His concert work is said to be as brilliant as his operatic.

Lazaro comes to Symphony Hall in the course of a few weeks for his first Boston concert. He will be assisted by Sascha Jacobsen, a young violinist, who is meeting with distinct success on the concert stage.

For his program he has chosen four operatic arias in which he has had his greatest successes. The first aria is from Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine;" the second, Donizetti's "La Favorita," the third from "I Puritani" by the same composer and the fourth the popular Che gelida manina from Puccini's "La Boheme." A Spanish group and a French group of songs will complete his program.

om PRESS

ddress Philadelphia, Pa.

ate

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

In choosing Henri Rabaud to succeed Dr. Carl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the trustees of that famous organization have not only secured a musician of first rank, but they have done much to wipe out whatever unpleasant associations the public mind may still have attributed to the orchestra since its former conductor's pro-German activities were alleged. For M. Rabaud is a Frenchman and a distinguished one. His assumption of the baton of the orchestra in Boston will settle the matter of loyalty for the most scrupulous of patriots.

M. Rabaud has for five years past been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, a Government institution, and has also been prominent in concert work. He is known in this country chiefly by his orchestral and operatic compositions, one of which, "Marouf," was sung in New York by the Metropolitan Company last season.

Philadelphia will be among the cities to welcome the new conductor, and there is scarcely any doubt that while he wields the baton the Boston Symphony concerts will renew their old time popularity here. The prospect of a little Gallic seasoning for the rather stolid preci[illegible] of the famous musicians fr[illegible] is a wholly agreeable one [illegible]

188

CONCERTS ONCE MORE

NEW SCHEDULES FOR SYMPHONY HALL

Programmes from Mr. Monteux, with Dukas's Tone-Poem, "The Peri," and More Excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" for Novel Pieces — A New Orchestra Worthy the Old—The Course of the Sunday Concerts—The Expected Parisians

IT will be nearly a week after the reopening of the houses of entertainment before the managers and the public of concerts may profit accordingly. Halls may reopen on Sunday next, but not until Friday afternoon, Oct. 25, and Saturday evening, Oct. 26, are any concerts announced. Then the first pair of Symphony Concerts for the present season will take place at Symphony Hall with Mr. Monteux leading the orchestra for the first times in public and the reorganized band proving its mettle for the first times before an audience. Through three weeks the conductor has been daily rehearsing his men in the music he proposes for the concerts; through ten days more he will continue the process. Within long memory, the orchestra has undergone no such regimen at the beginning of a new year and, as good forune, for once, would have it, at a time when there was most need. A fourth of the hundred men in the band are newcomers; there have been material changes in every choir; it was essential to assimilate the players to each other, to put them at ease in new work, to make them supple to it, to school them in the standards of the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux sets these standards as high as did Dr. Muck; he is as diligent, patient and exacting a master. His musicians discovered quickly his sensitive ear for body, quality, euphony of tone; his feeling for adroit gradations of progress and climax, for artful shadings of tone; his insistence upon precision and proportion of interwoven detail. Since Mr. Gericke's distant day, the Symphony Orchestra, old or new, has not been so assiduously practised in finesse, so encouraged to sensibility, so schooled in responsiveness man to man and choir to choir. The outcome already speaks clear in the rich, mellow, lustrous tone of the band in every division, in plasticity of accent, shading, color, in intelligence, resiliency and eloquence with the music in hand, each piece according to its kind. To hear one of these later rehearsals is to perceive that the new Symphony Orchestra is worthy of the old; in some respects, even, excels it. Only Mr. Gericke in the nineties and Dr. Muck in more recent years, have spent the pains and brought forth the results with the band that Mr. Monteux has plied and achieved. If ever a conductor deserved his two pairs of concerts in Boston, his two concerts in New York, it is he.

For the first pair of concerts, on Friday afternoon, Oct. 25, and Saturday evening, Oct. 26, Mr. Monteux has set this programme:

Symphony in D major.....Franck
Overture to Byron's play, "Manfred"..Schumann
Tone-poem, "The Peri".....Dukas
Image for Orchestra, "Iberia".....Debussy

For the second pair of concerts, on Friday afternoon, Nov. 1, and Saturday evening, Nov. 2, the list of pieces stands:

Symphony in A major, No. 7.....Beethoven
Air from the Opera, "Figaro's Wedding"..Mozart
Tone-poem, "Avant que Tu ne t'en Ailles." Loeffler
Air from the Cantata, "The Prodigal Son," Debussy
Suite, No. 1, from the Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe".....Ravel
Singer: Miss Easton.

Dukas and Ravel

Of these pieces, it is many years since Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, suggested by Verlaine's verses, "La Bonne Chanson," has been played in Boston or anywhere else; while, rather strangely, Beethoven's seventh symphony—of the dance rhythms—has gone unheard for three seasons. Two, moreover, of the items on Mr. Monteux's programmes are wholly new to the Symphony Concerts—Dukas's "dance-poem" of "The Peri" and the first suite from Ravel's ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe." "La Péri: Poëme à Danser" was originally written on commission from Mr. Diaghilev for his Russian Ballet; declined by it as too symphonic and untheatrical music; finally danced at the Opéra-Comique by Miss Trouhanova; and then relegated—again because it was too symphonic a piece for the stage—to the concert-hall. There it is none too often heard though, in the belief of many, it is the present summit of Dukas's music. As piece of the theatre "The Peri" tells the mimed tale of a Persian Prince, who, fearing death, sought at the ends of the earth the flower of immortality. There he found it between the fingers of a sleeping Peri and took it from her hand. But, as he looked upon her, desire smote him and, when she danced before him, possessed him. And he gave her again the flower of immortality and submitted to his end.

A ballet of only two personages, a static, actionless ballet, a ballet that counted the miming, the dancing, settings and lights but as fused accessories to the music. No wonder the theatre judged it too symphonic and summarily returned "The Peri" to the concert-hall. There, the tone-poem has been more justly judged as music of expressive melodic substance, free course and rich development, jewelled instrumental color and shimmering harmonic glamor—music that summons, in mood of melancholy longing, the fascination of old, remote, immutable things, vainly sought, as vainly achieved. At moments in his poetizing the Parisian, Dukas, seems akin to the Irishman, Dunsany.

As for the first suite from "Daphnis and Chloe," it is companion-piece to the second suite that Ravel drew from his ballet as audiences at the Symphony Concerts heard it last winter. The music begins with the pirates' abduction of the gentle Chloe from the amorous Daphnis; proceeds with a nocturne for various solo instruments against a background of polyharmonic strings—the episode in the ballet in which the sculptured nymphs take on mysterious life—continues with their slow dance, their consoling of Daphnis, the mystical evocation of the god, Pan; and ends, contrastingly, with the savage dances of the revelling pirates. At scarcely a point does the first suite fall below the second in wealth and range of pictorial or poetic imagination, in command and invention of expressive means, in graphic and thrilling illusion. The music is of Ravel, matured and passioned master, and Mr. Monteux was the conductor to whom he first confided it.

From Sunday to Sunday

Apart from the Symphony Orchestra, only three or four concerts are in near prospect in Boston. Four of the projected series of Sunday Concerts at Symphony Hall have already been cancelled—those which were to bring in succession Mme. Galli-Curci, Mr. McCormack, Mr. Elman and Mr. Lazaro. Of the singers, Mme. Galli-Curci and Mr. McCormack are likely to be heard in Boston much sooner than was anticipated. The closing of theatres and concert-halls in the West and the Southwest, where influenza is now epidemic, has much altered their itineraries. Accordingly the probability now is that Mme. Galli-Curci will reappear in Boston within the next fortnight on a Saturday afternoon at Symphony Hall and that Mr. McCormack will sing there on an evening. As for Mr. Lazaro, the ornate and soaring tenor, his concert has been definitely set for Sunday afternoon, Dec. 8; while later in the winter Mr. Elman's faithful following may take its usual pleasure in him. So much for readjustments.

Thus the Sunday Concerts will begin on the afternoon of Oct. 28, with Mr. Bauer, the pianist, and Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, in a recital of sonatas and solo pieces. Each of them, long familiar to the finer public of concerts, speaks for himself. For years the distinctions of Mr. Bauer as a pianist of mind, heart, taste, touch and skill have established him here; more recently Mr. Thibaud has justly come into as fine deserts. They have put together the following programme:

Sonata in G minor for piano and violin....Grieg
Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud
Violin pieces:
Chant d'Hiver .....Ysaye
Polonaise in A major.....Wieniawski
Mr. Thibaud
Piano pieces:
Papillons .....Schumann
Scherzo in B-flat minor.....Chopin
Mr. Bauer
Sonata in A major for piano and violin...Franck
Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud

The series will continue on Sunday, Nov. 3 with Mr. Heifetz, the paragon of youthful violinists for pure loveliness of tone and for poised sensibility to the contents and the form of his music; while on Sunday, Nov. 24, Mr. Hofmann, the illustrious pianist, now at the acme of his powers, will be heard in a recital of his own for the first time in Boston in some years.

Out of Spain and Paris

Two unattached concerts, so to say, are also impending. For one there is a definite date, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, in Symphony Hall, when and where Mr. Laparra, the composer, and Miss Stanley, the singer, will be heard in his cycle of Spanish pieces. He himself is the Parisian composer, to whom Spain has become as a second country. He knows the land, the people, the literature, the music, the arts of the Spaniards. Upon things Spanish, as his operas of "The Habanera" and "The Jota" have proved, his imagination feeds and kindles. Now he has written this series of Spanish pieces—"rhythms" (as he calls them) or more truly dances for the piano in the voice and manner of the various provinces, along with songs in like method and suggestion. Some are Basque, Castilian, Andalusian, Aragonese, so that together they make what the programme calls "A Musical Journey through Spain." Miss Stanley, appropriately costumed, will sing the songs upon which she has spent no little pains, while Mr. Laparra will himself play the piano-parts and the dances.

The other concert, still awaiting day and date, is that of the noted Conservatory Orchestra of Paris led by the practised Mr. Messager and assisted by Mr. Cortot, Parisian pianist of high and just repute. The concert was originally proposed for Wednesday, Oct. 9, at Symphony Hall. Both the closing of the seats of entertain- and the failure of the orchestra to arrive in the United States according to schedule deferred it. No new date is yet determined, though there is a fair possibility of Wednesday evening, Oct. 30. When the Conservatory Orchestra does come to Boston, it will be heard in the following pieces:

Concert Overture, "Patrie".....Bizet
Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun".....Debussy
Concerto in C minor, No. 4, for Piano and Orchestra .....Saint-Saëns
Pianist: Mr. Cortot
Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption," Franck
Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz

Last evening, the Conservatory Orchestra played for the first time publicly in the United States in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. From the point of view of the musically minded, the occasion was superfluously complicated with speech-making—the thrice familiar platitudes of war-time and Franco-American relations, October, 1918—the bestowal of wreaths and like ceremonies. The orchestra seemed to number some eighty men, young and middle-aged in the usual proportion of such bodies. It was ably led by Mr. Messager. It played "The Star-Spangled Banner" with slow dignity and large richness of tone, so giving the piece a stately and unusual eloquence. In contrast, it whipped through "The Marseillaise," with a fire of phrase and rhythm that orchestras outside France seldom gain. Passing to the programme proper, conductor and band were heard in Franck's symphony, "Clouds" and "Fêtes" from The Nocturnes of Debussy, Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsody. All these are familiar pieces and in them, so far as can be gathered from the reviewers, the orchestra played with the expected precision, polish, finesse and, in the woodwind choir, with true distinction of tone.

From REPUBLICAN
Address Springfield, Mass.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER

st Henri Rabaud, French Conductor and Composer, Accepts Engagement

Special Dispatch to The Republican.
BOSTON, Friday, October 4

The trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra. A cablegram received from the French ministry of fine arts this morning stated that Mr Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The ministry of fine arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boton symphony orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan opera house last season was his opera, "Marouf." His "Second Symphony" is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris under Messager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris conservatory, where he studied composition with Massenet and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York Saturday afternoon, November 9, and Mr Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr Rabaud's being able to get here in time to prepare the programs for the important out-town concerts of the orchestra, the first week of November, Gatti Casazza courteously granted Mr Monteux leave of absence for one week and has solved an embarrassing problem.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date

RABAUD SUCCEEDS MUCK IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

French Composer, a Principal Conductor of Grand Opera in Paris, to Arrive Next Month.

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. This word was received today by the Symphony trustees in a cablegram from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

For the last five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and has also done much concert work. His orchestra compositions include the Second Symphony and "La Procession Nocturne," whil among his operas are "La Fille de Roland" and "Marouf," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House last Winter. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatore, where he studied composition with Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome. He is 52 years old, and was born in Paris.

The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations that have been in progress since last Spring, when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, which ends with its second concert in New York Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud being able to get here in time to prepare the programs for the out-of-town concerts of the orchestra, the first week of November, Mr. Gatti-Casazza gave Mr. Monteux leave of absence.

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

* * *

Estab The Boston Symphony Orchestra management announces that the conductor of that organization, at least for the present, will be Pierre Monteaux, who was last season the conductor of the French opera at the Metropolitan, and is principally known in this country through his association with the Diaghileq Russian Ballet. The Boston announcement merely says that Monteaux "will conduct the October concerts"; but it is generally supposed that he will remain the season, and in the meantime the orchestra will be able to secure one of the few men that they have had under consideration—possibly Toscanini. 1884

POST, OCTOBER 13,

Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, returns to Boston for his first concert the leaders of the violinists who visit America yearly. (P.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, OCTOBER 13,

Symphony Now Due to Open Oct. 25

AGAIN must the opening of the Symphony season be postponed. It is a great disappointment to the patrons of the concerts, but is a necessary feature of the work now going on to subdue the epidemic of influenza. According to present plans, the season will open on Friday afternoon, October 25 and Saturday evening, October 26.

The postponement means another reconstruction of programs. Josef Hofmann was to appear this week as soloist, both in Cambridge on Thursday night and in Boston. His appearance must necessarily be postponed until later.

Under present conditions there remain but two concerts before the orchestra leaves on its first Southern trip. There will be no soloist at the first pair of concerts, October 25-26. At the next pair, on November 1 and 2, the soloist will be Florence Easton, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Subscribers to the Symphony season will not lose the concerts in October which have been postponed; at least, they will be given in May, and it is possible that one pair may be given during the winter.

The first concert of the Cambridge series, which was to be given next Thursday evening, will be given either one or two weeks later.

SUNDAY CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL.

Two weeks from today, in Symphony Hall, the regular Sunday afternoon series of concerts will commence, with Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, French violinist, as soloists.

Jascha Heifetz, whose remarkable flights to fame have been almost unprecedented, will give the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts on November 3.

LAPARRA, COMPOSER AND PIANAIST, COMING

A concert that offers unusual novelty is announced for Saturday afternoon, November 2, in Symphony Hall, when Raoul Laparra, the French composer-pianist, will appear in concert with Mme. Helen Stanley, the American soprano, in past seasons prima donna of the Chicago Opera company. The program will be entitled "A Musical Journey Through Spain," a unique cycle of Mr. Laparra's compositions for voice and piano. Laparra's "La Habanera" was presented by the Boston Opera company several years ago.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, OCTOBER

LAZARO CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

The Spanish army lost a good soldier ten years ago when Hipolito Lazaro was released in order to pursue his vocal studies in Barcelona. Spain was at war with Morocco when the young singer, then twenty years old, enlisted and went off to do his patriotic duty. Today Lazaro is known in half a dozen different countries as a rarely gifted tenor. The young artist made his first operatic appearance in this country at the Metropolitan Opera last Winter and was heard in Boston with that organization last Spring. His concert work is said to be as brilliant as his operatic.

Lazaro comes to Symphony Hall in the course of a few weeks for his first Boston concert. He will be assisted by Sascha Jacobsen, a young violinist, who is meeting with distinct success on the concert stage.

For his program he has chosen four operatic arias in which he has had his greatest successes. The first aria is from Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine;" the second, Donizetti's "La Favorita," the third from "I Puritani" by the same composer and the fourth the popular Che gelida manina from Puccini's "La Boheme." A Spanish group and a French group of songs will complete his program.

om PRESS

ddress Philadelphia, Pa.

ate

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

In choosing Henri Rabaud to succeed Dr. Carl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the trustees of that famous organization have not only secured a musician of first rank, but they have done much to wipe out whatever unpleasant associations the public mind may still have attributed to the orchestra since its former conductor's pro-German activities were alleged. For M. Rabaud is a Frenchman and a distinguished one. His assumption of the baton of the orchestra in Boston will settle the matter of loyalty for the most scrupulous of patriots.

M. Rabaud has for five years past been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, a Government institution, and has also been prominent in concert work. He is known in this country chiefly by his orchestral and operatic compositions, one of which, "Marouf," was sung in New York by the Metropolitan Company last season.

Philadelphia will be among the cities to welcome the new conductor, and there is scarcely any doubt that while he wields the baton the Boston Symphony concerts will renew their old time popularity here. The prospect of a little Gallic seasoning for the rather stolid precision of the famous musicians from [illegible] is a wholly agreeable one [illegible]

CONCERTS ONCE MORE

NEW SCHEDULES FOR SYMPHONY HALL

Programmes from Mr. Monteux, with Dukas's Tone-Poem, "The Peri," and More Excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" for Novel Pieces — A New Orchestra Worthy the Old—The Course of the Sunday Concerts—The Expected Parisians

IT will be nearly a week after the reopening of the houses of entertainment before the managers and the public of concerts may profit accordingly. Halls may reopen on Sunday next, but not until Friday afternoon, Oct. 25, and Saturday evening, Oct. 26, are any concerts announced. Then the first pair of Symphony Concerts for the present season will take place at Symphony Hall with Mr. Monteux leading the orchestra for the first times in public and the reorganized band proving its mettle for the first times before an audience. Through three weeks the conductor has been daily rehearsing his men in the music he proposes for the concerts; through ten days more he will continue the process. Within long memory, the orchestra has undergone no such regimen at the beginning of a new year and, as good forune, for once, would have it, at a time when there was most need. A fourth of the hundred men in the band are newcomers; there have been material changes in every choir; it was essential to assimilate the players to each other, to put them at ease in new work, to make them supple to it, to school them in the standards of the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux sets these standards as high as did Dr. Muck; he is as diligent, patient and exacting a master. His musicians discovered quickly his sensitive ear for body, quality, euphony of tone; his feeling for adroit gradations of progress and climax, for artful shadings of tone; his insistence upon precision and proportion of interwoven detail. Since Mr. Gericke's distant day, the Symphony Orchestra, old or new, has not been so assiduously practised in finesse, so encouraged to sensibility, so schooled in responsiveness man to man and choir to choir. The outcome already speaks clear in the rich, mellow, lustrous tone of the band in every division, in plasticity of accent, shading, color, in intelligence, resiliency and eloquence with the music in hand, each piece according to its kind. To hear one of these later rehearsals is to perceive that the new Symphony Orchestra is worthy of the old; in some respects, even, excels it. Only Mr. Gericke in the nineties and Dr. Muck in more recent years, have spent the pains and brought forth the results with the band that Mr. Monteux has plied and achieved. If ever a conductor deserved his two pairs of concerts in Boston, his two concerts in New York, it is he.

For the first pair of concerts, on Friday afternoon, Oct. 25, and Saturday evening, Oct. 26, Mr. Monteux has set this programme:

Symphony in D major.....Franck
Overture to Byron's play, "Manfred"..Schumann
Tone-poem, "The Peri".....Dukas
Image for Orchestra, "Iberia".....Debussy

For the second pair of concerts, on Friday afternoon, Nov. 1, and Saturday evening, Nov. 2, the list of pieces stands:

Symphony in A major, No. 7.....Beethoven
Air from the Opera, "Figaro's Wedding"..Mozart
Tone-poem, "Avant que Tu ne t'en Alles." Loeffler
Air from the Cantata, "The Prodigal Son." Debussy
Suite, No. 1, from the Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe".....Ravel
Singer: Miss Easton.

Dukas and Ravel

Of these pieces, it is many years since Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, suggested by Verlaine's verses, "La Bonne Chanson," has been played in Boston or anywhere else; while, rather strangely, Beethoven's seventh symphony—of the dance rhythms—has gone unheard for three seasons. Two, moreover, of the items on Mr. Monteux's programmes are wholly new to the Symphony Concerts—Dukas's "dance-poem" of "The Peri" and the first suite from Ravel's ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe." "La Péri: Poëme à Danser" was originally written on commission from Mr. Diaghilev for his Russian Ballet; declined by it as too symphonic and untheatrical music; finally danced at the Opéra-Comique by Miss Trouhanova; and then relegated—again because it was too symphonic a piece for the stage—to the concert-hall. There it is none too often heard though, in the belief of many, it is the present summit of Dukas's music. As piece of the theatre "The Peri" tells the mimed tale of a Persian Prince, who, fearing death, sought at the ends of the earth the flower of immortality. There he found it between the fingers of a sleeping Peri and took it from her hand. But, as he looked upon her, desire smote him and, when she danced before him, possessed him. And he gave her again the flower of immortality and submitted to his end.

A ballet of only two personages, a static, actionless ballet, a ballet that counted the miming, the dancing, settings and lights but as fused accessories to the music. No wonder the theatre judged it too symphonic and summarily returned "The Peri" to the concert-hall. There, the tone-poem has been more justly judged as music of expressive melodic substance, free course and rich development, jewelled instrumental color and shimmering harmonic glamor—music that summons, in mood of melancholy longing, the fascination of old, remote, immutable things, vainly sought, as vainly achieved. At moments in his poetizing the Parisian, Dukas, seems akin to the Irishman, Dunsany.

As for the first suite from "Daphnis and Chloe," it is companion-piece to the second suite that Ravel drew from his ballet as audiences at the Symphony Concerts heard it last winter. The music begins with the pirates' abduction of the gentle Chloe from the amorous Daphnis; proceeds with a nocturne for various solo instruments against a background of polyharmonic strings—the episode in the ballet in which the sculptured nymphs take on mysterious life—continues with their slow dance, their consoling of Daphnis, the mystical evocation of the god, Pan; and ends, contrastingly, with the savage dances of the revelling pirates. At scarcely a point does the first suite fall below the second in wealth and range of pictorial or poetic imagination, in command and invention of expressive means, in graphic and thrilling illusion. The music is of Ravel, matured and passioned master, and Mr. Monteux was the conductor to whom he first confided it.

From Sunday to Sunday

Apart from the Symphony Orchestra, only three or four concerts are in near prospect in Boston. Four of the projected series of Sunday concerts at Symphony Hall have already been cancelled—those which were to bring in succession Mme. Galli-Curci, Mr. McCormack, Mr. Elman and Mr. Lazaro. Of the singers, Mme. Galli-Curci and Mr. McCormack are likely to be heard in Boston much sooner than was anticipated. The closing of theatres and concert-halls in the West and the Southwest, where influenza is now epidemic, has much altered their itineraries. Accordingly the probability now is that Mme. Galli-Curci will reappear in Boston within the next fortnight on a Saturday afternoon at Symphony Hall and that Mr. McCormack will sing there on an evening. As for Mr. Lazaro, the ornate and soaring tenor, his concert has been definitely set for Sunday afternoon, Dec. 8; while later in the winter Mr. Elman's faithful following may take its usual pleasure in him. So much for readjustments.

Thus the Sunday Concerts will begin on the afternoon of Oct. 28, with Mr. Bauer, the pianist, and Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, in a recital of sonatas and solo pieces. Each of them, long familiar to the finer public of concerts, speaks for himself. For years the distinctions of Mr. Bauer as a pianist of mind, heart, taste, touch and skill have established him here; more recently Mr. Thibaud has justly come into as fine deserts. They have put together the following programme:

Sonata in G minor for piano and violin....Grieg
Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud

Violin pieces:
Chant d'Hiver .....Ysaye
Polonaise in A major.....Wieniawski
Mr. Thibaud

Piano pieces:
Papillons .....Schumann
Scherzo in B-flat minor.....Chopin
Mr. Bauer

Sonata in A major for piano and violin...Franck
Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud

The series will continue on Sunday, Nov. 3 with Mr. Heifetz, the paragon of youthful violinists for pure loveliness of tone and for poised sensibility to the contents and the form of his music; while on Sunday, Nov. 24, Mr. Hofmann, the illustrious pianist, now at the acme of his powers, will be heard in a recital of his own for the first time in Boston in some years.

Out of Spain and Paris

Two unattached concerts, so to say, are also impending. For one there is a definite date, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, in Symphony Hall, when and where Mr. Laparra, the composer, and Miss Stanley, the singer, will be heard in his cycle of Spanish pieces. He himself is the Parisian composer, to whom Spain has become as a second country. He knows the land, the people, the literature, the music, the arts of the Spaniards. Upon things Spanish, as his operas of "The Habanera" and "The Jota" have proved, his imagination feeds and kindles. Now he has written this series of Spanish pieces—"rhythms" (as he calls them) or more truly dances for the piano in the voice and manner of the various provinces, along with songs in like method and suggestion. Some are Basque, Castilian, Andalusian, Aragonese, so that together they make what the programme calls "A Musical Journey through Spain." Miss Stanley, appropriately costumed, will sing the songs upon which she has spent no little pains, while Mr. Laparra will himself play the piano-parts and the dances.

The other concert, still awaiting day and date, is that of the noted Conservatory Orchestra of Paris led by the practised Mr. Messager and assisted by Mr. Cortot, Parisian pianist of high and just repute. The concert was originally proposed for Wednesday, Oct. 9, at Symphony Hall. Both the closing of the seats of entertain- and the failure of the orchestra to arrive in the United States according to schedule deferred it. No new date is yet determined, though there is a fair possibility of Wednesday evening, Oct. 30. When the Conservatory Orchestra does come to Boston, it will be heard in the following pieces:

Concert Overture, "Patrie".....Bizet
Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun".....Debussy
Concerto in C minor, No. 4, for Piano and Orchestra .....Saint-Saëns
Pianist: Mr. Cortot
Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption," Franck
Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz

Last evening, the Conservatory Orchestra played for the first time publicly in the United States in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. From the point of view of the musically minded, the occasion was superfluously complicated with speech-making—the thrice familiar platitudes of war-time and Franco-American relations, October, 1918—the bestowal of wreaths and like ceremonies. The orchestra seemed to number some eighty men, young and middle-aged in the usual proportion of such bodies. It was ably led by Mr. Messager. It played "The Star-Spangled Banner" with slow dignity and large richness of tone, so giving the piece a stately and unusual eloquence. In contrast, it whipped through "The Marseillaise," with a fire of phrase and rhythm that orchestras outside France seldom gain. Passing to the programme proper, conductor and band were heard in Franck's symphony, "Clouds" and "Fêtes" from The Nocturnes of Debussy, Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsody. All these are familiar pieces and in them, so far as can be gathered from the reviewers, the orchestra played with the expected precision, polish, finesse and, in the woodwind choir, with true distinction of tone.

From REPUBLICAN
Address Springfield, Mass.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER

Henri Rabaud, French Conductor and Composer, Accepts Engagement

Special Dispatch to The Republican.
BOSTON, Friday, October 4

The trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra. A cablegram received from the French ministry of fine arts this morning stated that Mr Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The ministry of fine arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boton symphony orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan opera house last season was his opera, "Marouf." His "Second Symphony" is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris under Messager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris conservatory, where he studied composition with Massenet and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York Saturday afternoon, November 9, and Mr Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr Rabaud's being able to get here in time to prepare the programs for the important out-town concerts of the orchestra, the first week of November, Gatti Casazza courteously granted Mr Monteux leave of absence for one week and thus solved an embarrassing problem.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date

RABAUD SUCCEEDS MUCK IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

French Composer, a Principal Conductor of Grand Opera in Paris, to Arrive Next Month.

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. This word was received today by the Symphony trustees in a cablegram from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

For the last five years Mr Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and has also done much concert work. His orchestra compositions include the Second Symphony and "La Procession Nocturne," whil among his operas are "La Fille de Roland" and "Marouf," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House last Winter. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatore, where he studied composition with Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome. He is 52 years old, and was born in Paris.

The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations that have been in progress since last Spring, when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, which ends with its second concert in New York Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud being able to get here in time to prepare the programs for the out-of-town concerts of the orchestra, the first week of November, Mr. Gatti-Casazza gave Mr. Monteux leave of absence.

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

* * *

Estab 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra management announces that the conductor of that organization, at least for the present, will be Pierre Monteaux, who was last season the conductor of the French opera at the Metropolitan, and is principally known in this country through his association with the Diaghileq Russian Ballet. The Boston announcement merely says that Monteaux "will conduct the October concerts"; but it is generally supposed that he will remain the season, and in the meantime the orchestra will be able to secure one of the few men that they have had under consideration—possibly Toscanini.

POST, OCTOBER 13,

Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, returns to Boston for his first concert of this season. He ranks among the leaders of the violinists who visit America yearly. (Photo by Bain.)

From REPUBLICAN
Address Springfield, Mass.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER

Henri Rabaud, French Conductor and Composer, Accepts Engagement

Special Dispatch to The Republican.
BOSTON, Friday, October 4

The trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra. A cablegram received from the French ministry of fine arts this morning stated that Mr Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The ministry of fine arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boton symphony orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan opera house last season was his opera, "Marouf." His "Second Symphony" is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand opera in Paris under Messager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris conservatory, where he studied composition with Massenet and in 1894 he won the Frix de Rome.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York Saturday afternoon, November 9, and Mr Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr Rabaud's being able to get here in time to prepare the programs for the important out-of-town concerts of the orchestra, the first week of November, Gatti Casazza courteously granted Mr Monteux leave of absence for one week and thus solved an embarrassing problem.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date 1918

RABAUD SUCCEEDS MUCK IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

French Composer, a Principal Conductor of Grand Opera in Paris, to Arrive Next Month.

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. This word was received today by the Symphony trustees in a cablegram from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

For the last five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and has also done much concert work. His orchestra compositions include the Second Symphony and "La Procession Nocturne," whil among his operas are "La Fille de Roland" and "Marouf," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House last Winter. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatore, where he studied composition with Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome. He is 52 years old, and was born in Paris.

The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations that have been in progress since last Spring, when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, which ends with its second concert in New York Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud being able to get here in time to prepare the programs for the out-of-town concerts of the orchestra, the first week of November, Mr. Gatti-Casazza gave Mr. Monteux leave of absence.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, OCTOBER 13,

Symphony Now Due to Open Oct. 25

AGAIN must the opening of the Symphony season be postponed. It is a great disappointment to the patrons of the concerts, but is a necessary feature of the work now going on to subdue the epidemic of influenza. According to present plans, the season will open on Friday afternoon, October 25 and Saturday evening, October 26.

The postponement means another reconstruction of programs. Josef Hofmann was to appear this week as soloist, both in Cambridge on Thursday night and in Boston. His appearance must necessarily be postponed until later.

Under present conditions there remain but two concerts before the orchestra leaves on its first Southern trip. There will be no soloist at the first pair of concerts, October 25-26. At the next pair, on November 1 and 2, the soloist will be Florence Easton, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Subscribers to the Symphony season will not lose the concerts in October which have been postponed; at least, they will be given in May, and it is possible that one pair may be given during the winter.

The first concert of the Cambridge series, which was to be given next Thursday evening, will be given either one or two weeks later.

SUNDAY CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL.

Two weeks from today, in Symphony Hall, the regular Sunday afternoon series of concerts will commence, with Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, French violinist, as soloists.

Jascha Heifetz, whose remarkable flights to fame have been almost unprecedented, will give the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts on November 3.

LAPARRA, COMPOSER AND PIANAIST, COMING

A concert that offers unusual novelty is announced for Saturday afternoon, November 2, in Symphony Hall, when Raoul Laparra, the French composer-pianist, will appear in concert with Mme. Helen Stanley, the American soprano, in past seasons prima donna of the Chicago Opera company. The program will be entitled "A Musical Journey Through Spain," a unique cycle of Mr. Laparra's compositions for voice and piano. Laparra's "La Habanera" was presented by the Boston Opera company several years ago.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, OCTOBER

LAZARO CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

The Spanish army lost a good soldier ten years ago when Hipolito Lazaro was released in order to pursue his vocal studies in Barcelona. Spain was at war with Morocco when the young singer, then twenty years old, enlisted and went off to do his patriotic duty. Today Lazaro is known in half a dozen different countries as a rarely gifted tenor. The young artist made his first operatic appearance in this country at the Metropolitan Opera last Winter and was heard in Boston with that organization last Spring. His concert work is said to be as brilliant as his operatic.

Lazaro comes to Symphony Hall in the course of a few weeks for his first Boston concert. He will be assisted by Sascha Jacobsen, a young violinist, who is meeting with distinct success on the concert stage.

For his program he has chosen four operatic arias in which he has had his greatest successes. The first aria is from Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine;" the second, Donizetti's "La Favorita," the third from "I Puritani" by the same composer and the fourth the popular Che gelida manina from Puccini's "La Boheme." A Spanish group and a French group of songs will complete his program.

om PRESS
ldress Philadelphia, Pa.
ate

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

In choosing Henri Rabaud to succeed Dr. Carl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the trustees of that famous organization have not only secured a musician of first rank, but they have done much to wipe out whatever unpleasant associations the public mind may still have attributed to the orchestra since its former conductor's pro-German activities were alleged. For M. Rabaud is a Frenchman and a distinguished one. His assumption of the baton of the orchestra in Boston will settle the matter of loyalty for the most scrupulous of patriots.

M. Rabaud has for five years past been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, a Government institution, and has also been prominent in concert work. He is known in this country chiefly by his orchestral and operatic compositions, one of which, "Marouf," was sung in New York by the Metropolitan Company last season.

Philadelphia will be among the cities to welcome the new conductor, and there is scarcely any doubt that while he wields the baton the Boston Symphony concerts will renew their old time popularity here. The prospect of a little Gallic seasoning for the rather stolid precision of the famous musicians from [illegible] is a wholly agreeable one.

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 16,

Robert Gould Shaw Duplicates "The Shakspeare Library"

Anderson's second sale will be that of the second portion of "The Shakspeare Library" sent from England, Part I, which was dispersed last season at the same galleries. This will be sold on the afternoons of Oct. 28, 29 and 30. It contains not only some 300 volumes relating to Shakspeare which were omitted from the previous sale, but many special copies of books of the greatest rarity, and different editions of the English Bible used by Shakspeare, from the famous Bishops' folio edition of 1572 down to the Jacobean edition of 1616, quarto, published in the year of the poet's death. From another English source has been added a fine collection of early English laws up to the time of Edward III. and Henry VIII.; a copy of ancient and modern English literature, with such rarities as a Fourth Folio Shakespeare; the proof sheets of Browning's "Jocoseria," with an autograph letter of extraordinary interest; Mrs. Browning's "Prometheus Bound"; a Kilmarnock Burns; Tennyson's "Poems by Two Brothers," an Irving's "Knickerbocker History," believing that greater attention would be paid in future to works on the history of the early West, he acquired the work of many of the early writers, including Henneplin, Joutel, Charlevoix, Lahontan, Lewis and Clarke, Pike, Long, Mackenzie and others.

During the twenty-five years of his collecting he acquired a delightful library, with such rarities as a First Folio of Beaumont and Fletcher; Endymion," first edition, Keats's "Christian Praiers and Henry Bull's "Godly Meditations," printed in London by Henrie Middleton, 1578. This copy, the work of a famous Oxford religious reformer, is of equal rarity with the first edition and is the only recorded copy. Among the autographic material the letters of William and Philip Herbert, earls of Pembroke and Shakspeare's "Tempest," are the most conspicuous items, although the comparable pair of Brethren" are some rare and valuable Elizabeth manuscripts in the sale.

BOOK sales of the season of 1919 are now fairly under way although as a rule the early sales do not contain the nuggets of literature which come out during the season. Particularly is this true of the present season, when the country is in the midst of the Liberty Loan drive which is being conducted with the handicap of being obliged to rely upon personal solicitation. Later in the season, however, there will be no lack of good material for both the buyers and the auctioneers, although there is nothing to indicate that this will be a season of "bargain sales." The Anderson Galleries announce as their first sale that of the Emmet, which will be held on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, Oct. 21, 22 and 23. The Emmet library was the library of the late William Temple Emmet, who began collecting as a boy. Mr. Emmet was well as a collector of a bookover as that

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

STAR

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 5 - 1918

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR NOTED FRENCHMAN

Henri Rabaud Chosen Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MINISTRY CABLES ACCEPTANCE

Walter, Press Representative of Orchestra, Makes Announcement.

Muck's successor has been chosen, and he is a Frenchman. In other words, to quote verbatim a telegram dated Boston, October 4, and signed W. E. Walter, press representative Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra anounced today that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra.

"A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts this morning stated that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The Ministry of Fine Arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

"Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season was his opera Marouf, his second symphony is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra.

"At present he is the principal conductor at the grand opera in Paris, under Mossager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire,where te studied composition with Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

"Pierre Montaux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, which ends with its second concert in New York, Saturday afternoon November 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud being able to get here in time to prepare the program for the important out-of-town concerts of the orchestra the first week of November, Mr. Gatti Cassazza very courteously accepted Mr. Montaux's leave of absence for one week and thus solved an embarrassing problem."

Muck—Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, decorated by the Kaiser—is "somewhere" in the United States, where, the United States government —and Dr. Muck—know best.

As told by The Star sometime ago, it was announced the orchestra intends giving a series of five concerts in Baltimore this season.

TELEGRAM

New York City.

TRIBUNE

ess New York City

OCT 13 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall, this city, during the coming winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government were taken over by a board of nine trustees, composed of prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions. Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of it leading members. Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrere, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past. As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concerts in New York, will be under the direction of Pierre Montoux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall. The evening concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 20. The afternoon concerts fall on November 9, December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 22.

Notices of renewals of subscriptions have been sent to all of last year's subscribers to the Symphony Orchestra, and the response has been immediate and gratifying. In past years the subscription has been filled and closed early in the summer, but this year, owing to uncertainty as to the conductor, the sending of notices has been greatly delayed. Subscribers to last year's concerts are given until October 19 in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. There is the usual waiting lits of prospective patrons which, curiously enough, despite unfavorable conditions, has grown greatly during the past summer.

REPUBLICAN

Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux, New Conductor, Began Orchestra Rehearsals Last Tuesday

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra, addressed the members of the orchestra for the first time in his official capacity last Tuesday. The occasion was the first rehearsal of the season for the orchestra, and Judge Cabot's remarks were especially intended as an introduction to the orchestra of Pierre Monteux, who is to conduct the October concerts. In the course of his brief talk, he paid tribute to Maj Henry L. Higginson, whose deep interest in the orchestra contributed in large measure to its pre-eminence throughout the years.

"There is an old saying," Judge Cabot said, "that it takes nine tailors to make a man. It is a new question whether nine trustees will make one Maj Higginson. These nine, representing a much larger number, are making their attempt to do for the art of music in Boston and America something of what he has done, because they feel sure of the orchestra itself It has the benefit of a succession of able conductors; but what could they have done without just such musicians as the members of the great orchestra? Those members have always been chosen with the greatest care, as artists and as men. Their work in public has proved to all the world what true artists they are; their work in private, at rehearsals, on journeys, in daily intercourse at Symphony hall, has proved them to be true men, with whom the trustees are looking forward to a long future of friendly collaboration. We all have the same end in view—the continued supremacy of this organization, of which all its members, both players and management, and all music-lovers, both in Boston and throughout the country, have such good reason to be proud.

"The general disturbance of the world has caused many changes, here as everywhere else. For some of the inevitable changes, taking some fellow-players from your side, there must be regret, but we are indeed fortunate in securing new members of the highest character and tried excellence. For the coming of M Monteux to the conductor's stand for the opening concerts there can be nothing but rejoicing. We begin the year under one who brings with him every advantage of experience and authority. He comes as a musician and a gentleman with whom an association of a few weeks will seem altogether too short; he comes also as a representative of a race wich has shown itself equally admirable in art and in heroism.

"Gentlemen of the orchestra and M Monteux, it is a great pleasure to introduce you to each other—and to leave you together."

Two weeks will be given by the orchestra to vigorous rehearsing. M Monteux announces the program of the concerts he will give in Boston, as follows:—

October 18 19

Symphony, No 7, in A major ..Beethoven
"Que tu ne t'en alles," symphonic poem .....Loeffler
Concerto for piano and orchestra, No 1, in E flat major .....Liszt
"Daphnis et Cloe," suite, No 1 (first time at these concerts) .....Ravel
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

October 25-26

Symphony, No 2, in D major ....Brahms
"Istar," variations symphoniques, op. 42 .....d'Indy
Symphony, No 3, in G minor (with organ) .....Saint-Saens

AMERICAN

ress: New York City.

Dr. Muck's Successor to Bar German Music

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

Henry Rabaud About to Leave Paris for America to Become Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Declares He Feels Honored at Offer of Post.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

PARIS, Saturday.—Declaring that he felt highly honored to be asked to lead such a fine body of musicians as the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry Rabaud has announced that he will leave this city shortly for the United States. He will take the place of Dr. Karl Muck, now in an internment camp for enemy aliens in America.

"I know Americans love novelty," he said, "but while satisfying this legitimate taste it must not be forgotten that our rôle is to develop artistic musical education. The best means of doing this is by the execution of the classics."

Mr. Rabaud declared he himself had placed Wagner's works under the ban, "despite the admiration I have always professed for the works of the German master, all of which I have conducted at the Paris Opéra. Those," he added, "were put on before the war. My patriotism would have suffered cruelly if we had not been able to dispense with them."

Of his work in Boston he said his primary aim would be to obtain perfection of execution.

Mr. Rabaud conducted the Paris Opéra seven years under the Broussan and the Messager managements. He also conducted a series of national matinees at the Sorbonne. His best known work is "Marouf," which is in the répertoire of the Opéra Comique and in that of the Metropolitan Opera Campany in New York.

Boston Symphony Engages Henri Rabaud

BOSTON, Oct. 4.

THE trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be the permanent conductor of this well known orchestra. A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts this morning stated that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country.

Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season was his opera "Marouf." His Second Symphony is a standard work in orchestra repertoire and he has written many other compositions for opera and for orchestra.

At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris under Messanger, a post which he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire where he studied composition with Massenet and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first southern trip, which ends with its second concert in New York Saturday afternoon, November 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston.

om EVENING SUN

dress: New York City

te OCT 8 - 191

Music

The Boston's New Leader.

Boston is fretted at present with the influenza, but those troubles are as nothing compared to the anxiety that sacred city's inner elect must have felt at the prolonged headlessness of the Symphony Orchestra. Now that Henri Rabaud, the French composer and conductor, has cabled his acceptance of the trustees' proffer of the directorship life will take on its accustomed earnest calm up and down the slopes of Beacon Hill and in and out of the hut embellished Public Gardens. Mr. Rabaud in Paris cannot know the effect of his decision on the intellectual area which, bordered by a few Boston streets, still in the minds of some marks the most western frontier of American culture. And if the Symphony had to face the winter without a permanent head one might as well take down the codfish and dig up the bulbs in next spring's Public Garden.

Nevertheless Mr. Rabaud, despite all the past uncertainties, seems to be coming and will make his first appearance with the orchestra on Nov. 15 and 16, after Mr. Monteux relinquishes his temporary leadership. Mr. Rabaud is well known abroad as a composer and a director, a familiar figure for years at the Opera, at the Opera Comique and at symphony concerts.

Metropolitan operagoers will remember his music from last season's highly colored production of "Marouf," the operatic fantasy picked out of the Arabian Nights and set to a changeful bizarre score modern French music, echoing in addition to its own melodies the strains of half a dozen contemporaries and his recent predecessors. As a composer he has written several symphonies, tone poems, and two other operas in addition to "Marouf"—that last of which is the only one to have had American representation. The other two, "La Fille de Roland" and "Par le Glaive," drawn from the plays of De Bornier and Richepin, have been produced only in Brussels and Paris.

The second of his symphonies has been heard in this country frequently at the hands of the Boston Orchestral Club, the New York Symphony, the Philadelphia Symphony and at the Worcester Festival last autumn. His symphonic poem "La Procession Nocturnes" has been announced for one of the programmes of the Symphony next month. Mr. Rabaud, it seems, is better known at the moment as a composer than as a conductor, for although he has a Parisian reputation it leans more heavily on his scores than on work with the baton. It will be interesting, however, to observe his reaction to the American scene, with its larger freedom and the opportunities that await him as a conductor, and to watch also the potential Gallicizing of the Symphony programmes. If the rythym and color written all over the music of "Marouf" can be transmuted into his directing and selecting arm with an added compactness and coherency Mr. Rabaud's season should promise interest.

REPUBLICAN

ss Springfield, Mass.

Early speculation as to the choice of a permanent conductor for the Boston symphony orchestra is proved to have been amiss, save in the detail that the successor to Dr Muck would in all probability be a Frenchman. Like some of those before him who have been invited to take this important post, he comes from the opera house rather than from a position at the head of a symphony orchestra; and, unlike most of them, he has made a mark as a composer. It is an interesting coincidence that one of his symphonies was performed at the Worcester music festival just a year ago. This, like the opera "Marouf," which New York heard last winter, was found to be a strong and interesting work, reasonably individual without being ultra-modern. M Rabaud, as seen in Paris at the opera and at concerts, is described by the Boston Transcript as "an unusual and pictorial figure, whether he was conductor or only intent listener, tall, gaunt, bearded, olive-skinned, grave of glance and quick of gesture, oriental rather than Parisian in impression to the eye." By every token the trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra have made a very happy selection. By training, talent and musicianly sincerity M Rabaud seems well qualified for the post.

From

Address Springfield Oct 8 1918

Boston Symphony Coming.

Probably no musical organization ever went through such a trying experience or survived such a series of shocks as the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the past 20 months. The fact that it can come to the surface and smile after such protracted storm and scourging speaks well for the quality of its vitality, and commends it to public good-will and confidence. Music-lovers cannot but remember it as a superbly skilled and harmonious orchestra; but the same memory serves also to recall the indescribable necromancy of the baton of Oberhoffer of the Minneapolis Symphony, the intense Stransky in the New York Philharmonic, Paur's in the Pittsburg, and others equally well-equipped, according to continental standards—each of whom gave Springfield ample evidence of eminence in orchestral performance. So the announcement that the newly-purged and rejuvenated "Boston Symphony" is later coming into this vicinity is really good news to many lovers of orchestral music in the Connecticut Calley. The action of the trustees of the orchestra put Pierre Monteaux in charge of the first (October) concerts of the new series. He was long conductor of the French opera section of the Metropolitan activities in New York, and is frankly considered one of the best conductors in America. By the time these concerts have been played, or early in November, M. Henri Rabuad, the celebrated Parisian composer, will have had opportunity to reach here from France, and will assume the baton laid down when Dr. Muck was interned (not a case of "interment," as several papers inadvertently had it!) This disposes of the rumors already published that M. Chavillard, conductor of the Lamoureaux-Colonne concerts would be permanent conductor. That gentleman's "dignified opulence" at his villa near St. Germaine, now in truth, transformed into many-sided war relief work—could not be interfered with, and the result is M. Rabaud's choice. The new conductor is a composer of note as well as orchestra leader, widely known for his operas, "Marouf" and "The Daughter of Roland," as well as for such successful and purely instrumental works as his "Second Symphony." By the way, the orchestra now has the youngest concert-master since Franz Kneisel in the person of the Troy (N. Y.), violinist, Frederic Fradkin, successor to Anton Witek, and an honor pupil of Bendix, Remy and Lafore. He plays on the superb instrument awarded him by the French government for his astonishing proficiency. He made his debut with Mahler of the Philharmonic in New York in January, 1911.

This is the Boston Symphony's 38th season, and its first since the retirement of its "good angel" Col. Higginson. Its season of 24 Friday afternoons and 24 Saturday nights—according to usual procedure, and barring board of health bans, begins in October. The "battery" of its solo-artists includes such names as Fradkin, Malkin, Bonnet, Thibaud, Mabel Garrison, De Gorgoza and eight others equally qualified to give flawless delight.

m EVENING POST

ress: New York City

RABAUD TO BE CONDUCTOR

Accepts Boston Symphony Orchestra Post, for Coming Season.

BOSTON, October 4 (by A.P.).—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. This word was received to-day by the trustees in a cable dispatch from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

For the last five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and has also done much concert work. His orchestral comositions include the Second Symphony and "La Procession Nocturne," while among his operas are "Marouf" and "La Fille de Roland."

The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations that have been in progress since last spring when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

1 EVENING WORLD

ress: New York City.

RABAUD SUCCEEDS MUCK.

French Composer to Conduct Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. The Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris has cabled that Mr. Rabaud will sail immediately. For five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris. Among his operas are "Marouf" and "La Fille de Roland."

Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was interned last spring.

STAR

Baltimore, Md.

MUCK'S SUCCESSOR NOTED FRENCHMAN

Henri Rabaud Chosen Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MINISTRY CABLES ACCEPTANCE

Walter, Press Representative of Orchestra, Makes Announcement.

Muck's successor has been chosen, and he is a Frenchman. In other words, to quote verbatim a telegram dated Boston, October 4, and signed W. E. Walter, press representative Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra anounced today that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra.

"A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts this morning stated that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The Ministry of Fine Arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

"Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season was his opera Marouf, his second symphony is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra.

"At present he is the principal conductor at the grand opera in Paris, under Mossager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire,where te studied composition with Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

"Pierre Montaux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, which ends with its second concert in New York, Saturday afternoon November 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr. Rabaud being able to get here in time to prepare the program for the important out-of-town concerts of the orchestra the first week of November, Mr. Gatti Cassazza very courteously accepted Mr. Montaux's leave of absence for one week and thus solved an embarrassing problem."

Muck—Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, decorated by the Kaiser—is "somewhere" in the United States, where, the United States government —and Dr. Muck—know best.

As told by The Star sometime ago, it was announced the orchestra intends giving a series of five concerts in Baltimore this season

TELEGRAM

New York City.

TRIBUNE

New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall, this city, during the coming winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government were taken over by a board of nine trustees, composed of prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions. Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of it leading members. Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrere, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past. As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concerts in New York, will be under the direction of Pierre Montoux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall. The evening concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 20. The afternoon concerts fall on November 9, December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 22.

Notices of renewals of subscriptions have been sent to all of last year's subscribers to the Symphony Orchestra, and the response has been immediate and gratifying. In past years the subscription has been filled and closed early in the summer, but this year, owing to uncertainty as to the conductor, the sending of notices has been greatly delayed. Subscribers to last year's concerts are given until October 19 in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. There is the usual waiting lits of prospective patrons which, curiously enough, despite unfavorable conditions, has grown greatly during the past summer.

REPUBLICAN

Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux, New Conductor, Began Orchestra Rehearsals Last Tuesday

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra, addressed the members of the orchestra for the first time in his official capacity last Tuesday. The occasion was the first rehearsal of the season for the orchestra, and Judge Cabot's remarks were especially intended as an introduction to the orchestra of Pierre Monteux, who is to conduct the October concerts. In the course of his brief talk, he paid tribute to Maj Henry L. Higginson, whose deep interest in the orchestra contributed in large measure to its pre-eminence throughout the years.

"There is an old saying," Judge Cabot said, "that it takes nine tailors to make a man. It is a new question whether nine trustees will make one Maj Higginson. These nine, representing a much larger number, are making their attempt to do for the art of music in Boston and America something of what he has done, because they feel sure of the orchestra itself (t has the benefit of a succession of able conductors; but what could they have done without just such musicians as the members of the great orchestra? Those members have always been chosen with the greatest care, as artists and as men. Their work in public has proved to all the world what true artists they are; their work in private, at rehearsals, on journeys, in daily intercourse at Symphony hall, has proved them to be true men, with whom the trustees are looking forward to a long future of friendly collaboration. We all have the same end in view—the continued supremacy of this organization, of which all its members, both players and management, and all music-lovers, both in Boston and throughout the country, have such good reason to be proud.

"The general disturbance of the world has caused many changes, here as everywhere else. For some of the inevitable changes, taking some fellow-players from your side, there must be regret, but we are indeed fortunate in securing new members of the highest character and tried excellence. For the coming of M Monteux to the conductor's stand for the opening concerts there can be nothing but rejoicing. We begin the year under one who brings with him every advantage of experience and authority. He comes as a musician and a gentleman with whom an association of a few weeks will seem altogether too short; he comes also as a representative of a race wich has shown itself equally admirable in art and in heroism.

"Gentlemen of the orchestra and M Monteux, it is a great pleasure to introduce you to each other—and to leave you together."

Two weeks will be given by the orchestra to vigorous rehearsing. M Monteux announces the program of the concerts he will give in Boston, as follows:—

October 18 19

Symphony, No 7, in A major ..Beethoven
"Que tu ne t'en alles," symphonic poem .....Loeffler
Concerto for piano and orchestra, No 1, in E flat major .....Liszt
"Daphnis et Cloe," suite, No 1 (first time at these concerts) .....Ravel
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

October 25-26

Symphony, No 2, in D major ....Brahms
"Istar," variations symphoniques, op. 42 .....d'Indy
Symphony, No 3, in G minor (with organ) .....Saint-Saens

EVENING SUN

New York City

Music

The Boston's New Leader.

Boston is fretted at present with the influenza, but those troubles are as nothing compared to the anxiety that sacred city's inner elect must have felt at the prolonged headlessness of the Symphony Orchestra. Now that Henri Rabaud, the French composer and conductor, has cabled his acceptance of the trustees' proffer of the directorship life will take on its accustomed earnest calm up and down the slopes of Beacon Hill and in and out of the hut embellished Public Gardens. Mr. Rabaud in Paris cannot know the effect of his decision on the intellectual area which, bordered by a few Boston streets, still in the minds of some marks the most western frontier of American culture. And if the Symphony had to face the winter without a permanent head one might as well take down the codfish and dig up the bulbs in next spring's Public Garden.

Nevertheless Mr. Rabaud, despite all the past uncertainties, seems to be coming and will make his first appearance with the orchestra on Nov. 15 and 16, after Mr. Monteux relinquishes his temporary leadership. Mr. Rabaud is well known abroad as a composer and a director, a familiar figure for years at the Opera, at the Opera Comique and at symphony concerts.

Metropolitan operagoers will remember his music from last season's highly colored production of "Marouf," the operatic fantasy picked out of the Arabian Nights and set to a changeful bizarre score modern French music, echoing in addition to its own melodies the strains of half a dozen contemporaries and his recent predecessors. As a composer he has written several symphonies, tone poems, and two other operas in addition to "Marouf"—that last of which is the only one to have had American representation. The other two, "La Fille de Roland" and "Par le Glaive," drawn from the plays of De Bornier and Richepin, have been produced only in Brussels and Paris.

The second of his symphonies has been heard in this country frequently at the hands of the Boston Orchestral Club, the New York Symphony, the Philadelphia Symphony and at the Worcester Festival last autumn. His symphonic poem "La Procession Nocturnes" has been announced for one of the programmes of the Symphony next month. Mr. Rabaud, it seems, is better known at the moment as a composer than as a conductor, for although he has a Parisian reputation it leans more heavily on his scores than on work with the baton. It will be interesting, however, to observe his reaction to the American scene, with its larger freedom and the opportunities that await him as a conductor, and to watch also the potential Gallicizing of the Symphony programmes. If the rythym and color written all over the music of "Marouf" can be transmuted into his directing and selecting arm with an added compactness and coherency Mr. Rabaud's season should promise interest.

From

Address

Springfield

OCT 8 1918

Boston Symphony Coming.

Probably no musical organization ever went through such a trying experience or survived such a series of shocks as the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the past 20 months. The fact that it can come to the surface and smile after such protracted storm and scourging speaks well for the quality of its vitality, and commends it to public good-will and confidence. Music-lovers cannot but remember it as a superbly skilled and harmonious orchestra; but the same memory serves also to recall the indescribable necromancy of the baton of Oberhoffer of the Minneapolis Symphony, the intense Stransky in the New York Philharmonic, Paur's in the Pittsburg, and others equally well-equipped, according to continental standards—each of whom gave Springfield ample evidence of eminence in orchestral performance. So the announcement that the newly-purged and rejuvenated "Boston Symphony" is later coming into this vicinity is really good news to many lovers of orchestral music in the Connecticut Calley. The action of the trustees of the orchestra put Pierre Monteaux in charge of the first (October) concerts of the new series. He was long conductor of the French opera section of the Metropolitan activities in New York, and is frankly considered one of the best conductors in America. By the time these concerts have been played, or early in November, M. Henri Rabuad, the celebrated Parisian composer, will have had opportunity to reach here from France, and will assume the baton laid down when Dr. Muck was interned (not a case of "interment," as several papers inadvertently had it!) This disposes of the rumors already published that M. Chavillard, conductor of the Lamoureaux-Colonne concerts would be permanent conductor. That gentleman's "dignified opulence" at his villa near St. Germaine, now in truth, transformed into many-sided war relief work—could not be interfered with, and the result is M. Rabaud's choice. The new conductor is a composer of note as well as orchestra leader, widely known for his operas, "Marouf" and "The Daughter of Roland," as well as for such successful and purely instrumental works as his "Second Symphony." By the way, the orchestra now has the youngest concert-master since Franz Kneisel in the person of the Troy (N. Y.), violinist, Frederic Fradkin, successor to Anton Witek, and an honor pupil of Bendix, Remy and Lafore. He plays on the superb instrument awarded him by the French government for his astonishing proficiency. He made his debut with Mahler of the Philharmonic in New York in January, 1911.

This is the Boston Symphony's 38th season, and its first since the retirement of its "good angel" Col. Higginson. Its season of 24 Friday afternoons and 24 Saturday nights—according to usual procedure, and barring board of health bans, begins in October. The "battery" of its solo-artists includes such names as Fradkin, Malkin, Bonnet, Thibaud, Mabel Garrison, De Gorgoza and eight others equally qualified to give flawless delight.

EVENING POST

New York City

RABAUD TO BE CONDUCTOR

Accepts Boston Symphony Orchestra Post, for Coming Season.

BOSTON, October 4 (by A.P.).—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. This word was received to-day by the trustees in a cable dispatch from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

For the last five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, and has also done much concert work. His orchestral comositions include the Second Symphony and "La Procession Nocturne," while among his operas are "Marouf" and "La Fille de Roland."

The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations that have been in progress since last spring when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

EVENING WORLD

New York City.

Dr. Muck's Successor to Bar German Music

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

Henry Rabaud About to Leave Paris for America to Become Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Declares He Feels Honored at Offer of Post.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

PARIS, Saturday.—Declaring that he felt highly honored to be asked to lead such a fine body of musicians as the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry Rabaud has announced that he will leave this city shortly for the United States. He will take the place of Dr. Karl Muck, now in an internment camp for enemy aliens in America.

"I know Americans love novelty," he said, "but while satisfying this legitimate taste it must not be forgotten that our rôle is to develop artistic musical education. The best means of doing this is by the execution of the classics."

Mr. Rabaud declared he himself had placed Wagner's works under the ban, "despite the admiration I have always professed for the works of the German master, all of which I have conducted at the Paris Opera. Those," he added, "were put on before the war. My patriotism would have suffered cruelly if we had not been able to dispense with them."

Of his work in Boston he said his primary aim would be to obtain perfection of execution.

Mr. Rabaud conducted the Paris Opera seven years under the Broussan and the Messager managements. He also conducted a series of national matinees at the Sorbonne. His best known work is "Marouf," which is in the répertoire of the Opéra Comique and in that of the Metropolitan Opera Campany in New York.

AMERICAN

New York City.

Boston Symphony Engages Henri Rabaud

BOSTON, Oct. 4.

THE trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be the permanent conductor of this well known orchestra. A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts this morning stated that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country.

Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan Opera House last season was his opera "Marouf." His Second Symphony is a standard work in orchestra repertoire and he has written many other compositions for opera and for orchestra.

At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris under Messanger, a post which he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire where he studied composition with Massenet and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first southern trip, which ends with its second concert in New York Saturday afternoon, November 9, and Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston.

REPUBLICAN

Springfield, Mass.

Early speculation as to the choice of a permanent conductor for the Boston symphony orchestra is proved to have been amiss, save in the detail that the successor to Dr Muck would in all probability be a Frenchman. Like some of those before him who have been invited to take this important post, he comes from the opera house rather than from a position at the head of a symphony orchestra; and, unlike most of them, he has made a mark as a composer. It is an interesting coincidence that one of his symphonies was performed at the Worcester music festival just a year ago. This, like the opera "Marouf," which New York heard last winter, was found to be a strong and interesting work, reasonably individual without being ultra-modern. M Rabaud, as seen in Paris at the opera and at concerts, is described by the Boston Transcript as "an unusual and pictorial figure, whether he was conductor or only intent listener, tall, gaunt, bearded, olive-skinned, grave of glance and quick of gesture, oriental rather than Parisian in impression to the eye." By every token the trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra have made a very happy selection. By training, talent and musicianly sincerity M Rabaud seems well qualified for the post.

RABAUD SUCCEEDS MUCK.

French Composer to Conduct Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. The Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris has cabled that Mr. Rabaud will sail immediately. For five years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris. Among his operas are "Marouf" and "La Fille de Roland."

Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was interned last spring.

m STANDARD UNION

ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

e

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plan for the series of Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, during the coming winter under the auspices of Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions. Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin sections. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past. As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the grand opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Brooklyn, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company. The orchestra will give its usual series of five Friday evening concerts in the Academy of Music on Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 7 and March 21. The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Manhattan; Joseph Hofman, the distinguished pianist; Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, who is now concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

m HERALD

dress: New York City

e

PROUD TO CONDUCT BOSTON MUSICIANS, SAYS MR. RABAUD

French Conductor in Paris Outlines His Programme and Tells of His Ideals.

Herald Bureau,
No. 49 Avenue de l'Opera,
Paris, Friday.

[Special Cable to the Herald.]

Henry Rabaud, who will take the place of Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when interviewed by a reporter for the HERALD, said he expected to start soon for the United States; that he felt highly honored at being asked to lead such a fine body of musicians; that his programme would be to give the music which he considered the most beautiful—namely, the great classics—and also works of the modern masters.

"I know Americans love novelty," he said, "but while satisfying this legitimate taste it must not be forgotten that our rôle is to develop artistic musical education. The best means of doing this is by the execution of the classics."

Mr. Rabaud declared he himself had placed Wagner's works under the ban, "despite the admiration I have always professed for the works of the German master, all of which I have conducted at the Paris Opéra. Those," he added, "were put on before the war. My patriotism would have suffered cruelly if we had not been able to dispense with them."

Of his work in Boston he said his primary aim would be to obtain perfection of execution.

Mr. Rabaud conducted the Paris Opéra seven years under the Broussan and the Messager managements. He also conducted a series of national matinees at the Sorbonne. His best known work is "Marouf," which is in the répertoire of the Opéra Comique and in that of the Metropolitan Opera Campany in New York.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

om MORNING TELEGRAPH

ddress: New York City

OCT 6 - 1918

ate

Why Monteux Sticks to Gatti.

The fine devotional spirit which exists between the great French and Italian musical leaders now directing the widening destinies of that art in America, is well illustrated in the unselfish and wholly generous attitude of such men as Gatti-Casazzi Monteux and Barerre not only with reference to their own connections with music in America, but also in regard to the new relations sought for with such distinguished foreigners as Toscanini, Chevillard and others with whom some of our greatest musical organizations are now negotiating.

A sidelight upon this fine personal and professional spirit of co-operating is found in the Musings of Mephisto, which, in the current issue of Musical America, says: "Last Summer the distinguished French musician, George Barrere, who has with his "Ensemble" given music lovers so much pleasure, wrote to me about a criticism which appeared in your paper with regard to Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, who at that time was conducting the Civic Orchestra concerts at the St. Nicholas Rink. Barrere felt that Monsieur Monteux had not been given credit for the work he was accomplishing and defended him ardently. Shortly after, you know, Monteux was chosen—in fact he had already been chosen—for the French repertoire at the Metropolitan, where he has emphatically made good and won thousands of friends among our music lovers.

"But Barrere's championship of his French friend, which was wholly altruistic, by the bye, did not cease, and one of the results of his continuous efforts is that Monteux has been selected as conductor for some of the concerts at the opening of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is said that the permanent conductor will be Camille Chevillard, who is to come from Paris.

"The story goes that Monteux had the opportunity to be the permanent conductor for the Boston Symphony at about three times the salary he is receiving at the Metropolitan. Otto H. Kahn, the chairman of the board of directors, was willing, though regretfully, to let him go, for in such matters Kahn is grand seigneur, as Gatti declared him to be long ago. But Gatti raised a howl, they say, about the thing. 'For,' said he, very properly, 'here I am without the opportunity of giving any German opera, and if I am to be left without a competent conductor for French opera, where will my season be?' Then it was that Monteux stepped in and with characteristic French enthusiasm and generosity, stated that he would relinquish the opportunity of making much more money during the season and would remain loyal to his impresario, Gatti."

From TIMES

Address: New York City

Date

SOME of the best-laid plans of the opening season for American orchestras, and for those of other countries about to visit this side of the Atlantic, have been subject to correction within the last week by war at sea and grip ashore. Worcester's music festival, once postponed, was finally canceled outright owing to the influenza quarantine, and after sixty years the Directors faced a loss of all they had spent in preparing for the first time an all-American series. Some patriotic subscribers refused their money back, preferring to share the deficit for a good cause.

Whether the Boston Symphony would be able to open its home season was still in doubt up to Friday, the day of the first "public rehearsal." Pierre Monteux, who will conduct the first visit to New York three weeks from now, had had a fortnight of daily practice with the premier band on his French program, printed in this column last Sunday. For his next two pairs of concerts he announced that his symphonies would be, respectively, Beethoven's Seventh and Brahms's No. 2. With Beethoven's work he planned to give C. M. Loeffler's "Que Tu Ne T'en Ailes," Liszt's E flat concerto, with Hofmann, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." The later Brahms was to be grouped with d'Indy's "Istar" and Saint-Saëns's G minor symphony, with organ.

From EVENING GLOBE

Address: New York City

Date

HENRI RABAUD.

As permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer, has been at last chosen. A man in the prime of middle life, M. Rabaud is one of the chief contemporary French composers. New York knows him well through his interesting score of "Marouf," presented at the Metropolitan Opera House last season, and has also heard with approval one of his symphonies. A composer of thorough academic training, M. Rabaud has not been content to linger in the musical past, but, as his "Marouf" shows unmistakably, is an alert and able student of modern musical ideas and methods. His substantial qualities as a conductor Paris has recognized through his work at the national opera houses.

With Pierre Monteux, on leave from the Metropolitan Opera House, as conductor for the first month and with M. Rabaud for the remainder of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a year of wholesome and uninterrupted Gallic influence. Music lovers in New York look forward to the visits of the orchestra with relishing anticipation of some rare musical banquets [illegible] d'Indy, Chabrier, Debussy, Ravel, and

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York City

Date OCT 5 1918

TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Henri Rabaud, of Paris Grand Opera, Accepts Offer.

BOSTON, Oct. 5.—Henri Rabaud, for the last five years one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19. M. Rabaud cabled his acceptance yesterday and is expected to arrive early in November. He will take charge of the musical organization immediately upon its return from its first Southern trip under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Rabaud has done much concert work and his orchestra compositions have won wide favor. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied composition with Massenet. He won the Prix de Rome in 1894. M. Rabaud is 52 years old. He was born in Paris. Among his orchestra compositions are the "Second Symphony" and "La Procession Nocturne." Among his operas are "La Fille de Roland" and "Marouf." "Marouf" was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House last winter.

The engagement of M. Rabaud ends a long series of negotiations which have been in progress since the interment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor.

From EVENING POST

Address: New York City

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MANY changes have been made in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but those who have heard it in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. A number of changes have been made in the wood-wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past. As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opéra in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving; therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concerts in New York, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From REPUBLICAN

Address Springfield, Mass.

Date

The Fitchburg Sentinel notes that a "weeding out" in the ranks of the Boston symphony orchestra will affect "those who were added to the orchestra under the leadership of Dr Karl Muck, and who shared his views as to the superiority of Germany over America." The personnel of the orchestra was largely German or Austrian long before Dr Muck became conductor, but it has contained notable exceptions, like M Longy and the other wood-wind players. Before the United States entered the war, the utmost harmony is said to have prevailed among musicians of warring nationalities. The orchestra was always scrupulously maintained by Maj Higginson as a musical organization, into which national considerations did not enter. Ten and more years ago some demanded a larger representation of French music, not, indeed, on national grounds, but because they saw beauty in the work of Cesar Franck and other "moderns." The musical classics, being largely German, predominated in the orchestra's programs, but new French, Russian and Danish, as well as German, works were frequently tried out."

TELEGRAM

ess: New York City.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

HENRI RABAUD WILL CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

BOSTON, Friday.—Henri Rabaud, the French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-1919. This word was received to-day by the symphony trustees in a cablegram from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

PUBLIC LEDGER

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 5 - 1918

HENRI RABAUD, OF PARIS, TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY

Released by French Ministry to Lead Boston Orchestra in 1918-19

Boston, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. This word was received today by the symphony trustees in a cable message from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said that M. Rabaud would reach Boston early in November.

For the last five years M. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris and has done much concert work. His engagement brings to an end negotiations in progress since last spring since the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor.

TRIBUNE

ess: New York City

Henri Rabaud Chosen

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 4.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, French conductor and composer, had been engaged as permanent conductor. A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts this morning states that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement, and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The Ministry of Fine Arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman.

Rabaud at present is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris. This post he has filled for seven years.

PRESS

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

FRENCH COMPOSER SUCCEEDS DR. MUCK IN ORCHESTRA

Henri Raband New Conductor of Boston Symphony Replacing German Interned as Enemy.

Boston, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. This word was received today by the symphony trustees in a cable message from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Raboud would reach Boston early in November.

For the last five years M. Raboud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris and also has done much concert work. His engagement brings to an end negotiations in progress since last Spring when the interment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

RABAUD, SYMPHONY LEADER

Boston, October 4—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19. This word was received today by the Symphony trustees in a cablegram from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would sail immedately, so as to be here early in November.

The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations that have been in progress since last spring, when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

From EVENING MAIL

Address: New York City

Date 4 1918

French Composer to Succeed Dr. Karl Muck

Boston, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. M. Rabaud will sail from France immediately. He succeeds Dr. Karl Muck, interned.

m STANDARD UNION

ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

e

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plan for the series of Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, during the coming winter under the auspices of Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions. Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin sections. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past. As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the grand opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Brooklyn, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company. The orchestra will give its usual series of five Friday evening concerts in the Academy of Music on Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 7 and March 21. The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Manhattan; Joseph Hofman, the distinguished pianist; Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, who is now concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

m HERALD

dress: New York City

e

PROUD TO CONDUCT BOSTON MUSICIANS, SAYS MR. RABAUD

French Conductor in Paris Outlines His Programme and Tells of His Ideals.

Herald Bureau,
No. 49 Avenue de l'Opera,
Paris, Friday.

[Special Cable to the Herald.]

Henry Rabaud, who will take the place of Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when interviewed by a reporter for the HERALD, said he expected to start soon for the United States; that he felt highly honored at being asked to lead such a fine body of musicians; that his programme would be to give the music which he considered the most beautiful—namely, the great classics—and also works of the modern masters.

"I know Americans love novelty," he said, "but while satisfying this legitimate taste it must not be forgotten that our rôle is to develop artistic musical education. The best means of doing this is by the execution of the classics."

Mr. Rabaud declared he himself had placed Wagner's works under the ban, "despite the admiration I have always professed for the works of the German master, all of which I have conducted at the Paris Opéra. Those," he added, "were put on before the war. My patriotism would have suffered cruelly if we had not been able to dispense with them."

Of his work in Boston he said his primary aim would be to obtain perfection of execution.

Mr. Rabaud conducted the Paris Opéra seven years under the Broussan and the Messager managements. He also conducted a series of national matinees at the Sorbonne. His best known work is "Marouf," which is in the répertoire of the Opéra Comique and in that of the Metropolitan Opera Campany in New York.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

om MORNING TELEGRAPH

ddress: New York City

ate

Why Monteux Sticks to Gatti.

The fine devotional spirit which exists between the great French and Italian musical leaders now directing the widening destinies of that art in America, is well illustrated in the unselfish and wholly generous attitude of such men as Gatti-Casazzi Monteux and Barerre not only with reference to their own connections with music in America, but also in regard to the new relations sought for with such distinguished foreigners as Toscanini, Chevillard and others with whom some of our greatest musical organizations are now negotiating.

A sidelight upon this fine personal and professional spirit of co-operating is found in the Musings of Mephisto, which, in the current issue of Musical America, says: "Last Summer the distinguished French musician, George Barrere, who has with his "Ensemble" given music lovers so much pleasure, wrote to me about a criticism which appeared in your paper with regard to Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, who at that time was conducting the Civic Orchestra concerts at the St. Nicholas Rink. Barrere felt that Monsieur Monteux had not been given credit for the work he was accomplishing and defended him ardently. Shortly after, you know, Monteux was chosen—in fact he had already been chosen—for the French repertoire at the Metropolitan, where he has emphatically made good and won thousands of friends among our music lovers.

"But Barrere's championship of his French friend, which was wholly altruistic, by the bye, did not cease, and one of the results of his continuous efforts is that Monteux has been selected as conductor for some of the concerts at the opening of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is said that the permanent conductor will be Camille Chevillard, who is to come from Paris.

"The story goes that Monteux had the opportunity to be the permanent conductor for the Boston Symphony at about three times the salary he is receiving at the Metropolitan. Otto H. Kahn, the chairman of the board of directors, was willing, though regretfully, to let him go, for in such matters Kahn is grand seigneur, as Gatti declared him to be long ago. But Gatti raised a howl, they say, about the thing. 'For,' said he, very properly, 'here I am without the opportunity of giving any German opera, and if I am to be left without a competent conductor for French opera, where will my season be?' Then it was that Monteux stepped in and with characteristic French enthusiasm and generosity, stated that he would relinquish the opportunity of making much more money during the season and would remain loyal to his impresario, Gatti."

From TIMES

Address: New York City

Date

SOME of the best-laid plans of the opening season for American orchestras, and for those of other countries about to visit this side of the Atlantic, have been subject to correction within the last week by war at sea and grip ashore. Worcester's music festival, once postponed, was finally canceled outright owing to the influenza quarantine, and after sixty years the Directors faced a loss of all they had spent in preparing for the first time an all-American series. Some patriotic subscribers refused their money back, preferring to share the deficit for a good cause.

Whether the Boston Symphony would be able to open its home season was still in doubt up to Friday, the day of the first "public rehearsal." Pierre Monteux, who will conduct the first visit to New York three weeks from now, had had a fortnight of daily practice with the premier band on his French program, printed in this column last Sunday. For his next two pairs of concerts he announced that his symphonies would be, respectively, Beethoven's Seventh and Brahms's No. 2. With Beethoven's work he planned to give C. M. Loeffler's "Que Tu Ne T'en Alles," Liszt's E flat concerto, with Hofmann, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." The later Brahms was to be grouped with d'Indy's "Istar" and Saint-Saëns's G minor symphony, with organ.

From EVENING GLOBE

Address: New York City

Date

HENRI RABAUD.

As permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer, has been at last chosen. A man in the prime of middle life, M. Rabaud is one of the chief contemporary French composers. New York knows him well through his interesting score of "Marouf," presented at the Metropolitan Opera House last season, and has also heard with approval one of his symphonies. A composer of thorough academic training, M. Rabaud has not been content to linger in the musical past, but, as his "Marouf" shows unmistakably, is an alert and able student of modern musical ideas and methods. His substantial qualities as a conductor Paris has recognized through his work at the national opera houses.

With Pierre Monteux, on leave from the Metropolitan Opera House, as conductor for the first month and with M. Rabaud for the remainder of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a year of wholesome and uninterrupted Gallic influence. Music lovers in New York look forward to the visits of the orchestra with relishing anticipation of some rare musical banquets [illegible] Franck, d'Indy, Chabrier, Debussy, Ravel, and

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York City

Date

TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Henri Rabaud, of Paris Grand Opera, Accepts Offer.

BOSTON, Oct. 5.—Henri Rabaud, for the last five years one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19. M. Rabaud cabled his acceptance yesterday and is expected to arrive early in November. He will take charge of the musical organization immediately upon its return from its first Southern trip under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Rabaud has done much concert work and his orchestra compositions have won wide favor. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied composition with Massenet. He won the Prix de Rome in 1894. M. Rabaud is 52 years old. He was born in Paris. Among his orchestra compositions are the "Second Symphony" and "La Procession Nocturne." Among his operas are "La Fille de Roland" and "Marouf." "Marouf" was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House last winter.

The engagement of M. Rabaud ends a long series of negotiations which have been in progress since the interment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor.

From EVENING POST

Address: New York City

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MANY changes have been made in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but those who have heard it in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. A number of changes have been made in the wood-wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past. As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opéra in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving; therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concerts in New York, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From REPUBLICAN

Address Springfield, Mass.

Date

The Fitchburg Sentinel notes that a "weeding out" in the ranks of the Boston symphony orchestra will affect "those who were added to the orchestra under the leadership of Dr Karl Muck, and who shared his views as to the superiority of Germany over America." The personnel of the orchestra was largely German or Austrian long before Dr Muck became conductor, but it has contained notable exceptions, like M Longy and the other wood-wind players. Before the United States entered the war, the utmost harmony is said to have prevailed among musicians of warring nationalities. The orchestra was always scrupulously maintained by Maj Higginson as a musical organization, into which national considerations did not enter. Ten and more years ago some demanded a larger representation of French music, not, indeed, on national grounds, but because they saw beauty in the work of Cesar Franck and other "moderns." The musical classics, being largely German, predominated in the orchestra's programs, but new French, Russian and Danish, as well as German, works were frequently "tried out."

TELEGRAM

ess: New York City.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

HENRI RABAUD WILL CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

BOSTON, Friday.—Henri Rabaud, the French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-1919. This word was received to-day by the symphony trustees in a cablegram from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would sail immediately so as to be here early in November.

PUBLIC LEDGER

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

HENRI RABAUD, OF PARIS, TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY

Released by French Ministry to Lead Boston Orchestra in 1918-19

Boston, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. This word was received today by the symphony trustees in a cable message from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said that M. Rabaud would reach Boston early in November.

For the last five years M. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris and has done much concert work. His engagement brings to an end negotiations in progress since last spring since the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor.

TRIBUNE

ess: New York City

Henri Rabaud Chosen

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 4.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, French conductor and composer, had been engaged as permanent conductor. A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts this morning states that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement, and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The Ministry of Fine Arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman.

Rabaud at present is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris. This post he has filled for seven years.

PRESS

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

FRENCH COMPOSER SUCCEEDS DR. MUCK IN ORCHESTRA

Henri Raband New Conductor of Boston Symphony Replacing German Interned as Enemy.

Boston, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. This word was received today by the symphony trustees in a cable message from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Raboud would reach Boston early in November.

For the last five years M. Raboud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris and also has done much concert work. His engagement brings to an end negotiations in progress since last Spring when the interment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

RABAUD, SYMPHONY LEADER

Boston, October 4—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19. This word was received today by the Symphony trustees in a cablegram from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that Mr. Rabaud would sail immediately, so as to be here early in November.

The engagement of Mr. Rabaud brings to an end negotiations that have been in progress since last spring, when the interment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

From EVENING MAIL

Address: New York City

Date

French Composer to Succeed Dr. Karl Muck

Boston, Oct. 4.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season 1918-19. M. Rabaud will sail from France immediately. He succeeds Dr. Karl Muck, interned.

The Bibliography

RECORD, OCTOBER 18

MONTEUX WORKS WONDERS WITH NEW SYMPHONY

New Orchestra Will Amaze Music Lovers at First Concert Oct. 25

By J. V. CLARK

A week from this afternoon a new conductor will walk onto the stage at Symphony Hall and will face a partically new orchestra. The day will b an epoch-making one in the histo of Boston music. The premier orch tra of America ended its season l spring with a finale worthy of Elizabeth melodrama. Out of the situation has developed a beauti orchestra, one that in finesses, its del of tone, its lovely euphony equals a orchestra heard in Boston since days when the great taskmaster, W helm Gericke, drilled our musicians.

It is not permissible for a revie to review the playing of an orches before it gives its first public perfor ances—even if he has tiptoed into back of the hall to spend an h hearing a master hand prepare a l vel work . It is not permissible e to hint that the orchestra in quality tone, in continuity of tone and in b ance of tone will surprise its audit Therefore please consider these thi unsaid.

When you attend the opening c cert you will notice many changes the grouping of the various choirs the orchestra. The harps, once at t front of the sage, are now half w back behind the first violins. T woods winds are arranged in straig lines, not grouped. Dr. Muck us to put the clarinets in one little group. the oboll in another, the flutes and piccolos in another and so on. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the first concerts, put them in straight lines. Changes in the brasses and percussion instruments are minor and the cellos and bass viols keep their old position.

"I think you will like thetone produced by this new arrangement," said Mr. Monteax discussing the tone quality of the orchestra after rehearsal. "The harps, I think, should not be arranged in the old manner as if for harp concertos. Their tone is over emphasized and they distract attention. The new arrangement of the wood winds will give a commingling of tone that, I think, is very effective. Please notice, too, that I have pulled the orchestra together. The men sit nearer together than under the old regime. I don't want the orchestra to feel that I am in one hemisphere, they in another. Did you not think the arrangement effective?"

When I told Mr. Monteux that I considered the tone both in quality and balance superlatively fine that his accomplishment in a comparatively short time was indeed wonderful he was obviously gratified.

"We have worked hard, the symphony men and I, and I think I can say that your concertgoers will find that the men, whom I have been given to work with, make a superb orchestra. The newcomers, I think, in every case, are far better than their predecessors." Then Mr. Monteux discussed the peculiar abilities of this player and that who substituted for some old player, pointing out in each case the man's superiority, as he had discovered it.

"It took some time for us to understand each other," continued the conductor, "You know we Frenchmen have our own style of conducting. We have an exactness that is —er, er— exact. They had to know me, I had to know them. I think we are succeeding."

This last was said with the utmost modesty. The men got to know Mr. Monteux very quickly. A man working at any trade knows the master of his trade instinctively. Watching Mr. Monteux 10 minutes anyone who has ever played in an orchestra becomes perfectly confident he kuows just what he wants and how he wants to get it. Nothing escapes him. A woodwind instrument skipped a note. Mr. Monteau "didn't hear it". A phrase was not given with just the right color, just the right curve. It was repeated after instruction and repeated correctly. There are no signals recalled.

"This," you may say, is the man's job. He is doing only what he should do. "Yes, it is his job, every conductor's job yet great conductors are rare birds and there is not one in 500 who can work as quickly and successfully with an orchestra as Mr. Monteux. Everything is by comparison. I have seen conductors, reputed as great conductors, make more effort over the rehearsing of some chestnut like "Trovatore" than Mr. Monteux made over conducting a Ravel work, that is new in his harmony, that demands almost a new comprehension from the players.

Mr. Monteux has a great orchestra with which to work. His programs are interesting. For his first he has chosen two old favorites, the Symphony in D minor by Franck and Schumann's "Manfred" overture. The Schuamann work shows he has no narrow prejudices which makes him overlook the music of Germany of the classical and romantic periods. For modern French works he has chosen Debussy's "Iberia" and Dukas' "La Peri". He explained very naively that he did not want us Bostonians to know Dukas only through the "Sorcerer Apprentice". He hoped later to play a Rabaud work but the curtailment of performances prevented this. "Mr. Rabaud, "he said," will probably play this for you. I hope so. You are going to like Mr. Rabaud, your permanent conductor. He is a very fine man, very 'precis', very much a gentleman. You will find him most interesting as a conductor and delightful to know.

"How refreshing to talk music for an hour with a man, whose work had just revealed him a master, and who almost excluded the personal pronoun from the conversation and who spoke in glowing and unaffected terms of his successor."

'STON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR FOR FIRST CONCERTS

PIERRE MONTEUX

Paris point- ductor 'a are They show that in art as in so many other matters there is a growing feeling of harmony and accord among the Allies of the Entente. It is eminently desirable that those who have fought and striven together for the greatest political and moral ideals and principles should learn to know and to value aright the artistic ideals and achievments of one another. The idea of the intellectual supremacy of Germany had been insidiously forced upon the world over a long period of years, and in no field was this more notable than in that of music. The result was that the music of other nations as well as of our own composers was largely scorned and neglected, and programmes were mainly made up of the works of Teuton composers, rendered by Teuton artists.

Without wishing unduly to depreciate the value of Germany's gifts to the world of music, we can, for some time at any rate, dispense with those gifts. He would be stupid and narrow indeed and wholly lacking in musical appreciation who attempted to belittle the noble compositions of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart and some of their successors. And those musical conductors who still include in their programmes a few of the German classics can do so without offence. But it was high time that the pronouncedly Teutonic elements were omitted from our operatic and concert stages, even at the sacrifice of Wagner, who typifies so many objectionable German ideals, while as for Richard Strauss the less that is heard now and in the future of the excessively polyphonic and often vilely discordant strains of that arrogant Prussian the better. Long ago he eliminated the elements of beauty and humanity from his music and merely typified in his strains Teuton materialistic philosophy, harshness and sheer brutality.

We can also dispense with the sentimental lieder of Germany, because we have learned to know that German sentimentalism is of the sort which weeps over a dead canary while it plans holocaust and massacres before which the horrors of a Nero pale. It is no narrowness, then, which has eliminated German music and German artists from our programmes. Experience has taught us with regard to the latter that they have too often used their art and the influence it has given them as a means of propaganda and conspiracy against the country which has sheltered them and filled their purses. We can derive the utmost pleasure and profit by turning to the music and the musicians of our Allies and also, be it not forgotten, by giving every possible encouragement to native composers and musicians, whose neglect in the past has been largely due to the scorn with which they were greeted and treated by musicians and critics of Teutonic origin and sympathies.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL BE HERE NOV. 19

First of Series of Five Concerts to be Given in Infantry Hall

Following what may be considered a radical re-organization which has taken place since last spring, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announcing a series of five concerts in Providence which will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings of November 19, December 17, January 21, March 11 and April 8.

Notices will shortly be sent to all those who subscribed for last year's concerts, giving them the opportunity to retain the seats they had engaged for last year. This privilege will be theirs up to Saturday, October 26th. On Monday, November 4th, all unclaimed seats will be put on sale for the season at Seddon's News Stand, Butler Exchange building.

It is good news to the musical blic of Providence that Boston's eat orchestra is returning to reme its Providence concerts. The chestra first came to Providence in e second year of its existence and ver missed a season here until t year, when it gave but one con- t—the first of the series.

In a sense, the orchestra this year beginning a new epoch in its hisy, although essentially it remains at it has been for a generation— e greatest artistic possession of s country. Since last spring, ry L. Higginson, its founder and intainer, has retired definitely d his place has been taken by a rd of trustees composed of nine ding men of Boston who have aldy given evidence of their keen desire to maintain the orchestra at its former standards. Charles A. Ellis, from its beginning the manager of the orchestra, has also retired, and his place has been taken by W. H. Brennan, who for the past nine years has been business manager of the orchestra.

Great changes have been made in the makeup of the orchestra. For the first time in its history it will have a Frenchman as a conductor. Henri Rabaud, who has been selected for the post, is expected to arrive in Boston the end of this month, and he will conduct the first concert here in Providence. Mr. Rabaud is not only one of the great conductors of France, but he is one of France's most distinguished composers, and the orchestra and its friends must deem themselves most fortunate in having found such a solution for the difficult problem of a conductor.

As to the personnel of the orchestra, the changes affect fully 25 per cent. Most of these changes are due to the fact that all subjects of the German Empire have been dropped from its rolls. The draft also has taken several of the young men. These vacancies have been filled in a most satisfactory manner. The orchestra has now been rehearsing in Boston under Pierre Monteux, who will be its conductor until the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, and the general feeling of those who have heard it is that it is even a finer orchestra than it has been in the past.

The soloists who will appear at the different concerts make an interesting list. They comprise two singers, two pianists and a violinist. The singers are Merle Alcock and Arthur Hackett. Merle Alcock is a most remarkable American contralto, while Arthur Hackett is easily the foremost concert tenor of to-day. The pianists are Harold Bauer and Rosita Renard. Harold Bauer is a favorite of many years' standing here in Providence, while Miss Renard, a newcomer, brings with her a reputation of being an artist of very unusual gifts. She is a Chilean by nationality. The violinist will be Frederic Fradkin, the American violin virtuoso, who is the new concertmaster of the orchestra.

PRESS

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, this city, during the coming Winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last Spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees, composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music, on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

Notices of renewals of subscriptions have been sent to all of last year's subscribers to the Symphony Orchestra, and the response has been immediate and gratifying. Subscribers to last year's concerts are given until October 15 in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday morning, October 21, 1119 Chestnut Street. The soloists announced for the season are: Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin, the distinguished violinist, who is now the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

EVENING TELEGRAM

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 8 1918

A FRENCH MUSICAL STIMULANT

WITHOUT reopening the vexed question of the wartime status of German music, the Boston Symphony's compliment to France in selecting Henri Rabaud as successor to Dr. Karl Muck may be safely applauded as a step indicative of both patriotic wisdom and artistic discernment.

In contemporary musical thought the position of France is conspicuously high. There have been commentators who have called the innovations of D'Indy, Debussy, Charpentier, Dukas and Leroux startling. Nonetheless, their influence on symphonic and operatic production in all countries has been profound. Puccini and more particularly Montemezzi have responded to it in Italy, Granados in Spain, Scriabin in Russia and even some of the "advanced" composers in Germany.

With traditional conservatism, however, the Boston Symphony will introduce personally to America perhaps the least rigidly revolutionary figure of a highly interesting coterie of musicians. Rabaud is primarily an eclectic. His symphonies, of which the spirited, colorful and frankly tuneful No. 2 is familiar to Philadelphia Orchestra patrons, stems from Brahms and Tschaikowsky, seasoned with Liszt and Cesar Franck, with the inevitable soupcon of Debussy. They are respectful of the classical form.

On the other hand, his most successful opera, "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo," has the unmistakable flavor of modernity. It shies at set arias and undergoes its richest musical expansion in passages of descriptive accompaniment. The work was, on the whole, favorably received in New York last winter. The libretto is derived from one of the most delicious of the Arabian Nights tales.

It is as a conductor, however, that M. Rabaud has won signal honors, unshadowed by such arguments as his variability of style has provoked. Of recent years he has directed the orchestra at the Academie de Musique, familiarly known as the Paris Opera House, where his talents raised the whole organization to a new and somewhat rare point of excellence. Before Rabaud, the orchestra at the national institution was rather generously rated adequate. Under him it became the outstanding artistic feature of the performances.

He is a Parisian by musical education and activities, as well as by birth, having been born in the French capital in 1873. In addition to the works already mentioned, he has composed two other operas, "La Fille de Roland" and "Par le Glaive"; a symphonic poem, "Le Procession Nocturne," one other symphony and an oratorio job. His presence at the conductor's desk of the Boston Symphony will unquestionably act as a stimulant to American musical development. Acquaintance with a wider range of French music, will

n REPUBLICAN

dress Springfield, Ma

ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER

Henri Rabaud, French Conductor and Composer, Accepts Engagement

Special Dispatch to The Republican

BOSTON, Friday, October 4

The trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra. A cablegram received from the French ministry of fine arts this morning stated that Mr Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The ministry of fine arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boton symphony orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan opera house last season was his opera, "Marouf." His "Second Symphony" is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand opera in Paris under Messager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris conservatory, where he studied composition with Massenet and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York Saturday afternoon, November 9, and Mr Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr Rabaud's being able to get here in time to prepare the programs for the important out-of-town concerts of the orchestra, the first week of November, Gatti Casazza courteously granted Mr Monteux leave of absence for one week and thus solved an embarrassing problem.

TELEGRAM

: New York City.

Dr. Muck's Successor to Bar German Music.—Headline. The hands of Mr. Rebaud should be upheld in this laudable resolve, but many will fear the worst in a community that is either scared or apathetic as regards suppression of the German press, the German language, German in the schools, German spies and German politicians of the Frederick Wusterbarth type.

tom EAGLE

ddress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, during the coming winter under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the Orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Brooklyn, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five Friday evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 8, December 6, January 10, February 7 and March 21.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist; Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, who is now concert master of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, Russian pianist.

RECORD, OCTOBER 19

MONTEUX WORKS WONDERS WITH NEW SYMPHONY

New Orchestra Will Amaze Music Lovers at First Concert Oct. 25

By J. V. CLARK

A week from this afternoon a new conductor will walk onto the stage at Symphony Hall and will face a partically new orchestra. The day will be an epoch-making one in the history of Boston music. The premier orchestra of America ended its season last spring with a finale worthy of an Elizabeth melodrama. Out of the old situation has developed a beautiful orchestra, one that in finesses, its delicy of tone, its lovely euphony equals any orchestra heard in Boston since the days when the great taskmaster, Wilhelm Gericke, drilled our musicians.

It is not permissible for a reviewer to review the playing of an orchestra before it gives its first public performances—even if he has tiptoed into the back of the hall to spend an hour hearing a master hand prepare a Ravel work . It is not permissible even to hint that the orchestra in quality o tone, in continuity of tone and in balance of tone will surprise its auditors Therefore please consider these things unsaid.

When you attend the opening concert you will notice many changes in the grouping of the various choirs of the orchestra. The harps, once at the front of the sage, are now half way back behind the first violins. The woods winds are arranged in straight lines, not grouped. Dr. Muck used to put the clarinets in one little group. the oboll in another, the flutes and piccolos in another and so on. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the first concerts, put them in straight lines. Changes in the brasses and percussion instruments are minor and the cellos and bass viols keep their old position.

"I think you will like thetone produced by this new arrangement," said Mr. Monteax discussing the tone quality of the orchestra after rehearsal. "The harps, I think, should not be arranged in the old manner as if for harp concertos. Their tone is over emphasized and they distract attention. The new arrangement of the wood winds will give a commingling of tone that, I think, is very effective. Please notice, too, that I have pulled the orchestra together. The men sit nearer together than under the old regime. I don't want the orchestra to feel that I am in one hemisphere, they in another. Did you not think the arrangement effective?"

When I told Mr. Monteux that I considered the tone both in quality and balance superlatively fine that his accomplishment in a comparatively short time was indeed wonderful he was obviously gratified.

"We have worked hard, the symphony men and I, and I think I can say that your concertgoers will find that the men, whom I have been given to work with, make a superb orchestra. The newcomers, I think, in every case, are far better than their predecessors." Then Mr. Monteux discussed the peculiar abilities of this player and that who substituted for some old player, pointing out in each case the man's superiority, as he had discovered it.

"It took some time for us to understand each other," continued the conductor, "You know we Frenchmen have our own style of conducting. We have an exactness that is —er, er— exact. They had to know me, I had to know them. I think we are succeeding."

This last was said with the utmost modesty. The men got to know Mr. Monteux very quickly. A man working at any trade knows the master of his trade instinctively. Watching Mr. Monteux 10 minutes anyone who has ever played in an orchestra becomes perfectly confident he kuows just what he wants and how he wants to get it. Nothing escapes him. A woodwind instrument skipped a note. Mr. Monteau "didn't hear it". A phrase was not given with just the right color, just the right curve. It was repeated after instruction and repeated correctly. There are no signals recalled.

"This," you may say, is the man's job. He is doing only what he should do. "Yes, it is his job, every conductor's job yet great conductors are rare birds and there is not one in 500 who can work as quickly and successfully with an orchestra as Mr. Monteux. Everything is by comparison. I have seen conductors, reputed as great conductors, make more effort over the rehearsing of some chestnut like "Trovatore" than Mr. Monteux made over conducting a Ravel work, that is new in his harmony, that demands almost a new comprehension from the players.

Mr. Monteux has a great orchestra with which to work. His programs are interesting. For his first he has chosen two old favorites, the Symphony in D minor by Franck and Schumann's "Manfred" overture. The Schuamann work shows he has no narrow prejudices which makes him overlook the music of Germany of the classical and romantic periods. For modern French works he has chosen Debussy's "Iberia" and Dukas' "La Peri". He explained very naively that he did not want us Bostonians to know Dukas only through the "Sorcerer Apprentice". He hoped later to play a Rabaud work but the curtailment of performances prevented this. "Mr. Rabaud,

HERALD

New York City

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

Music and the War.

The arrival of the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory of Music and the appointment of Mr. Henri Raubaud as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are matters of international significance. They show that in art as in so many other matters there is a growing feeling of harmony and accord among the Allies of the Entente. It is eminently desirable that those who have fought and striven together for the greatest political and moral ideals and principles should learn to know and to value aright the artistic ideals and achievments of one another. The idea of the intellectual supremacy of Germany had been insidiously forced upon the world over a long period of years, and in no field was this more notable than in that of music. The result was that the music of other nations as well as of our own composers was largely scorned and neglected, and programmes were mainly made up of the works of Teuton composers, rendered by Teuton artists.

Without wishing unduly to depreciate the value of Germany's gifts to the world of music, we can, for some time at any rate, dispense with those gifts. He would be stupid and narrow indeed and wholly lacking in musical appreciation who attempted to belittle the noble compositions of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart and some of their successors. And those musical conductors who still include in their programmes a few of the German classics can do so without offence. But it was high time that the pronouncedly Teutonic elements were omitted from our operatic and concert stages, even at the sacrifice of Wagner, who typifies so many objectionable German ideals, while as for Richard Strauss the less that is heard now and in the future of the excessively polyphonic and often vilely discordant strains of that arrogant Prussian the better. Long ago he eliminated the elements of beauty and humanity from his music and merely typified in his strains Teuton materialistic philosophy, harshness and sheer brutality.

We can also dispense with the sentimental lieder of Germany, because we have learned to know that German sentimentalism is of the sort which weeps over a dead canary while it plans holocaust and massacres before which the horrors of a Nero pale. It is no narrowness, then, which has eliminated German music and German artists from our programmes. Experience has taught us with regard to the latter that they have too often used their art and the influence it has given them as a means of propaganda and conspiracy against the country which has sheltered them and filled their purses. We can derive the utmost pleasure and profit by turning to the music and the musicians of our Allies and also, be it not forgotten, by giving every possible encouragement to native composers and musicians, whose neglect in the past has been largely due to the scorn with which they were greeted and treated by musicians and critics of Teutonic origin and sympathies.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL BE HERE NOV. 19

First of Series of Five Concerts to be Given in Infantry Hall

Following what may be considered a radical re-organization which has taken place since last spring, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announcing a series of five concerts in Providence which will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings of November 19, December 17, January 21, March 11 and April 8.

Notices will shortly be sent to all those who subscribed for last year's concerts, giving them the opportunity to retain the seats they had engaged for last year. This privilege will be theirs up to Saturday, October 26th. On Monday, November 4th, all unclaimed seats will be put on sale for the season at Seddon's News Stand, Butler Exchange building.

It is good news to the musical blic of Providence that Boston's eat orchestra is returning to reme its Providence concerts. The chestra first came to Providence in e second year of its existence and ver missed a season here until t year, when it gave but one con—the first of the series.

In a sense, the orchestra this year beginning a new epoch in its hisy, although essentially it remains at it has been for a generation— greatest artistic possession of s country. Since last spring, ary L. Higginson, its founder and intainer, has retired definitely d his place has been taken by a ard of trustees composed of nine ding men of Boston who have aldy given evidence of their keen desire to maintain the orchestra at its former standards. Charles A. Ellis, from its beginning the manager of the orchestra, has also retired, and his place has been taken by W. H. Brennan, who for the past nine years has been business manager of the orchestra.

Great changes have been made in the makeup of the orchestra. For the first time in its history it will have a Frenchman as a conductor. Henri Rabaud, who has been selected for the post, is expected to arrive in Boston the end of this month, and he will conduct the first concert here in Providence. Mr. Rabaud is not only one of the great conductors of France, but he is one of France's most distinguished composers, and the orchestra and its friends must deem themselves most fortunate in having found such a solution for the difficult problem of a conductor.

As to the personnel of the orchestra, the changes affect fully 25 per cent. Most of these changes are due to the fact that all subjects of the German Empire have been dropped from its rolls. The draft also has taken several of the young men. These vacancies have been filled in a most satisfactory manner. The orchestra has now been rehearsing in Boston under Pierre Monteux, who will be its conductor until the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, and the general feeling of those who have heard it is that it is even a finer orchestra than it has been in the past.

The soloists who will appear at the different concerts make an interesting list. They comprise two singers, two pianists and a violinist. The singers are Merle Alcock and Arthur Hackett. Merle Alcock is a most remarkable American contralto, while Arthur Hackett is easily the foremost concert tenor of to-day. The pianists are Harold Bauer and Rosita Renard. Harold Bauer is a favorite of many years' standing here in Providence, while Miss Renard, a newcomer, brings with her a reputation of being an artist of very unusual gifts. She is a Chilean by nationality. The violinist will be Fredric Fradkin, the American violin virtuoso, who is the new concertmaster of the orchestra.

PRESS

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, this city, during the coming Winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last Spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees, composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music, on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

Notices of renewals of subscriptions have been sent to all of last year's subscribers to the Symphony Orchestra, and the response has been immediate and gratifying. Subscribers to last year's concerts are given until October 15 in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday morning, October 21, 1119 Chestnut Street. The soloists announced for the season are: Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin, the distinguished violinist, who is now the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

EVENING TELEGRAM

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 8 1918

A FRENCH MUSICAL STIMULANT

WITHOUT reopening the vexed question of the wartime status of German music, the Boston Symphony's compliment to France in selecting Henri Rabaud as successor to Dr. Karl Muck may be safely applauded as a step indicative of both patriotic wisdom and artistic discernment.

In contemporary musical thought the position of France is conspicuously high. There have been commentators who have called the innovations of D'Indy, Debussy, Charpentier, Dukas and Leroux startling. Nonetheless, their influence on symphonic and operatic production in all countries has been profound. Puccini and more particularly Montemezzi have responded to it in Italy, Granados in Spain, Scriabin in Russia and even some of the "advanced" composers in Germany.

With traditional conservatism, however, the Boston Symphony will introduce personally to America perhaps the least rigidly revolutionary figure of a highly interesting coterie of musicians. Rabaud is primarily an eclectic. His symphonies, of which the spirited, colorful and frankly tuneful No. 2 is familiar to Philadelphia Orchestra patrons, stems from Brahms and Tschaikowsky, seasoned with Liszt and Cesar Franck, with the inevitable soupcon of Debussy. They are respectful of the classical form.

On the other hand, his most successful opera, "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo," has the unmistakable flavor of modernity. It shies at set arias and undergoes its richest musical expansion in passages of descriptive accompaniment. The work was, on the whole, favorably received in New York last winter. The libretto is derived from one of the most delicious of the Arabian Nights tales.

It is as a conductor, however, that M. Rabaud has won signal honors, unshadowed by such arguments as his variability of style has provoked. Of recent years he has directed the orchestra at the Academie de Musique, familiarly known as the Paris Opera House, where his talents raised the whole organization to a new and somewhat rare point of excellence. Before Rabaud, the orchestra at the national institution was rather generously rated adequate. Under him it became the outstanding artistic feature of the performances.

He is a Parisian by musical education and activities, as well as by birth, having been born in the French capital in 1873. In addition to the works already mentioned, he has composed two other operas, "La Fille de Roland" and "Par le Glaive"; a symphonic poem, "Le Procession Nocturne," one other symphony and an oratorio job. His presence at the conductor's desk of the Boston Symphony will unquestionably act as a stimulant to American musical development. Acquaintance with a wider range of French music, will

n REPUBLICAN

dress Springfield, Ma

te

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER

Henri Rabaud, French Conductor and Composer, Accepts Engagement

Special Dispatch to The Republican

BOSTON, Friday, October 4

The trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra. A cablegram received from the French ministry of fine arts this morning stated that Mr Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The ministry of fine arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boton symphony orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan opera house last season was his opera, "Marouf." His "Second Symphony" is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand opera in Paris under Messager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris conservatory, where he studied composition with Massenet and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York Saturday afternoon, November 9, and Mr Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr Rabaud's being able to get here in time to prepare the programs for the important out-of-town concerts of the orchestra, the first week of November, Gatti Casazza courteously granted Mr Monteux leave of absence for one week and thus solved an embarrassing problem.

TELEGRAM

: New York City.

Dr. Muck's Successor to Bar German Music.—Headline. The hands of Mr. Rebaud should be upheld in this laudable resolve, but many will fear the worst in a community that is either scared or apathetic as regards suppression of the German press, the German language, German in the schools, German spies and German politicians of the Frederick Wusterbarth type.

rom EAGLE

ddress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

te

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, during the coming winter under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the Orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Brooklyn, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five Friday evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 8, December 6, January 10, February 7 and March 21.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist; Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, who is now concert master of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, Russian pianist.

RECORD, OCTOBER 18

MONTEUX WORKS WONDERS WITH NEW SYMPHONY

New Orchestra Will Amaze Music Lovers at First Concert Oct. 25

By J. V. CLARK

A week from this afternoon a new conductor will walk onto the stage at Symphony Hall and will face a partically new orchestra. The day will be an epoch-making one in the history of Boston music. The premier orchestra of America ended its season last spring with a finale worthy of an Elizabeth melodrama. Out of the old situation has developed a beautiful orchestra, one that in finesses, its delicy of tone, its lovely euphony equals any orchestra heard in Boston since the days when the great taskmaster, Wilhelm Gericke, drilled our musicians.

It is not permissible for a reviewer to review the playing of an orchestra before it gives its first public performances—even if he has tiptoed into the back of the hall to spend an hour hearing a master hand prepare a Ravel work . It is not permissible even to hint that the orchestra in quality of tone, in continuity of tone and in balance of tone will surprise its auditors. Therefore please consider these things unsaid.

When you attend the opening concert you will notice many changes in the grouping of the various choirs of the orchestra. The harps, once at the front of the sage, are now half way back behind the first violins. The woods winds are arranged in straight lines, not grouped. Dr. Muck used to put the clarinets in one little group. the oboll in another, the flutes and piccolos in another and so on. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the first concerts, put them in straight lines. Changes in the brasses and percussion instruments are minor and the cellos and bass viols keep their old position.

"I think you will like thetone produced by this new arrangement," said Mr. Monteax discussing the tone quality of the orchestra after rehearsal. "The harps, I think, should not be arranged in the old manner as if for harp concertos. Their tone is over emphasized and they distract attention. The new arrangement of the wood winds will give a commingling of tone that, I think, is very effective. Please notice, too, that I have pulled the orchestra together. The men sit nearer together than under the old regime. I don't want the orchestra to feel that I am in one hemisphere, they in another. Did you not think the arrangement effective?"

When I told Mr. Monteux that I considered the tone both in quality and balance superlatively fine that his accomplishment in a comparatively short time was indeed wonderful he was obviously gratified.

"We have worked hard, the symphony men and I, and I think I can say that your concertgoers will find that the men, whom I have been given to work with, make a superb orchestra. The newcomers, I think, in every case, are far better than their predecessors." Then Mr. Monteux discussed the peculiar abilities of this player and that who substituted for some old player, pointing out in each case the man's superiority, as he had discovered it.

"It took some time for us to understand each other," continued the conductor, "You know we Frenchmen have our own style of conducting. We have an exactness that is —er, er— exact. They had to know me, I had to know them. I think we are succeeding."

This last was said with the utmost modesty. The men got to know Mr. Monteux very quickly. A man working at any trade knows the master of his trade instinctively. Watching Mr. Monteux 10 minutes anyone who has ever played in an orchestra becomes perfectly confident he kuows just what he wants and how he wants to get it. Nothing escapes him. A woodwind instrument skipped a note. Mr. Monteau "didn't hear it". A phrase was not given with just the right color, just the right curve. It was repeated after instruction and repeated correctly. There are no signals recalled.

"This," you may say, is the man's job. He is doing only what he should do. "Yes, it is his job, every conductor's job yet great conductors are rare birds and there is not one in 500 who can work as quickly and successfully with an orchestra as Mr. Monteux. Everything is by comparison. I have seen conductors, reputed as great conductors, make more effort over the rehearsing of some chestnut like "Trovatore" than Mr. Monteux made over conducting a Ravel work, that is new in his harmony, that demands almost a new comprehension from the players.

Mr. Monteux has a great orchestra with which to work. His programs are interesting. For his first he has chosen two old favorites, the Symphony in D minor by Franck and Schumann's "Manfred" overture. The Schuamann work shows he has no narrow prejudices which makes him overlook the music of Germany of the classical and romantic periods. For modern French works he has chosen Debussy's "Iberia" and Dukas' "La Peri". He explained very naively that he did not want us Bostonians to know Dukas only through the "Sorcerer Apprentice". He hoped later to play a Rabaud work but the curtailment of performances prevented this. "Mr. Rabaud,

---

Today's Business Epigram

Interested in Making Business

Here's no other form of fun that equals hard work.

What does this mean to YOU?

HERALD

New York City

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

Music and the War.

The arrival of the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory of Music and the appointment of Mr. Henri Raubaud as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are matters of international significance. They show that in art as in so many other matters there is a growing feeling of harmony and accord among the Allies of the Entente. It is eminently desirable that those who have fought and striven together for the greatest political and moral ideals and principles should learn to know and to value aright the artistic ideals and achievments of one another. The idea of the intellectual supremacy of Germany had been insidiously forced upon the world over a long period of years, and in no field was this more notable than in that of music. The result was that the music of other nations as well as of our own composers was largely scorned and neglected, and programmes were mainly made up of the works of Teuton composers, rendered by Teuton artists.

Without wishing unduly to depreciate the value of Germany's gifts to the world of music, we can, for some time at any rate, dispense with those gifts. He would be stupid and narrow indeed and wholly lacking in musical appreciation who attempted to belittle the noble compositions of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart and some of their successors. And those musical conductors who still include in their programmes a few of the German classics can do so without offence. But it was high time that the pronouncedly Teutonic elements were omitted from our operatic and concert stages, even at the sacrifice of Wagner, who typifies so many objectionable German ideals, while as for Richard Strauss the less that is heard now and in the future of the excessively polyphonic and often vilely discordant strains of that arrogant Prussian the better. Long ago he eliminated the elements of beauty and humanity from his music and merely typified in his strains Teuton materialistic philosophy, harshness and sheer brutality.

We can also dispense with the sentimental lieder of Germany, because we have learned to know that German sentimentalism is of the sort which weeps over a dead canary while it plans holocaust and massacres before which the horrors of a Nero pale. It is no narrowness, then, which has eliminated German music and German artists from our programmes. Experience has taught us with regard to the latter that they have too often used their art and the influence it has given them as a means of propaganda and conspiracy against the country which has sheltered them and filled their purses. We can derive the utmost pleasure and profit by turning to the music and the musicians of our Allies and also, be it not forgotten, by giving every possible encouragement to native composers and musicians, whose neglect in the past has been largely due to the scorn with which they were greeted and treated by musicians and critics of Teutonic origin and sympathies.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

ON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL BE HERE NOV. 19

First of Series of Five Concerts to be Given in Infantry Hall

Following what may be considered a radical re-organization which has taken place since last spring, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announcing a series of five concerts in Providence which will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings of November 19, December 17, January 21, March 11 and April 8.

Notices will shortly be sent to all those who subscribed for last year's concerts, giving them the opportunity to retain the seats they had engaged for last year. This privilege will be theirs up to Saturday, October 26th. On Monday, November 4th, all unclaimed seats will be put on sale for the season at Seddon's News Stand, Butler Exchange building.

It is good news to the musical public of Providence that Boston's great orchestra is returning to resume its Providence concerts. The orchestra first came to Providence in the second year of its existence and never missed a season here until last year, when it gave but one concert—the first of the series.

In a sense, the orchestra this year is beginning a new epoch in its history, although essentially it remains what it has been for a generation—the greatest artistic possession of this country. Since last spring, Henry L. Higginson, its founder and maintainer, has retired definitely and his place has been taken by a board of trustees composed of nine leading men of Boston who have already given evidence of their keen desire to maintain the orchestra at its former standards. Charles A. Ellis, from its beginning the manager of the orchestra, has also retired, and his place has been taken by W. H. Brennan, who for the past nine years has been business manager of the orchestra.

Great changes have been made in the makeup of the orchestra. For the first time in its history it will have a Frenchman as a conductor. Henri Rabaud, who has been selected for the post, is expected to arrive in Boston the end of this month, and he will conduct the first concert here in Providence. Mr. Rabaud is not only one of the great conductors of France, but he is one of France's most distinguished composers, and the orchestra and its friends must deem themselves most fortunate in having found such a solution for the difficult problem of a conductor.

As to the personnel of the orchestra, the changes affect fully 25 per cent. Most of these changes are due to the fact that all subjects of the German Empire have been dropped from its rolls. The draft also has taken several of the young men. These vacancies have been filled in a most satisfactory manner. The orchestra has now been rehearsing in Boston under Pierre Monteux, who will be its conductor until the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, and the general feeling of those who have heard it is that it is even a finer orchestra than it has been in the past.

The soloists who will appear at the different concerts make an interesting list. They comprise two singers, two pianists and a violinist. The singers are Merle Alcock and Arthur Hackett. Merle Alcock is a most remarkable American contralto, while Arthur Hackett is easily the foremost concert tenor of to-day. The pianists are Harold Bauer and Rosita Renard. Harold Bauer is a favorite of many years' standing here in Providence, while Miss Renard, a newcomer, brings with her a reputation of being an artist of very unusual gifts. She is a Chilean by nationality. The violinist will be Frederic Fradkin, the American violin virtuoso, who is the new concertmaster of the orchestra.

PRESS

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, this city, during the coming Winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last Spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees, composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music, on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

Notices of renewals of subscriptions have been sent to all of last year's subscribers to the Symphony Orchestra, and the response has been immediate and gratifying. Subscribers to last year's concerts are given until October 15 in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday morning, October 21, 1119 Chestnut Street. The soloists announced for the season are: Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin, the distinguished violinist, who is now the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

EVENING TELEGRAM

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 8 1918

A FRENCH MUSICAL STIMULANT

WITHOUT reopening the vexed question of the wartime status of German music, the Boston Symphony's compliment to France in selecting Henri Rabaud as successor to Dr. Karl Muck may be safely applauded as a step indicative of both patriotic wisdom and artistic discernment.

In contemporary musical thought the position of France is conspicuously high. There have been commentators who have called the innovations of D'Indy, Debussy, Charpentier, Dukas and Leroux startling. Nonetheless, their influence on symphonic and operatic production in all countries has been profound. Puccini and more particularly Montemezzi have responded to it in Italy, Granados in Spain, Scriabin in Russia and even some of the "advanced" composers in Germany.

With traditional conservatism, however, the Boston Symphony will introduce personally to America perhaps the least rigidly revolutionary figure of a highly interesting coterie of musicians. Rabaud is primarily an eclectic. His symphonies, of which the spirited, colorful and frankly tuneful No. 2 is familiar to Philadelphia Orchestra patrons, stems from Brahms and Tschaikowsky, seasoned with Liszt and Cesar Franck, with the inevitable soupcon of Debussy. They are respectful of the classical form.

On the other hand, his most successful opera, "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo," has the unmistakable flavor of modernity. It shies at set arias and undergoes its richest musical expansion in passages of descriptive accompaniment. The work was, on the whole, favorably received in New York last winter. The libretto is derived from one of the most delicious of the Arabian Nights tales.

It is as a conductor, however, that M. Rabaud has won signal honors, unshadowed by such arguments as his variability of style has provoked. Of recent years he has directed the orchestra at the Academie de Musique, familiarly known as the Paris Opera House, where his talents raised the whole organization to a new and somewhat rare point of excellence. Before Rabaud, the orchestra at the national institution was rather generously rated adequate. Under him it became the outstanding artistic feature of the performances.

He is a Parisian by musical education and activities, as well as by birth, having been born in the French capital in 1873. In addition to the works already mentioned, he has composed two other operas, "La Fille de Roland" and "Par le Glaive"; a symphonic poem, "Le Procession Nocturne," one other symphony and an oratorio job. His presence at the conductor's desk of the Boston Symphony will unquestionably act as a stimulant to American musical development. Acquaintance with a wider range of French music will

---

n REPUBLICAN

dress Springfield, Ma

te

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER

Henri Rabaud, French Conductor and Composer, Accepts Engagement

Special Dispatch to The Republican

BOSTON, Friday, October 4

The trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra announced to-day that Henri Rabaud, one of the most eminent of French conductors and composers, had been engaged to be permanent conductor of the symphony orchestra. A cablegram received from the French ministry of fine arts this morning stated that Mr Rabaud accepted the engagement and would sail as soon as possible for this country. The ministry of fine arts also expressed its appreciation that the Boton symphony orchestra had chosen the distinguished Frenchman as its conductor.

Rabaud is best known in this country as a composer. One of the principal novelties at the Metropolitan opera house last season was his opera, "Marouf." His "Second Symphony" is a standard work in orchestral repertoire. He has written much for opera and for orchestra. At present he is the principal conductor at the Grand opera in Paris under Messager. This post he has filled for seven years. He is a graduate of the Paris conservatory, where he studied composition with Massenet and in 1894 he won the Prix de Rome.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first southern trip, which will end with its second concert in New York Saturday afternoon, November 9, and Mr Rabaud will take charge of the orchestra immediately on its return to Boston. Owing to doubt of Mr Rabaud's being able to get here in time to prepare the programs for the important out-of-town concerts of the orchestra, the first week of November, Gatti Casazza courteously granted Mr Monteux leave of absence for one week and thus solved an embarrassing problem.

TELEGRAM

: New York City.

Dr. Muck's Successor to Bar German Music.—Headline. The hands of Mr. Rebaud should be upheld in this laudable resolve, but many will fear the worst in a community that is either scared or apathetic as regards suppression of the German press, the German language, German in the schools, German spies and German politicians of the Frederick Wusterbarth type.

---

om EAGLE

ddress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

te

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, during the coming winter under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the Orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Brooklyn, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five Friday evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 8, December 6, January 10, February 7 and March 21.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist; Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, who is now concert master of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, Russian pianist.

rom MORNING TELEGRAPH
ddress: New York City
ate OCT 13 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its plans for the series of concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall during the coming Winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last Spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees, composed of prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions. Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The violin section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concerts in New York, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall. The evening concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6, and March 20.

STAR
n
dress Washington, D. C.
OCT 13 1918
e

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming winter, just announced, state that Henry L. Higginson retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs and the maintenance and government has been taken over by a board of nine trustees, prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represent a large number of others, thus assuring the orchestra's continuance.

Many changes have been made in the personnel. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section by Mr. Barrier, now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section by Edward Tak. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same.

The permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the French composer and conductor, who for seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Washington, will be under the direcion of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, through courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Cassazza.

The orchestra will give five afternoon concerts in the New National Theater, on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 3 and March 18.

Subscribers to last year's concerts are given until October 15 in which to renew subscriptons and retain the seats held last year. The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday, October 21, at Droop's music store, 13th and G streets.

The soloists for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Mettropolitan Opera Company; Mme. Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

m STAR
ress: New York City
OCT 1 6 1918

FRENCH DIRECTOR COMES

Henri Rabaud has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season. M. Rabaud is a French composer and musician of note. "Marouf," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House last Winter, was composed by him. He will sail from France immediately so as to be here early in November, when he will take charge of the orchestra.

In the meantime Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan, has been given leave of absence by Gatti-Casazza to conduct the orchestra on its Southern tour.

n REPUBLICAN
ress Springfield, Mass.
e OCT 6 1918

Early speculation as to the choice of a permanent conductor for the Boston symphony orchestra is proved to have been amiss, save in the detail that the successor to Dr Muck would in all probability be a Frenchman. Like some of those before him who have been invited to take this important post, he comes from the opera house rather than from a position at the head of a symphony orchestra; and, unlike most of them, he has made a mark as a composer. It is an interesting coincidence that one of his symphonies was performed at the Worcester music festival just a year ago. This, like the opera "Marouf," which New York heard last winter, was found to be a strong and interesting work, reasonably individual without being ultra-modern. M Rabaud, as seen in Paris at the opera and at concerts, is described by the Boston Transcript as "an unusual and pictorial figure, whether he was conductor or only intent listener, tall, gaunt, bearded, olive-skinned, grave of glance and quick of gesture, oriental rather than Parisian in impression to the eye." By every token the trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra have made a very happy selection. By training, talent and musicianly sincerity M Rabaud seems well qualified for the post.

m EVENING WORLD
dress: New York City.
te OCT 8 1918

Frederick Stock has resigned as conductor of the Chicago Orchestra pending his full admission to American citizenship. Meanwhile, Eric Lamater, a music critic as well as a musician, will lead the band. The vacancy in the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra caused by the internment as an enemy alien of Dr. Karl Muck has been filled by the appointment of Henri Rabaud, a French conductor, who is not a stranger here. Until he can arrive from France, Mr. Monteaux, Mr. Gatti's French conductor, will fill Mr. Rabaud's place. Some of us are wondering why Boston did not seize the opportunity to put an American in charge of its orchestra. Interesting is the announcement of the engagement by Cleofonte Campanini, director of the Chicago Opera Company, of Giorgio Polacco, of recent and gracious memory as conductor at the Metropolitan. Incidentally it may be m...

Mr. De Lamater has written the music for "The Betrothal," Maeterlinck's sequel to "The Blue Bird."

n BILLBOARD
ress: Cincinnati, Oh

RABAUD REPLACES MUCK

Boston, Oct. 5.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season of 1918-'19. This word was received today by the Symphony trustees in a cable message from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that M. Rabaud would reach Boston early in November. For the last five years M. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris and also has done much concert work. His engagement brings to an end negotiations in progress since last spring, when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

rom EVENING TELEGRAM
ddress Philadelphia, Pa.
ate OCT 12 1918

With many changes in the personnel and appearing with the newly appointed conductor, Henri Rabaud, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts here at the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. M. Rabaud, the new conductor, has been, during the past seven years, principal conductor of the Grand Opera in Paris. Since he will arrive in America late, the first concert in Philadelphia will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, will be the new concertmaster. The first 'cellist will be Joseph Milkin. The viola and second violin sections will be headed by M. Barrier and Edward Tax, respectively. In addition, several members of the French Military Band, now in America, will be added to the orchestra. Soloists at the concert here will be Florence Easton, soprano, of the Metropolitan forces; Madame Melba; Fredric Fradkin, the orchestra's concertmaster, and Arthur Rubenstein, the Russian pianist.

ss New York City
OCT 9 1918

THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Ever since Karl Muck's resignation the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been without a conductor. Unable to find a permanent conductor, it has engaged a temporary one in the person of Pierre Monteux. The change of name indicates that the Boston Orchestra is no longer to perpetuate the notion that only a Teuton can conduct symphony concerts—indeed, the names of Toscanini, Lamoureux, and Chevillard have already sufficiently proved the contrary.

While welcoming to his repertory classical German music, M. Monteux bans German music by living authors, also the music of Wagner, and for these reasons, as explained in an interview just published in the Boston "Herald:"

> I will do anything to help win the struggle, and if any one can convince me that the end will be brought nearer by giving up the classics of German music—Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms—I am willing to give them up. So far, however, I cannot see how the silencing of the music of these masters can do the least to help win the war, and it is my purpose (as it is the purpose, I am sure, of all French conductors) to give the great classics due place on concert programmes. Personally, I will not play Wagner, nor will I play the works of any living German or Austrian composer. . . . I will not play Wagner because of his attitude toward France in the war of '70-71. Moreover, looked at from another point of view, much of the best music that Wagner wrote—"The Ring" and "Die Meistersinger"—is in glorification of German ideals as found in the Kultur of to-day.

M. Monteux holds, reports the "Herald," that the music of the best German and Austrian composers of the past has become the property of the whole world and that this music is an integral and necessary part of the repertory of musicians. In reviewing the names of such composers, that of Beethoven probably springs quickest to the lips, and of him M. Monteux has to say that, at heart republican, Beethoven, if still living, would doubtless be against the war.

The French conductor then proceeded to pay his respects to Richard Strauss:

> I particularly specifically object to the performance of any music of Richard Strauss during the war.
>
> I believe I was the first one in this country to refuse to play the music of Strauss. That was two years ago, when I came to this country as conductor for the Ballet Russe. Arriving in New York, they told me that my first work was to superintend and direct the first performance in this country of the ballet founded on "Till Eulenspiegel," whereupon I informed the management that I would take the next ship back to France.
>
> It was my fortune in May, 1914, to prepare for Strauss the production in Paris of his ballet "Joseph." This was a little more than two months before the beginning of the war. Strauss's attitude toward France, French art, French music, and French musicians was even then unbearable. He was arrogant and insulting, and, even without war, I was almost persuaded to give up playing his music; but, in view of what followed, Strauss became impossible for me.

A contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company makes it impossible for M. Monteux to remain with the Boston Symphony throughout the entire coming season. This short conductorship, however, will doubtless awaken much interest and add to the high reputation of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

Nation
om
ddress New York City
ate OCT 5 1918

THE selection of M. Monteux, conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the month of October only, brings out anew the plight of that splendid body. As many as twenty-five members are said to have been dropped, a concert master was picked only the other day, and now the orchestra must enter upon its first season without Major Higginson at the helm and with but a temporary conductor; all this, too, with supersensitive patriots watching every move to see if the Americanization process is complete. Naturally, the orchestra is bound to suffer, however capable the new material. No temporary conductor, not even one with as excellent a reputation as M. Monteux, can, moreover, do much for the regeneration of the orchestra's morale in a month. Perhaps by the first of November the permanent leader will be found or M. Monteux will be appointed for the season. But for the first time in years this great organization will find itself in danger of being eclipsed by competitors. There is real tragedy in this situation, for few groups of orchestral artists have been so harmonious or have played together under such favorable circumstances for so many years with so few changes. No other American orchestra has quite come up to their standard because of their continuity of service, which in turn has been due to the security afforded by Major Higginson's private means and to the pension fund long established.

GLOBE OCTOBER 21

SERVICE AND LOAN FLAGS FOR SYMPHONY PLAYERS

A service flag for members of the Symphony Orchestra who are fighting for the Allies and a 100 percent honor flag for subscriptions to the Fourth Liberty Loan will be the principal ornaments of Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon at the season's first concert. The Symphony Orchestra and employes of the hall bought $15,150 worth of bonds, or an average of more than $100 for each individual.

The service flag contains 11 stars, which represent nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff. Three stars belong to France. In the orchestra this season there are seven veterans of the French service, not including Mr Monteux, who has had 25 months active service.

rom EVENING SUN
ddress: New York City
OCT 12 1918

Final Plans of Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony, after the long delay attendant upon its choice of a director, has now announced its plans for the coming season of concerts. As is already known the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the French composer and conductor who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Since Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concerts in New York, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall. The evening concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 20. The afternoon concerts fall on November 9, December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 22.

RECORD, OCTOBER 19.

GALLI-CURCI TO APPEAR HERE ONE WEEK FROM TODAY

Mudgett Signs Soprano for Recital—Notes of Music World

By J. V. CLARK

The raising of the influenza ban has started activities anew in the musical world. The Handel and Haydn, through its president, Courtney Guild, announces that the first rehearsal will be called tomorrow at 6 p. m. at Huntington Hall. "The Messia," "The Creation" and Verdi's "Requiem" wil be put in rehearsal.

The first important event of the musical season will be the opening of the Symphony series Friday afternoon. The reconstructed orchestra, Pierre Monteux temporary conductor, will play this program: Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas' ballet music "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia" Franck's Symphony, sceptically received by Boston when first offered by Mr. Gericke, has become a universal favorite. Dukas, known here almost as a man of one work, will get a first Boston hearing of "La Peri."

Mme. Galli-Curci will sing at Symphony Hall a week from today at a special afternoon recital. This was decided on only this morning. The Chicago Opera Co. has abandoned its preliminary western tour, and Mr. Mudgett quickly signed Mme. Galli-Curci for Boston. Her program will be announced in these columns later.

The first of the Sunday afternoon concerts will start at Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow. The artists will be Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. They will play two sonatas, Grieg in C minor, op. 45, and Franck in A major. Each artist will contribute shorter pieces. Jascha Heifetz will give a recital at Symphony Hall Sunday, Nov. 3. On Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, and Raoul Laparra, composer-pianist, will offer a joint recital at Symphony Hall. This recital is called "A Musical Journey Through Spain." Mr. Laparra is best known here as the composer of the opera "La Habanera," in which Maria Gay appeared with the Boston Opera Co. His "Musical Journey Through Spain" is described as a collection of minature tableaux, showing the wealth of variety which Spain offers musically.

Barrier, War Veteran, Symphony Soloist

Claude Barrier, war veteran and solo viola of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston yesterday from France.

A veteran of the war, he has been severely wounded and walks with a perceptible limp, having to use a cane. He went out at the first call in August, 1914, and was continually in the front line in the Champagne until September, 1915, when he was wounded in the thigh. Following his wound he spent 22 months in the hospital and then was discharged unfit for further military duty.

rom MORNING TELEGRAPH
ddress: New York City
ate

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its plans for the series of concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall during the coming Winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra, and through all its life maintained it, retired last Spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees, composed of prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions. Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The violin section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concerts in New York, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall. The evening concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6, and March 20.

n dress
te

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming winter, just announced, state that Henry L. Higginson retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs and the maintenance and government has been taken over by a board of nine trustees, prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represent a large number of others, thus assuring the orchestra's continuance.

Many changes have been made in the personnel. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section by Mr. Barrier, now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section by Edward Tak. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same.

The permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the French composer and conductor, who for seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Washington, will be under the direcion of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, through courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Cassazza.

The orchestra will give five afternoon concerts in the New National Theater, on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 3 and March 18.

Subscribers to last year's concerts are given until October 15 in which to renew subscriptons and retain the seats held last year. The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday, October 21, at Droop's music store, 13th and G streets.

The soloists for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Mettropolitan Opera Company; Mme. Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

m STAR
ress: New York City

FRENCH DIRECTOR COMES

Henri Rabaud has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season. M. Rabaud is a French composer and musician of note. "Marouf," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House last Winter, was composed by him. He will sail from France immediately so as to be here early in November, when he will take charge of the orchestra.

In the meantime Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan, has been given leave of absence by Gatti-Casazza to conduct the orchestra on its Southern tour.

n REPUBLICAN
ress Springfield, Mass.
e

Early speculation as to the choice of a permanent conductor for the Boston symphony orchestra is proved to have been amiss, save in the detail that the successor to Dr Muck would in all probability be a Frenchman. Like some of those before him who have been invited to take this important post, he comes from the opera house rather than from a position at the head of a symphony orchestra; and, unlike most of them, he has made a mark as a composer. It is an interesting coincidence that one of his symphonies was performed at the Worcester music festival just a year ago. This, like the opera "Marouf," which New York heard last winter, was found to be a strong and interesting work, reasonably individual without being ultra-modern. M Rabaud, as seen in Paris at the opera and at concerts, is described by the Boston Transcript as "an unusual and pictorial figure, whether he was conductor or only intent listener, tall, gaunt, bearded, olive-skinned, grave of glance and quick of gesture, oriental rather than Parisian in impression to the eye." By every token the trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra have made a very happy selection. By training, talent and musicianly sincerity M Rabaud seems well qualified for the post.

m EVENING WORLD
dress: New York City.
te

Frederick Stock has resigned as conductor of the Chicago Orchestra pending his full admission to American citizenship. Meanwhile, Eric Lamater, a music critic as well as a musician, will lead the band. The vacancy in the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra caused by the internment as an enemy alien of Dr. Karl Muck has been filled by the appointment of Henri Rabaud, a French conductor, who is not a stranger here. Until he can arrive from France, Mr. Monteaux, Mr. Gatti's French conductor, will fill Mr. Rabaud's place. Some of us are wondering why Boston did not seize the opportunity to put an American in charge of its orchestra. Interesting is the announcement of the engagement by Cleofonte Campanini, director of the Chicago Opera Company, of Giorgio Polacco, of recent and gracious memory as conductor at the Metropolitan. Incidentally it may be m

Mr. De Lamater has written the music for "The Betrothal," Maeterlinck's sequel to "The Blue Bird."

n BILLBOARD
ress: Cincinnati, Oh

RABAUD REPLACES MUCK

Boston, Oct. 5.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season of 1918-'19. This word was received today by the Symphony trustees in a cable message from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that M. Rabaud would reach Boston early in November. For the last five years M. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris and also has done much concert work. His engagement brings to an end negotiations in progress since last spring, when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

rom EVENING TELEGRAM
ddress Philadelphia, Pa.
ate

With many changes in the personnel and appearing with the newly appointed conductor, Henri Rabaud, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts here at the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. M. Rabaud, the new conductor, has been, during the past seven years, principal conductor of the Grand Opera in Paris. Since he will arrive in America late, the first concert in Philadelphia will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, will be the new concertmaster. The first 'cellist will be Joseph Milkin. The viola and second violin sections will be headed by M. Barrier and Edward Tax, respectively. In addition, several members of the French Military Band, now in America, will be added to the orchestra. Soloists at the concert here will be Florence Easton, soprano, of the Metropolitan forces; Madame Melba; Fredric Fradkin, the orchestra's concertmaster, and Arthur Rubenstein, the Russian pianist.

ss New York City

THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Ever since Karl Muck's resignation the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been without a conductor. Unable to find a permanent conductor, it has engaged a temporary one in the person of Pierre Monteux. The change of name indicates that the Boston Orchestra is no longer to perpetuate the notion that only a Teuton can conduct symphony concerts—indeed, the names of Toscanini, Lamoureux, and Chevillard have already sufficiently proved the contrary.

While welcoming to his repertory classical German music, M. Monteux bans German music by living authors, also the music of Wagner, and for these reasons, as explained in an interview just published in the Boston "Herald:"

> I will do anything to help win the struggle, and if any one can convince me that the end will be brought nearer by giving up the classics of German music—Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms—I am willing to give them up. So far, however, I cannot see how the silencing of the music of these masters can do the least to help win the war, and it is my purpose (as it is the purpose, I am sure, of all French conductors) to give the great classics due place on concert programmes. Personally, I will not play Wagner, nor will I play the works of any living German or Austrian composer. . . . I will not play Wagner because of his attitude toward France in the war of '70-71. Moreover, looked at from another point of view, much of the best music that Wagner wrote—"The Ring" and "Die Meistersinger"—is in glorification of German ideals as found in the Kultur of to-day.

M. Monteux holds, reports the "Herald," that the music of the best German and Austrian composers of the past has become the property of the whole world and that this music is an integral and necessary part of the repertory of musicians. In reviewing the names of such composers, that of Beethoven probably springs quickest to the lips, and of him M. Monteux has to say that, at heart republican, Beethoven, if still living, would doubtless be against the war.

The French conductor then proceeded to pay his respects to Richard Strauss:

> I particularly specifically object to the performance of any music of Richard Strauss during the war.
>
> I believe I was the first one in this country to refuse to play the music of Strauss. That was two years ago, when I came to this country as conductor for the Ballet Russe. Arriving in New York, they told me that my first work was to superintend and direct the first performance in this country of the ballet founded on "Till Eulenspiegel," whereupon I informed the management that I would take the next ship back to France.
>
> It was my fortune in May, 1914, to prepare for Strauss the production in Paris of his ballet "Joseph." This was a little more than two months before the beginning of the war. Strauss's attitude toward France, French art, French music, and French musicians was even then unbearable. He was arrogant and insulting, and, even without war, I was almost persuaded to give up playing his music; but, in view of what followed, Strauss became impossible for me.

A contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company makes it impossible for M. Monteux to remain with the Boston Symphony throughout the entire coming season. This short conductorship, however, will doubtless awaken much interest and add to the high reputation of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

om
ddress New York City
ate

THE selection of M. Monteux, conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the month of October only, brings out anew the plight of that splendid body. As many as twenty-five members are said to have been dropped, a concert master was picked only the other day, and now the orchestra must enter upon its first season without Major Higginson at the helm and with but a temporary conductor; all this, too, with supersensitive patriots watching every move to see if the Americanization process is complete. Naturally, the orchestra is bound to suffer, however capable the new material. No temporary conductor, not even one with as excellent a reputation as M. Monteux, can, moreover, do much for the regeneration of the orchestra's morale in a month. Perhaps by the first of November the permanent leader will be found or M. Monteux will be appointed for the season. But for the first time in years this great organization will find itself in danger of being eclipsed by competitors. There is real tragedy in this situation, for few groups of orchestral artists have been so harmonious or have played together under such favorable circumstances for so many years with so few changes. No other American orchestra has quite come up to their standard because of their continuity of service, which in turn has been due to the security afforded by Major Higginson's private means and to the pension fund long established.

GLOBE OCTOBER 21

SERVICE AND LOAN FLAGS FOR SYMPHONY PLAYERS

A service flag for members of the Symphony Orchestra who are fighting for the Allies and a 100 percent honor flag for subscriptions to the Fourth Liberty Loan will be the principal ornaments of Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon at the season's first concert. The Symphony Orchestra and employes of the hall bought $15,150 worth of bonds, or an average of more than $100 for each individual.

The service flag contains 11 stars, which represent nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff. Three stars belong to France. In the orchestra this season there are seven veterans of the French service, not including Mr Monteux, who has had 25 months active service.

rom EVENING SUN
ddress: New York City

Final Plans of Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony, after the long delay attendant upon its choice of a director, has now announced its plans for the coming season of concerts. As is already known the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the French composer and conductor who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Since Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concerts in New York, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall. The evening concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 20. The afternoon concerts fall on November 9, December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 22.

RECORD, OCTOBER 19

GALLI-CURCI TO APPEAR HERE ONE WEEK FROM TODAY

Mudgett Signs Soprano for Recital—Notes of Music World

By J. V. CLARK

The raising of the influenza ban has started activities anew in the musical world. The Handel and Haydn, through its president, Courtney Guild, announces that the first rehearsal will be called tomorrow at 6 p. m. at Huntington Hall. "The Messia," "The Creation" and Verdi's "Requiem" will be put in rehearsal.

The first important event of the musical season will be the opening of the Symphony series Friday afternoon. The reconstructed orchestra, Pierre Monteux temporary conductor, will play this program: Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas' ballet music "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia" Franck's Symphony, sceptically received by Boston when first offered by Mr. Gericke, has become a universal favorite. Dukas, known here almost as a man of one work, will get a first Boston hearing of "La Peri."

Mme. Galli-Curci will sing at Symphony Hall a week from today at a special afternoon recital. This was decided on only this morning. The Chicago Opera Co. has abandoned its preliminary western tour, and Mr. Mudgett quickly signed Mme. Galli-Curci for Boston. Her program will be announced in these columns later.

The first of the Sunday afternoon concerts will start at Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow. The artists will be Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. They will play two sonatas, Grieg in C minor, op. 45, and Franck in A major. Each artist will contribute shorter pieces. Jascha Heifetz will give a recital at Symphony Hall Sunday, Nov. 3. On Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, and Raoul Laparra, composer-pianist, will offer a joint recital at Symphony Hall. This recital is called "A Musical Journey Through Spain." Mr. Laparra is best known here as the composer of the opera "La Habanera," in which Maria Gay appeared with the Boston Opera Co. His "Musical Journey Through Spain" is described as a collection of minature tableaux, showing the wealth of variety which Spain offers musically.

Barrier, War Veteran, Symphony Soloist

Claude Barrier, war veteran and solo viola of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston yesterday from France.

A veteran of the war, he has been severely wounded and walks with a perceptible limp, having to use a cane. He went out at the first call in August, 1914, and was continually in the front line in the Champagne until September, 1915, when he was wounded in the thigh. Following his wound he spent 22 months in the hospital and then was discharged unfit for further military duty.

rom MORNING TELEGRAPH

ddress: New York City

ate

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its plans for the series of concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall during the coming Winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra, and through all its life maintained it, retired last Spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees, composed of prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions. Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it it stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The violin section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concerts in New York, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall. The evening concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6, and March 20.

n

dress

e

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming winter, just announced, state that Henry L. Higginson retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs and the maintenance and government has been taken over by a board of nine trustees, prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represent a large number of others, thus assuring the orchestra's continuance.

Many changes have been made in the personnel. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section by Mr. Barrier, now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section by Edward Tak. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same.

The permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the French composer and conductor, who for seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Washington, will be under the direcion of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, through courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Cassazza.

The orchestra will give five afternoon concerts in the New National Theater, on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 3 and March 18.

Subscribers to last year's concerts are given until October 15 in which to renew subscriptons and retain the seats held last year. The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday, October 21, at Droop's music store, 13th and G streets.

The soloists for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Mettropolitan Opera Company; Mme. Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

m STA

ress: N

FRENCH DIRECTOR COMES

Henri Rabaud has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season. M. Rabaud is a French composer and musician of note. "Marouf," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House last Winter, was composed by him. He will sail from France immediately so as to be here early in November, when he will take charge of the orchestra.

In the meantime Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan, has been given leave of absence by Gatti-Casazza to conduct the orchestra on its Southern tour.

n REPUBLICAN

ress Springfield, Mass.

e

Early speculation as to the choice of a permanent conductor for the Boston symphony orchestra is proved to have been amiss, save in the detail that the successor to Dr Muck would in all probability be a Frenchman. Like some of those before him who have been invited to take this important post, he comes from the opera house rather than from a position at the head of a symphony orchestra; and, unlike most of them, he has made a mark as a composer. It is an interesting coincidence that one of his symphonies was performed at the Worcester music festival just a year ago. This, like the opera "Marouf," which New York heard last winter, was found to be a strong and interesting work, reasonably individual without being ultra-modern. M Rabaud, as seen in Paris at the opera and at concerts, is described by the Boston Transcript as "an unusual and pictorial figure, whether he was conductor or only intent listener, tall, gaunt, bearded, olive-skinned, grave of glance and quick of gesture, oriental rather than Parisian in impression to the eye." By every token the trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra have made a very happy selection. By training, talent and musicianly sincerity M Rabaud seems well qualified for the post.

m EVENING WORLD

dress: New York City.

te

Frederick Stock has resigned as conductor of the Chicago Orchestra pending his full admission to American citizenship. Meanwhile, Eric Lamater, a music critic as well as a musician, will lead the band. The vacancy in the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra caused by the internment as an enemy alien of Dr. Karl Muck has been filled by the appointment of Henri Rabaud, a French conductor, who is not a stranger here. Until he can arrive from France, Mr. Monteaux, Mr. Gatti's French conductor, will fill Mr. Rabaud's place. Some of us are wondering why Boston did not seize the opportunity to put an American in charge of its orchestra. Interesting is the announcement of the engagement by Cleofonte Campanini, director of the Chicago Opera Company, of Giorgio Polacco, of recent and gracious memory as conductor at the Metropolitan. Incidentally it may be m

Mr. De Lamater has written the music for "The Betrothal," Maeterlinck's sequel to "The Blue Bird."

n BILLBOARD

ress: Cincinnati, Oh

RABAUD REPLACES MUCK

Boston, Oct. 5.—Henri Rabaud, French composer and musician, has accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season of 1918-'19. This word was received today by the Symphony trustees in a cable message from the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris, which said also that M. Rabaud would reach Boston early in November. For the last five years M. Rabaud has been one of the principal conductors of the Grand Opera in Paris and also has done much concert work. His engagement brings to an end negotiations in progress since last spring, when the internment of Dr. Karl Muck, the former conductor, made necessary the selection of a successor.

rom EVENING TELEGRAM

ddress Philadelphia, Pa.

ate

With many changes in the personnel and appearing with the newly appointed conductor, Henri Rabaud, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts here at the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. M. Rabaud, the new conductor, has been, during the past seven years, principal conductor of the Grand Opera in Paris. Since he will arrive in America late, the first concert in Philadelphia will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, will be the new concertmaster. The first 'cellist will be Joseph Milkin. The viola and second violin sections will be headed by M. Barrier and Edward Tax, respectively. In addition, several members of the French Military Band, now in America, will be added to the orchestra. Soloists at the concert here will be Florence Easton, soprano, of the Metropolitan forces; Madame Melba; Fredric Fradkin, the orchestra's concertmaster, and Arthur Rubenstein, the Russian pianist.

THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Ever since Karl Muck's resignation the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been without a conductor. Unable to find a permanent conductor, it has engaged a temporary one in the person of Pierre Monteux. The change of name indicates that the Boston Orchestra is no longer to perpetuate the notion that only a Teuton can conduct symphony concerts—indeed, the names of Toscanini, Lamoureux, and Chevillard have already sufficiently proved the contrary.

While welcoming to his repertory classical German music, M. Monteux bans German music by living authors, also the music of Wagner, and for these reasons, as explained in an interview just published in the Boston "Herald:"

> I will do anything to help win the struggle, and if any one can convince me that the end will be brought nearer by giving up the classics of German music—Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms—I am willing to give them up. So far, however, I cannot see how the silencing of the music of these masters can do the least to help win the war, and it is my purpose (as it is the purpose, I am sure, of all French conductors) to give the great classics due place on concert programmes. Personally, I will not play Wagner, nor will I play the works of any living German or Austrian composer. . . . I will not play Wagner because of his attitude toward France in the war of '70-71. Moreover, looked at from another point of view, much of the best music that Wagner wrote—"The Ring" and "Die Meistersinger"—is in glorification of German ideals as found in the Kultur of to-day.

M. Monteux holds, reports the "Herald," that the music of the best German and Austrian composers of the past has become the property of the whole world and that this music is an integral and necessary part of the repertory of musicians. In reviewing the names of such composers, that of Beethoven probably springs quickest to the lips, and of him M. Monteux has to say that, at heart republican, Beethoven, if still living, would doubtless be against the war.

The French conductor then proceeded to pay his respects to Richard Strauss:

> I particularly specifically object to the performance of any music of Richard Strauss during the war.
>
> I believe I was the first one in this country to refuse to play the music of Strauss. That was two years ago, when I came to this country as conductor for the Ballet Russe. Arriving in New York, they told me that my first work was to superintend and direct the first performance in this country of the ballet founded on "Till Eulenspiegel," whereupon I informed the management that I would take the next ship back to France.
>
> It was my fortune in May, 1914, to prepare for Strauss the production in Paris of his ballet "Joseph." This was a little more than two months before the beginning of the war. Strauss's attitude toward France, French art, French music, and French musicians was even then unbearable. He was arrogant and insulting, and, even without war, I was almost persuaded to give up playing his music; but, in view of what followed, Strauss became impossible for me.

A contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company makes it impossible for M. Monteux to remain with the Boston Symphony throughout the entire coming season. This short conductorship, however, will doubtless awaken much interest and add to the high reputation of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

om

ddress New York City

ate

THE selection of M. Monteux, conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the month of October only, brings out anew the plight of that splendid body. As many as twenty-five members are said to have been dropped, a concert master was picked only the other day, and now the orchestra must enter upon its first season without Major Higginson at the helm and with but a temporary conductor; all this, too, with supersensitive patriots watching every move to see if the Americanization process is complete. Naturally, the orchestra is bound to suffer, however capable the new material. No temporary conductor, not even one with as excellent a reputation as M. Monteux, can, moreover, do much for the regeneration of the orchestra's morale in a month. Perhaps by the first of November the permanent leader will be found or M. Monteux will be appointed for the season. But for the first time in years this great organization will find itself in danger of being eclipsed by competitors. There is real tragedy in this situation, for few groups of orchestral artists have been so harmonious or have played together under such favorable circumstances for so many years with so few changes. No other American orchestra has quite come up to their standard because of their continuity of service, which in turn has been due to the security afforded by Major Higginson's private means and to the pension fund long established.

GLOBE OCTOBER 21

SERVICE AND LOAN FLAGS FOR SYMPHONY PLAYERS

A service flag for members of the Symphony Orchestra who are fighting for the Allies and a 100 percent honor flag for subscriptions to the Fourth Liberty Loan will be the principal ornaments of Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon at the season's first concert. The Symphony Orchestra and employes of the hall bought $15,150 worth of bonds, or an average of more than $100 for each individual.

The service flag contains 11 stars, which represent nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff. Three stars belong to France. In the orchestra this season there are seven veterans of the French service, not including Mr Monteux, who has had 25 months active service.

rom EVENING SUN

ddress: New York City

Final Plans of Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony, after the long delay attendant upon its choice of a director, has now announced its plans for the coming season of concerts. As is already known the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the French composer and conductor who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Since Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concerts in New York, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concert master. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall. The evening concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 6 and March 20. The afternoon concerts fall on November 9, December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 22.

RECORD, OCTOBER 19

GALLI-CURCI TO APPEAR HERE ONE WEEK FROM TODAY

Mudgett Signs Soprano for Recital—Notes of Music World

By J. V. CLARK

The raising of the influenza ban has started activities anew in the musical world. The Handel and Haydn, through its president, Courtney Guild, announces that the first rehearsal will be called tomorrow at 6 p. m. at Huntington Hall. "The Messia," "The Creation" and Verdi's "Requiem" wil be put in rehearsal.

The first important event of the musical season will be the opening of the Symphony series Friday afternoon. The reconstructed orchestra, Pierre Monteux temporary conductor, will play this program: Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas' ballet music "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia" Franck's Symphony, sceptically received by Boston when first offered by Mr. Gericke, has become a universal favorite. Dukas, known here almost as a man of one work, will get a first Boston hearing of "La Peri."

Mme. Galli-Curci will sing at Symphony Hall a week from today at a special afternoon recital. This was decided on only this morning. The Chicago Opera Co. has abandoned its preliminary western tour, and Mr. Mudgett quickly signed Mme. Galli-Curci for Boston. Her program will be announced in these columns later.

The first of the Sunday afternoon concerts will start at Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow. The artists will be Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. They will play two sonatas, Grieg in C minor, op. 45, and Franck in A major. Each artist will contribute shorter pieces. Jascha Heifetz will give a recital at Symphony Hall Sunday, Nov. 3. On Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, and Raoul Laparra, composer-pianist, will offer a joint recital at Symphony Hall. This recital is called "A Musical Journey Through Spain." Mr. Laparra is best known here as the composer of the opera "La Habanera," in which Maria Gay appeared with the Boston Opera Co. His "Musical Journey Through Spain" is described as a collection of minature tableaux, showing the wealth of variety which Spain offers musically.

Barrier, War Veteran, Symphony Soloist

Claude Barrier, war veteran and solo viola of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston yesterday from France.

A veteran of the war, he has been severely wounded and walks with a perceptible limp, having to use a cane. He went out at the first call in August, 1914, and was continually in the front line in the Champagne until September, 1915, when he was wounded in the thigh. Following his wound he spent 22 months in the hospital and then was discharged unfit for further military duty.

REDUCTION RATIO

13x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

POST, OCTOBER 20

Thibaud and Bauer to Open Concert Season

Owing to conditions which no manager could forestall, the musical season commences nearly a month later than would ordinarily have been the case. This has been in many respects profitable for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and musical reviewers have been enabled to go chestnutting. What is not less cause for congratulation is that the programmes which open the belated season are not too many and very interesting in quality. Next Sunday afternoon the first of the concerts managed by L. H. Mudgett and given in Symphony Hall will be given by Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud. There is a long association, a warm personal friendship and an artistic union extending over some 25 years. Both men are among the most brilliant soloists and also—for a rarity—ensemble players in the world. They unite the broad understanding of musicians of the most cosmopolitan interests and tastes with the individually creative qualities of born artists. To hear them play the Cesar Franck sonata for violin and piano is in itself worth a long journey, and an experience which should not be missed by any lover of student of music. In addition to their ensemble pieces, Messrs. Bauer and Thibaud will play groups of solos for their respective instruments, and where the two men cooperate as one when they play together they are like no other players when they are heard alone with their own chosen instruments. "Chosen," in respect to Mr. Bauer, is a particularly apt term, for he was formerly a violinist, and many years ago a concert was given in London when one Fritz Kreisler as pianist accompanied one Harold Bauer, who then played the violin. And the public was not thrilled or surprised by this, for neither of the two men had a big reputation at the time. In addition to the Cesar Franck sonata and their solos, Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud will play next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall the violin and piano sonata in C minor of Edvard Grieg, a fascinating poem of the northland.

Later in the season, but not very far off now, on the 2d of November, Saturday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, Raoul Laparra, assisted by Helen Stanley, soprano, will give a programme of compositions of his own, entitled "A Musical Journey Through Spain." Singing Mr. Laparra's songs, Miss Stanley will wear several costumes of the Spanish country. Laparra, of Spanish descent, has lived, in his own words, "just across the street from Spain," and has taken representative popular airs of Spain, harmonized these airs in his own way, and made them parts of his compositions.

Laparra has been one of the most interesting figures among the young French composers. Contrary to the belief of certain European musicians of provincial dispositions, who were wont to declare—if one can imagine it—that there was "no music in Spain," Laparra, with ideas of his own, travelled over the country, of which he has always been enamored, and set out, with his own pen, to make the true Spanish musical spirit intelligible to the world. The remarkable effect of his comparatively early opera, "La Habanera," produced here at the Boston Opera House, following the premiere at the Opera Comique, Paris, said more than we could say here of his methods and his spirit. The virility and hyper-romantic quality of this work, its directness and nearness to the soil, showed a young composer, full of conviction and talent, going his own way, and careless of praise or ridicule in so doing. A companion opera to "La Habanera" was "The Jota," similar in character, though not in plot, to "La Habanera." It will be observed that both of these titles are the names of Spanish dances.

It is said that Laparra planned a cycle of music dramas on the basis of the representative dances of Spain—and in Spain all popular music is dance music, and the dance the spontaneous and individual production of the life of the district from which it comes. In Symphony Hall, then, Mr. Laparra will give a musical narration of experiences in Spain; of age-old folksongs as they have impressed his musical fancy; the cradle song of a mother, songs of miller and muleteer; songs of festival and of sorrow. As a composer Laparra has shown himself much of a realist. His recital should be interesting in more ways than one, and in none more so than the probability of its appearing as a more nearly exact picture of Spain than, for instance, that incomparably brilliant and dramatic fancy of Bizet's "Carmen."

HERALD OCT. 20

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

After two postponements due to the influenza the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 25 and 26. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series. Mr. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct. 25-26, shall be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The postponement has not been without its benefit. Mr. Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing. As 25 per cent. of the orchestra is new this period of rehearsal has been invaluable.

The program that Mr. Monteux will play comprises Franck's symphony in D minor, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime "La Peri," by Dukas and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

Dukas's work is new to Boston. "La Peri" is a ballet-pantomime, employing two mimes. It was written for production at the opera in Paris by the Ballet Russe in 1911. It is dedicated to the Russian dancer, Mlle. Trouhanowa, and Dukas intended to have it danced by her in collaboration with Nijinsky. Trouhanowa was not a member of M. Diagheleff's company. The work was put into rehearsal at the opera under Mr. Monteux; the scenery was built, but it was not produced there because Diagheleff refused to allow Nijinsky to dance with Trouhanowa. As a result, a production of the ballet-pantomime was made at the Chatelet by Trouhanowa and another Russian dancer, and Dukas conducted. It is based on the oriental story of Iskender, who goes to the ends of the world to find the flower of immortality. He finds it in the hands of a peri at the court of Ormuzd. In the course of the pantomime he finds that the flower is not for him and that his end is near. The entire score of the pantomime is a work of exceeding brilliance.

The form of the program is as follows:

Cesar Franck.....Symphony in D minor
Schumann.....Overture to "Manfred"
Dukas......"La Peri"
Debussy.....Iberia

LAPARRA'S CONCERT

Raoul Laparra comes to Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, with Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, when they will give his "Musical Journey Through Spain." From the lips of the Spanish people Laparra heard their old folk songs. He heard the peasant mother sing a cradle song to her child; he heard the lifted voices of miller and muleteer; he heard the songs that were sung at times of festival and at times of sorrow. As a result there grew his cycle, "A Musical Journey Through Spain," a series of musical pictures of the life of the Spanish people.

SUNDAY CONCERT

The Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall begin a week from today, with Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. The program includes sonata by Grieg in C-minor, Ysaye's "Chant d'Hiver" (a poeme) and Wieniawski's Polonaise in A-major for violin; "Papillons," by Schumann, and Chopin's Scherzo in B-flat minor; sonata by Franck for violin and piano. Nicolai Schneer accompanist.

CONCERT NOTES

Jascha Heifetz will give a violin recital in Symphony Hall on Nov. 3d. His program opens with a sonata by Tartini. It comprises a concerto by Paranini, a group of short pieces by Beethoven, Shumann and Moszkowski, and a group by Wieniawski and Glinka.

Nov. 12th, evening, Roland Hayes, the Boston Negro tenor.

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 19th, Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, and Rosita Renard, pianist.

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 24th, Josef Hofmann, pianist.

POST, OCTOBER 20,

Monteux Plans Sparkling Programmes for Symphony During Coming Season

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 25 and 26, respectively. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct. 25-26, shall be used. Concerts 1 and 2 will be given later.

The programme that Mr. Monteux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime, "La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" by Debussy.

The first, second and fourth numbers are familiar and long-time favorites of Symphony audiences. Cesar Franck's Symphony, received sceptically when first produced here by Mr. Gericke, has become one of the most popular works in the repertoire of the orchestra.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture is the week's contribution of the older classics, while the fascinating color scheme of Debussy's Spanish pictures has been given frequently in recent years. The Dukas work is new to Boston, if, indeed, it is not new to America. "La Peri" is a ballet-pantomime, employing two mimes, and was written for production at the opera in Paris by the Ballet Russe in 1911. It is dedicated to the Russian dancer Mdle. Trouhanowa, and Dukas intended to have it danced by her in collaboration with Nijinsky. Trouhanowa was not a member of M. Diagheleff's company. The work was put into rehearsal at the Opera under Mr. Monteux; the scenery was built, but it was not produced there because Diagheleff refused to allow Nijinsky to dance with Trouhanowa. As a result, a production of the ballet-pantomime was made at the Chatelet by Trouhanowa and another Russian dancer, and Dukas conducted. It is based on the Oriental story of Iskender, who goes to the ends of the world to find the flower of immortality. He finds it in the hands of a peri at the court of Ormuzd. In the course of the pantomime he finds that the flower is not for him and that his end is near. The entire score of the pantomime as written for the theatre is played by Mr. Monteux.

One thing is certain, aside from the satisfaction which those who are part of the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra seem to feel with the methods of Mr. Monteux: he is a maker of programmes a hundred times more interesting than the moribund affairs that his predecessor used to resurrect from time to time from the Symphony chests of scores. Furthermore, though a lover of the classics—being even, for a great exception with a modern French musician, a proponent of Johannes Brahms—Mr. Monteux will give us for his regrettably brief season in Boston programmes which reflect the musical spirit of today.

It has been a habit, and especially a habit of the past German musical regime in this city and country, to decry this modern spirit and these remarkable tonal discoveries by which Frenchmen and not Germans have been opening news paths and disclosing new wonders of color and sonority and beauty to the world. Now, we hold no particular brief for modern French music as opposed to all other music of today. We are not by dispositions nationalists or chauvinists in our musical enthusiasms. We fully recognize the fact that since the beginning of the world much more poor music than good music has been composed, and that this is as true of the modern French school as of many others.

But of this modern French school another thing is true. While others—more particularly Germany in her music—were looking backward and feebly repeating the formulas which past masters struck out for themselves and made great for their time and enduring because of the creative spirit behind them, France, refusing to rest on stale tradition, has been the alert, eager, precise and creative pioneer of a new period in civilization. We do not know today how great Messrs. Debussy and D'Indy and a number of their colleagues will appear in a century hence—although all evidence at hand establishes their claim to enduring greatness more and more strongly as each year passes, but we do know, beyond a doubt or peradventure, that they are the men who speak a musical language of today, a language indicative of more culture, more spirit, less flesh, less sodden convention, than the music, probably, of any other school. The French Messiah of music may not have arrived as yet. It may require the world cataclysm to produce him. But the musical soil is already rich and fertile for his coming, and from this soil are springing beautiful flowers of a myriad colors, and a perfume that is the perfume of nothing less than the immortal and transcendent spirit of France.

It is time that this music received at once a more generous and a more sympathetic presentation than it has had at the Symphony concerts in the past. Suppose, for a change, that over-attention were given to music by modern Frenchmen and progressive composers of other countries—including America—whenever a progressive composer from this country can really be found—and the German classics ignored for a period, not because of the war, but simply because we in America wished to cultivate a different point of view and look at the art of music from a newer standpoint than we have been looking at it in late years? It would not hurt us.

Nor will it hurt us to listen at the Symphony concert to a conductor of a school other than German. By all accounts the Boston Symphony, under Mr. Monteux's assiduous rehearsing, is developing again much of the purity of tone and of pitch, the clearness and warmth of color which were its characteristics in the greatest days of its past. The French have an inalienable instinct for that which is clear and beautiful. Today they join the great invention, originality, curiosity in discovery in their art, a profound seriousness, and, incidentally, a mastery of the much-discussed matter of "form" which places a majority of German composers in the light of laborious plodders by their side. It is time this were realized. Even a cursory examination of modern French scores would demonstrate the fairness and accuracy of such a statement. As technicians these men are well nigh incomparable today. As creative artists they are in the vanguard of musical progress, and they have in their eyes a vision of a new beauty that is at once new and very old—that beauty which is the heritage of a long and noble culture, reborn again in the new and youthful spirit of today.

The second of the Sunday afternoon concerts, according to Mr. Mudgett's revised programme, will be given by Jascha Heifetz on the afternoon of Nov. 3. He will play a sonata of Tartini, a Paganini concerto and short pieces by Beethoven, Schumann, Moszkowski, Wieniawski, Glinka.

The public will learn with pleasure that the Handel and Haydn Society, Emil Mollenhauer, conductor, will give its concerts this season on Sunday afternoons instead of evenings. As usual, the first concert of the season, Dec. 22, will offer Handel's "Messiah"; the "mid-winter" concert, Verdi's "Requiem"; the Easter concert, Haydn's "Creation."

HERALD OCTOBER 21.

SYMPHONY TO FLY TWO HONOR FLAGS

One for Members in War Service, the Other Loan Purchases

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have a record of 100 per cent. in the fighting fourth Liberty loan. Besides this, 11 members of the organization are in the service of the allied governments in the present war. To commemorate these facts, two flags will be unfurled at the first concert to be held on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. One of the flags will be the one issued by the Liberty loan committee to the members for going over the top in regard to the Liberty loan. The total subscriptions amounted to $15,150.

The service flag will contain 11 stars, representing nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff who have so far entered the fighting service of the United States or the allies. Three stars belong to France. Modeste Alloo, a Belgian subject, first trombone of the orchestra, has for the past year been director and trainer of bands at Camp Devens. Much of the work done in regard to the fourth Liberty loan was by Joseph Mann, the librarian. It is fairly safe to state that no large orchestra in the country can show a like record.

A Boston group that has reported a substantial total is that comprising the members of the Symphony Orchestra and the employes of Symphony Hall, who have raised a total of $15,150, an average of more than $100 for each individual.

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 19.

SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN FRIDAY

After two postponements, due to the influenza, the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 25 and 26, respectively. Boston is not the only city that has suffered in this respect, for the Philadelphia Orchestra is late in beginning, and likewise the Chicago Orchestra. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct. 25-26, should be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The postponement, although embarrassing, has not been without its benefit. Mr. Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing.

The program that Mr. Monteux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomine "Le Peri" by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

AMERICAN- OCTOBER 19,

ORCHESTRA BEGINS AT LAST

After two postponements due to the influenza, the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 25 and 26 respectively. Boston is not the only city that has suffered in this respect, for the Philadelphia Orchestra is late in beginning and likewise the Chicago Orchestra. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, October 25-26, shall be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The program that Mr. Monteux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-Minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime "La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

The postponement, although embarrassing, has not been without its benefits. Mr. Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance, it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing.

ADVERTISER

GLOBE—OCTOBER 20

Belated Symphony Season Opens

After two postponements due to the influenza, the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and Manager William H. Brennan announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct 25-26, shall be used. Concerts 1 and 2 will be given later.

The postponement, although embarrassing, has not been without its benefit. Mr Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing. As 25 per cent of the orchestra is new, this period of rehearsal has been invaluable, and the results will be left to speak for themselves when the public hears the orchestra the end of the coming week.

The program Mr Monteux will play differs somewhat from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet pantomime, "La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

The first, second and fourth numbers are familiar and long-time favorites of Symphony audiences. Cesar Franck's Symphony, received sceptically when first produced here by Mr Gericke, has become one of the most popular works in the repertoire of the orchestra. Schumann's "Manfred" overture is the week's contribution of the older classics, while the fascinating color scheme of Debussy's Spanish pictures has been given frequently in recent years.

The Dukas work is new to Boston, if indeed not to America. "La Peri," a ballet-pantomime, employing two mimes, was written for production at the Opera in Paris by the Ballet Russe in 1911. Dedicated to the Russian dancer, Mlle Trouhanowa, Dukas intended to have it danced by her in collaboration with Nijinsky, although Trouhanowa was not a member of M Diagheleff's company. The work was put into rehearsal at the Opera under Mr Monteux; the scenery was built, but Diagheleff refused to allow Nijinsky to dance with Trouhanowa, and a production was made at the Chatelet by Trouhanowa and another Russian dancer. Dukas

AMERICAN. OCTOBER 20

Four Works on Symphony Program

AFTER two postponements due to the influenza the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, October 25-26, shall be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The program that Mr. Monteaux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's symphony in D-minor, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime "La Pedi," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

GALLI-CURCI TO SING HERE SATURDAY

Amelita Galli-Curci, the famous singer, finds she now can come to Boston to give the concert she was obliged to cancel a few weeks ago, owing to the ruling of the Health Commission. She will come to Symphony Hall next Saturday afternoon, Oct. 26. The program Mme. Galli-Curci will sing next Saturday is the same that was scheduled for September 29.

BAUER AND THIBAUD OPEN SUNDAY CONCERTS

The Sunday afternoon concerts at from today, with Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist, in joint recital. Two sonatas for piano and violin, and two groups of shorter pieces, one for piano and the other violin, will comprise the program. The opening sonata is by Grieg, in C minor. Then Mr. Thibaud will play Ysaye's "Chant d'Hiver," and Wieniawski's polonaise in A major. Mr. Bauer is allotted the third group of two piano numbers. Schumann's "Papillons," and Chopin's scherzo in B flat minor. The program closes with a sonata by Cesar Franck in A major.

Jascha Heifetz will give a violin recital in Symphony Hall two weeks from today (November 3), the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts. He will offer a program varied in character, which opens with a sonata by Tartini. A concerto by Paganini, a group of short pieces by Beethoven, Schumann and Moszkowski, and another group by Wieniawski and Glinka, complete the program that Heifetz will offer.

LAPARRA COMING

Raoul Laparra, the French composer, who comes to Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, in concert with Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, when they will give Mr. Laparra's "Musical Journey Thru Spain," Although he has lived in France all his life he spent much time in Spain. "A Musical Journey Thru Spain" is a series of musical pictures of Spanish life, which had its premiere in New York, with Mme. Stanley as interpreting artist and the composer himself playing the piano parts.

e Oriental o the ends er of im-hands of a peri at the court of Ormuzd. In the course of the pantomime he finds that the flower is not for him and that his end is near. The entire score of the pantomime as written for the theatre is played by Mr Monteux and is a work of exceeding brilliance.

HERALD, OCTOBER 20

SYMPHONY VIOLA SOLOIST ARRIVES

Claude Barrier Is Veteran of War, Retired on Account of Wounds

Claude Barrier, the new solo viola of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston yesterday morning direct from France, having landed in New York on Thursday.

Mr. Barrier is 30 years old. He took the first prize in the Conservatoire in 1909, a pupil of Lafarge. While he was still in the Conservatoire he played with the Lamoureux Orchestra for three seasons. He was solo viola with the Lamoureux Orchestra at Scheveningen. He has had much experience in concert work both orchestral and quartet.

Mr. Barrier, like so many of the other Frenchmen who have become members of the orchestra, is a veteran of the war. He has been severely wounded and walks with a perceptible limp, having to use a cane. He went out at the first call in August, 1914, and was continually in the front line in the Champagne until September, 1915, when he was wounded in the thigh. Following his wound he spent 22 months in the hospital and then was discharged unfit for further military duty.

Mr. Barrier said that a great change had come over Paris since the Germans were turned back at the Marne last summer. The normal life had been resumed; the theatres were all open and doing well; the music season promised to be very active. The French people, he said, were very cheerful, and the morale had never been higher. Mr. Barrier remarked that when he came into New York Thursday, his first and deepest impression was gained through the sight of a great transport crowded with

POST, OCTOBER 20

Thibaud and Bauer to Open Concert Season

Owing to conditions which no manager could forestall, the musical season commences nearly a month later than would ordinarily have been the case. This has been in many respects profitable for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and musical reviewers have been enabled to go chestnutting. What is not less cause for congratulation is that the programmes which open the belated season are not too many and very interesting in quality. Next Sunday afternoon the first of the concerts managed by L. H. Mudgett and given in Symphony Hall will be given by Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud. There is a long association, a warm personal friendship and an artistic union extending over some 25 years. Both men are among the most brilliant soloists and also—for a rarity—ensemble players in the world. They unite the broad understanding of musicians of the most cosmopolitan interests and tastes with the individually creative qualities of born artists. To hear them play the Cesar Franck sonata for violin and piano is in itself worth a long journey, and an experience which should not be missed by any lover of student of music. In addition to their ensemble pieces, Messrs. Bauer and Thibaud will play groups of solos for their respective instruments, and where the two men cooperate as one when they play together they are like no other players when they are heard alone with their own chosen instruments. "Chosen," in respect to Mr. Bauer, is a particularly apt term, for he was formerly a violinist, and many years ago a concert was given in London when one Fritz Kreisler as pianist accompanied one Harold Bauer, who then played the violin. And the public was not thrilled or surprised by this, for neither of the two men had a big reputation at the time. In addition to the Cesar Franck sonata and their solos, Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud will play next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall the violin and piano sonata in C minor of Edvard Grieg, a fascinating poem of the northland.

Later in the season, but not very far off now, on the 2d of November, Saturday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, Raoul Laparra, assisted by Helen Stanley, soprano, will give a programme of compositions of his own, entitled "A Musical Journey Through Spain." Singing Mr. Laparra's songs, Miss Stanley will wear several costumes of the Spanish country. Laparra, of Spanish descent, has lived, in his own words, "just across the street from Spain," and has taken representative popular airs of Spain, harmonized these airs in his own way, and made them parts of his compositions.

Laparra has been one of the most interesting figures among the young French composers. Contrary to the belief of certain European musicians of provincial dispositions, who were wont to declare—if one can imagine it—that there was "no music in Spain," Laparra, with ideas of his own, travelled over the country, of which he has always been enamored, and set out, with his own pen, to make the true Spanish musical spirit intelligible to the world. The remarkable effect of his comparatively early opera, "La Habanera," produced here at the Boston Opera House, following the premiere at the Opera Comique, Paris, said more than we could say here of his methods and his spirit. The virility and hyper-romantic quality of this work, its directness and nearness to the soil, showed a young composer, full of conviction and talent, going his own way, and careless of praise or ridicule in so doing. A companion opera to "La Habanera" was "The Jota," similar in character, though not in plot, to "La Habanera." It will be observed that both of these titles are the names of Spanish dances.

It is said that Laparra planned a cycle of music dramas on the basis of the representative dances of Spain—and in Spain all popular music is dance music, and the dance the spontaneous and individual production of the life of the district from which it comes. In Symphony Hall, then, Mr. Laparra will give a musical narration of experiences in Spain; of age-old folksongs as they have impressed his musical fancy; the cradle song of a mother, songs of miller and muleteer; songs of festival and of sorrow. As a composer Laparra has shown himself much of a realist. His recital should be interesting in more ways than one, and in none more so than the probability of its appearing as a more nearly exact picture of Spain than, for instance, that incomparably brilliant and dramatic fancy of Bizet's "Carmen."

HERALD OCT. 20

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

After two postponements due to the influenza the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 25 and 26. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series. Mr. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct. 25-26, shall be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The postponement has not been without its benefit. Mr. Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing. As 25 per cent. of the orchestra is new this period of rehearsal has been invaluable.

The program that Mr. Monteux will play comprises Franck's symphony in D minor, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime, "La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

Dukas's work is new to Boston. "La Peri" is a ballet-pantomime, employing two mimes. It was written for production at the opera in Paris by the Ballet Russe in 1911. It is dedicated to the Russian dancer, Mlle. Trouhanowa, and Dukas intended to have it danced by her in collaboration with Nijinsky. Trouhanowa was not a member of M. Diagheleff's company. The work was put into rehearsal at the opera under Mr. Monteux; the scenery was built, but it was not produced there because Diagheleff refused to allow Nijinsky to dance with Trouhanowa. As a result, a production of the ballet-pantomime was made at the Chatelet by Trouhanowa and another Russian dancer, and Dukas conducted. It is based on the oriental story of Iskender, who goes to the ends of the world to find the flower of immortality. He finds it in the hands of a peri at the court of Ormuzd. In the course of the pantomime he finds that the flower is not for him and that his end is near. The entire score of the pantomime is a work of exceeding brilliance.

The form of the program is as follows:

Cesar Franck.....Symphony in D minor
Schumann.....Overture to "Manfred"
Dukas......"La Peri"
Debussy.....Iberia

LAPARRA'S CONCERT

Raoul Laparra comes to Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, with Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, when they will give his "Musical Journey Through Spain." From the lips of the Spanish people Laparra heard their old folk songs. He heard the peasant mother sing a cradle song to her child; he heard the lifted voices of miller and muleteer; he heard the songs that were sung at times of festival and at times of sorrow. As a result there grew his cycle, "A Musical Journey Through Spain," a series of musical pictures of the life of the Spanish people.

SUNDAY CONCERT

The Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall begin a week from today, with Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. The program includes sonata by Grieg in C-minor, Ysaye's "Chant d'Hiver" (a poeme) and Wieniawski's Polonaise in A-major for violin; "Papillons," by Schumann, and Chopin's Scherzo in B-flat minor; sonata by Franck for violin and piano. Nicolai Schneer accompanist.

CONCERT NOTES

Jascha Heifetz will give a violin recital in Symphony Hall on Nov. 3d. His program opens with a sonata by Tartini. It comprises a concerto by Paganini, a group of short pieces by Beethoven, Schumann and Moszkowski, and a group by Wieniawski and Glinka.

Nov. 12th, evening, Roland Hayes, the Boston Negro tenor.

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 9th, Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, and Rosita Renard, pianist.

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 24th, Josef Hofmann, pianist.

POST, OCTOBER 20,

Monteux Plans Sparkling Programmes for Symphony During Coming Season

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 25 and 26, respectively. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct. 25-26, shall be used. Concerts 1 and 2 will be given later.

The programme that Mr. Monteux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime, "La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" by Debussy.

The first, second and fourth numbers are familiar and long-time favorites of Symphony audiences. Cesar Franck's Symphony, received sceptically when first produced here by Mr. Gericke, has become one of the most popular works in the repertoire of the orchestra.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture is the week's contribution of the older classics, while the fascinating color scheme of Debussy's Spanish pictures has been given frequently in recent years. The Dukas work is new to Boston, if, indeed, it is not new to America. "La Peri" is a ballet-pantomime, employing two mimes, and was written for production at the opera in Paris by the Ballet Russe in 1911. It is dedicated to the Russian dancer Mdle. Trouhanowa, and Dukas intended to have it danced by her in collaboration with Nijinsky. Trouhanowa was not a member of M. Diagheleff's company. The work was put into rehearsal at the Opera under Mr. Monteux; the scenery was built, but it was not produced there because Diagheleff refused to allow Nijinsky to dance with Trouhanowa. As a result, a production of the ballet-pantomime was made at the Chatelet by Trouhanowa and another Russian dancer, and Dukas conducted. It is based on the Oriental story of Iskender, who goes to the ends of the world to find the flower of immortality. He finds it in the hands of a peri at the court of Ormuzd. In the course of the pantomime he finds that the flower is not for him and that his end is near. The entire score of the pantomime as written for the theatre is played by Mr. Monteux.

One thing is certain, aside from the satisfaction which those who are part of the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra seem to feel with the methods of Mr. Monteux: he is a maker of programmes a hundred times more interesting than the moribund affairs that his predecessor used to resurrect from time to time from the Symphony chests of scores. Furthermore, though a lover of the classics—being even, for a great exception with a modern French musician, a proponent of Johannes Brahms—Mr. Monteux will give us for his regrettably brief season in Boston programmes which reflect the musical spirit of today.

It has been a habit, and especially a habit of the past German musical regime in this city and country, to decry this modern spirit and these remarkable tonal discoveries by which Frenchmen and not Germans have been opening news paths and disclosing new wonders of color and sonority and beauty to the world. Now, we hold no particular brief for modern French music as opposed to all other music of today. We are not by dispositions nationalists or chauvinists in our musical enthusiasms. We fully recognize the fact that since the beginning of the world much more poor music than good music has been composed, and that this is as true of the modern French school as of many others.

But of this modern French school another thing is true. While others—more particularly Germany in her music—were looking backward and feebly repeating the formulas which past masters struck out for themselves and made great for their time and enduring because of the creative spirit behind them, France, refusing to rest on stale tradition, has been the alert, eager, precise and creative pioneer of a new period in civilization. We do not know today how great Messrs. Debussy and D'Indy and a number of their colleagues will appear in a century hence—although all evidence at hand establishes their claim to enduring greatness more and more strongly as each year passes, but we do know, beyond a doubt or peradventure, that they are the men who speak a musical language of today, a language indicative of more culture, more spirit, less flesh, less sodden convention, than the music, probably, of any other school. The French Messiah of music may not have arrived as yet. It may require the world cataclysm to produce him. But the musical soil is already rich and fertile for his coming, and from this soil are springing beautiful flowers of a myriad colors, and a perfume that is the perfume of nothing less than the immortal and transcendent spirit of France.

It is time that this music received at once a more generous and a more sympathetic presentation than it has had at the Symphony concerts in the past. Suppose, for a change, that over-attention were given to music by modern Frenchmen and progressive composers of other countries—including America—whenever a progressive composer from this country can really be found—and the German classics ignored for a period, not because of the war, but simply because we in America wished to cultivate a different point of view and look at the art of music from a newer standpoint than we have been looking at it in late years? It would not hurt us.

Nor will it hurt us to listen at the Symphony concert to a conductor of a school other than German. By all accounts the Boston Symphony, under Mr. Monteux's assiduous rehearsing, is developing again much of the purity of tone and of pitch, the clearness and warmth of color which were its characteristics in the greatest days of its past. The French have an inalienable instinct for that which is clear and beautiful. Today they join the great invention, originality, curiosity in discovery in their art, a profound seriousness, and, incidentally, a mastery of the much-discussed matter of "form" which places a majority of German composers in the light of laborious plodders by their side. It is time this were realized. Even a cursory examination of modern French scores would demonstrate the fairness and accuracy of such a statement. As technicians these men are well nigh incomparable today. As creative artists they are in the vanguard of musical progress, and they have in their eyes a vision of a new beauty that is at once new and very old—that beauty which is the heritage of a long and noble culture, reborn again in the new and youthful spirit of today.

The second of the Sunday afternoon concerts, according to Mr. Mudgett's revised programme, will be given by Jascha Heifetz on the afternoon of Nov. 3. He will play a sonata of Tartini, a Paganini concerto and short pieces by Beethoven, Schumann, Moszkowski, Wieniawski, Glinka.

The public will learn with pleasure that the Handel and Haydn Society, Emil Mollenhauer, conductor, will give its concerts this season on Sunday afternoons instead of evenings. As usual, the first concert of the season, Dec. 22, will offer Handel's "Messiah"; the "mid-winter" concert, Verdi's "Requiem"; the Easter concert, Haydn's "Creation."

AMERICAN- OCTOBER 19,

ORCHESTRA BEGINS AT LAST

After two postponements due to the influenza, the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 25 and 26 respectively. Boston is not the only city that has suffered in this respect, for the Philadelphia Orchestra is late in beginning and likewise the Chicago Orchestra. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, October 25-26, shall be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The program that Mr. Monteux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-Minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime "La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

The postponement, although embarrassing, has not been without its benefits. Mr. Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance, it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing.

ADVERTISER

GLOBE—OCTOBER 20

Belated Symphony Season Opens

After two postponements due to the influenza, the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and Manager William H. Brennan announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct 25-26, shall be used. Concerts 1 and 2 will be given later.

The postponement, although embarrassing, has not been without its benefit. Mr Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing. As 25 percent of the orchestra is new, this period of rehearsal has been invaluable, and the results will be left to speak for themselves when the public hears the orchestra the end of the coming week.

The program Mr Monteux will play differs somewhat from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet pantomime, "La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

The first, second and fourth numbers are familiar and long-time favorites of Symphony audiences. Cesar Franck's Symphony, received sceptically when first produced here by Mr Gericke, has become one of the most popular works in the repertoire of the orchestra. Schumann's "Manfred" overture is the week's contribution of the older classics, while the fascinating color scheme of Debussy's Spanish pictures has been given frequently in recent years.

The Dukas work is new to Boston, if indeed not to America. "La Peri," a ballet-pantomime, employing two mimes, was written for production at the Opera in Paris by the Ballet Russe in 1911. Dedicated to the Russian dancer, Mlle Trouhanowa, Dukas intended to have it danced by her in collaboration with Nijinsky, although Trouhanowa was not a member of M Diagheleff's company. The work was put into rehearsal at the Opera under Mr Monteux; the scenery was built, but Diagheleff refused to allow Nijinsky to dance with Trouhanowa, and a production was made at the Chatelet by Trouhanowa and another Russian dancer. Dukas

AMERICAN. OCTOBER 20

Four Works on Symphony Program

AFTER two postponements due to the influenza the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, October 25-26, shall be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The program that Mr. Monteaux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's symphony in D-minor, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime "La Pedi," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

GALLI-CURCI TO SING HERE SATURDAY

Amelita Galli-Curci, the famous singer, finds she now can come to Boston to give the concert she was obliged to cancel a few weeks ago, owing to the ruling of the Health Commission. She will come to Symphony Hall next Saturday afternoon, Oct. 26. The program Mme. Galli-Curci will sing next Saturday is the same that was scheduled for September 29.

BAUER AND THIBAUD OPEN SUNDAY CONCERTS

The Sunday afternoon concerts at from today, with Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist, in joint recital. Two sonatas for piano and violin, and two groups of shorter pieces, one for piano and the other violin, will comprise the program. The opening sonata is by Grieg, in C minor. Then Mr. Thibaud will play Ysaye's "Chant d'Hiver," and Wieniawski's polonaise in A major. Mr. Bauer is allotted the third group of two piano numbers. Schumann's "Papillons," and Chopin's scherzo in B flat minor. The program closes with a sonata by Cesar Franck in A major.

Jascha Heifetz will give a violin recital in Symphony Hall two weeks from today (November 3), the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts. He will offer a program varied in character, which opens with a sonata by Tartini. A concerto by Paganini, a group of short pieces by Beethoven, Schumann and Moszkowski, and another group by Wieniawski and Glinka, complete the program that Heifetz will offer.

LAPARRA COMING

Raoul Laparra, the French composer, who comes to Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, in concert with Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, when they will give Mr. Laparra's "Musical Journey Thru Spain," Although he has lived in France all his life he spent much time in Spain. "A Musical Journey Thru Spain" is a series of musical pictures of Spanish life, which had its premiere in New York, with Mme. Stanley as interpreting artist and the composer himself playing the piano parts.

e Oriental
o the ends ver of im-hands of a peri at the court of Ormuzd. In the course of the pantomime he finds that the flower is not for him and that his end is near. The entire score of the pantomime as written for the theatre is played by Mr Monteux and is a work of exceeding brilliance.

HERALD, OCTOBER 20

SYMPHONY VIOLA SOLOIST ARRIVES

Claude Barrier Is Veteran of War, Retired on Account of Wounds

Claude Barrier, the new solo viola of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston yesterday morning direct from France, having landed in New York on Thursday.

Mr. Barrier is 30 years old. He took the first prize in the Conservatoire in 1909, a pupil of Lafarge. While he was still in the Conservatoire he played with the Lamoureux Orchestra for three seasons. He was solo viola with the Lamoureux Orchestra at Scheveningen. He has had much experience in concert work both orchestral and quartet.

Mr. Barrier, like so many of the other Frenchmen who have become members of the orchestra, is a veteran of the war. He has been severely wounded and walks with a perceptible limp, having to use a cane. He went out at the first call in August, 1914, and was continually in the front line in the Champagne until September, 1915, when he was wounded in the thigh. Following his wound he spent 22 months in the hospital and then was discharged unfit for further military duty.

Mr. Barrier said that a great change had come over Paris since the Germans were turned back at the Marne last summer. The normal life had been resumed; the theatres were all open and doing well; the music season promised to be very active. The French people, he said, were very cheerful, and the morale had never been higher. Mr. Barrier remarked that when he came into New York Thursday, his first and deepest impression was gained through the sight of a great transport crowded with

HERALD OCTOBER 21.

SYMPHONY TO FLY TWO HONOR FLAGS

One for Members in War Service, the Other Loan Purchases

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have a record of 100 per cent. in the fighting fourth Liberty loan. Besides this, 11 members of the organization are in the service of the allied governments in the present war. To commemorate these facts, two flags will be unfurled at the first concert to be held on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. One of the flags will be the one issued by the Liberty loan committee to the members for going over the top in regard to the Liberty loan. The total subscriptions amounted to $15,150.

The service flag will contain 11 stars, representing nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff who have so far entered the fighting service of the United States or the allies. Three stars belong to France. Modeste Alloo, a Belgian subject, first trombone of the orchestra, has for the past year been director and trainer of bands at Camp Devens. Much of the work done in regard to the fourth Liberty loan was by Joseph Mann, the librarian. It is fairly safe to state that no large orchestra in the country can show a like record.

A Boston group that has reported a substantial total is that comprising the members of the Symphony Orchestra and the employes of Symphony Hall, who have raised a total of $15,150, an average of more than $100 for each individual.

TRAVELER. OCTOBER 19.

SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN FRIDAY

After two postponements, due to the influenza, the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 25 and 26, respectively. Boston is not the only city that has suffered in this respect, for the Philadelphia Orchestra is late in beginning, and likewise the Chicago Orchestra. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct. 25-26, should be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The postponement, although embarrassing, has not been without its benefit. Mr. Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing.

The program that Mr. Monteux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomine "Le Peri" by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

POST, OCTOBER 20

Thibaud and Bauer to Open Concert Season

Owing to conditions which no manager could forestall, the musical season commences nearly a month later than would ordinarily have been the case. This has been in many respects profitable for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and musical reviewers have been enabled to go chestnutting. What is not less cause for congratulation is that the programmes which open the belated season are not too many and very interesting in quality. Next Sunday afternoon the first of the concerts managed by L. H. Mudgett and given in Symphony Hall will be given by Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud. There is a long association, a warm personal friendship and an artistic union extending over some 25 years. Both men are among the most brilliant soloists and also—for a rarity—ensemble players in the world. They unite the broad understanding of musicians of the most cosmopolitan interests and tastes with the individually creative qualities of born artists. To hear them play the Cesar Franck sonata for violin and piano is in itself worth a long journey, and an experience which should not be missed by any lover of student of music. In addition to their ensemble pieces, Messrs. Bauer and Thibaud will play groups of solos for their respective instruments, and where the two men cooperate as one when they play together they are like no other players when they are heard alone with their own chosen instruments. "Chosen," in respect to Mr. Bauer, is a particularly apt term, for he was formerly a violinist, and many years ago a concert was given in London when one Fritz Kreisler as pianist accompanied one Harold Bauer, who then played the violin. And the public was not thrilled or surprised by this, for neither of the two men had a big reputation at the time. In addition to the Cesar Franck sonata and their solos, Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud will play next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall the violin and piano sonata in C minor of Edvard Grieg, a fascinating poem of the northland.

Later in the season, but not very far off now, on the 2d of November, Saturday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, Raoul Laparra, assisted by Helen Stanley, soprano, will give a programme of compositions of his own, entitled "A Musical Journey Through Spain." Singing Mr. Laparra's songs, Miss Stanley will wear several costumes of the Spanish country. Laparra, of Spanish descent, has lived, in his own words, "just across the street from Spain," and has taken representative popular airs of Spain, harmonized these airs in his own way, and made them parts of his compositions.

Laparra has been one of the most interesting figures among the young French composers. Contrary to the belief of certain European musicians of provincial dispositions, who were wont to declare—if one can imagine it—that there was "no music in Spain," Laparra, with ideas of his own, travelled over the country, of which he has always been enamored, and set out, with his own pen, to make the true Spanish musical spirit intelligible to the world. The remarkable effect of his comparatively early opera, "La Habanera," produced here at the Boston Opera House, following the première at the Opera Comique, Paris, said more than we could say here of his methods and his spirit. The virility and hyper-romantic quality of this work, its directness and nearness to the soil, showed a young composer, full of conviction and talent, going his own way, and careless of praise or ridicule in so doing. A companion opera to "La Habanera" was "The Jota," similar in character, though not in plot, to "La Habanera." It will be observed that both of these titles are the names of Spanish dances.

It is said that Laparra planned a cycle of music dramas on the basis of the representative dances of Spain—and in Spain all popular music is dance music, and the dance the spontaneous and individual production of the life of the district from which it comes. In Symphony Hall, then, Mr. Laparra will give a musical narration of experiences in Spain; of age-old folksongs as they have impressed his musical fancy; the cradle song of a mother, songs of miller and muleteer; songs of festival and of sorrow. As a composer Laparra has shown himself much of a realist. His recital should be interesting in more ways than one, and in none more so than the probability of its appearing as a more nearly exact picture of Spain than, for instance, that incomparably brilliant and dramatic fancy of Bizet's "Carmen."

HERALD OCT. 20

SYMPHONY CO

After two postponement influenza the Symphony open next Friday afternoo day evening, Oct. 25 and 2 this concert would be the series. Mr. Brennan, the m nounces that for this conc ets for the third concert shall be used. Concerts o will be given later.

The postponement has no out its benefit. Mr. Monteux hearsals every weekday, wit that before the orchestra first public appearance it w four weeks of solid rehear per cent. of the orchestra period of rehearsal has been

The program that Mr. Mo play comprises Franck's sy D minor, Schumann's overtur fred," the music of the ballet "La Peri," by Dukas and th of Debussy.

Dukas's work is new to B Peri" is a ballet-pantomime, two mimes. It was written fo tion at the opera in Paris by Russe in 1911. It is dedicat Russian dancer, Mlle. Trouha s intended to have it d in collaboration with anowa was not a mem leff's company. The to rehearsal at the op onteux; the scenery was not produced there becau refused to allow Nijinsky Trouhanowa. As a resul of the ballet-pantom at the Chatelet by Tro other Russian dancer, a ted. It is based on the f Iskender, who goes to world to find the flow ty. He finds it in the at the court of Ormuz of the pantomime he ver is not for him a near. The entire sc ime is a work of exce orm of the program i ranck.....Symphon

m.....Overture

ARRA'S CO

Laparra comes turday afternoon, Helen Stanley, so ill give his "Mus Spain." From th people Laparra h ngs. He heard sing a cradle song the lifted voices; he heard the times of festival w. As a result A Musical Jou series of musi the Spanish p

SUNDAY CO

The Sunday afternoo Symphony Hall begin a day, with Harold Ba Jacques Thibaud, violi gram includes sonata minor, Ysaye's "Cha poeme) and Wieniawsk A-major for violin; Schumann, and Chop B-flat minor; sonata by lin and piano. Nicolai pianist.

CONCERT NOTES

Jascha Heifetz will give a violin recital in Symphony Hall on Nov. 3d. His program opens with a sonata by Tartini. It comprises a concerto by Paganini, a group of short pieces by Beethoven, Shumann and Moszkowski, and a group by Wieniawski and Glinka.

Nov. 12th, evening, Roland Hayes, the Boston Negro tenor.

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 19th, Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, and Rosita Renard, pianist.

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 24th, Josef Hofmann, pianist.

AMERICAN-OCTOBER 19, GLOBE—OCTOBER 20

ORCHESTRA BEGINS AT LAST

After two postponements due to the influenza, the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 25 and 26 respectively. Boston is not the only city that has suffered in this respect, for the Philadelphia Orchestra is late in beginning and likewise the Chicago Orchestra. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, October 25-26, shall be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The program that Mr. Monteux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-Minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime "La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

The postponement, although embarrassing, has not been without its benefits. Mr. Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance, it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing.

ADVERTISER

Amusements. OCTOBER 20,

Four Wo... Symphony Program

AFTER two postponements due to the influenza the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, October 25-26, shall be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The program that Mr. Monteaux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's symphony in D-minor, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime "La Pedi," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

GALLI-CURCI TO SING HERE SATURDAY

Amelita Galli-Curci, the famous singer, finds she now can come to Boston to give the concert she was obliged to cancel a few weeks ago, owing to the ruling of the Health Commission. She will come to Symphony Hall next Saturday afternoon, Oct. 26. The program Mme. Galli-Curci will sing next Saturday is the same that was scheduled for September 29.

BAUER AND THIBAUD OPEN SUNDAY CONCERTS

The Sunday afternoon concerts at from today, with Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist, in joint recital. Two sonatas for piano and violin, and two groups of shorter pieces, one for piano and the other violin, will comprise the program. The opening sonata is by Grieg, in C minor. Then Mr. Thibaud will play Ysaye's "Chant d'Hiver," and Wieniawski's polonaise in A major. Mr. Bauer is allotted the third group of two piano numbers. Schumann's "Papillons," and Chopin's scherzo in B flat minor. The program closes with a sonata by Cesar Franck in A major.

Jascha Heifetz will give a violin recital in Symphony Hall two weeks from today (November 3), the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts. He will offer a program varied in character, which opens with a sonata by Tartini. A concerto by Paganini, a group of short pieces by Beethoven, Schumann and Moszkowski, and another group by Wieniawski and Glinka, complete the program that Heifetz will offer.

LAPARRA COMING

Raoul Laparra, the French composer, who comes to Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, in concert with Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, when they will give Mr. Laparra's "Musical Journey Thru Spain," Although he has lived in France all his life he spent much time in Spain. "A Musical Journey Thru Spain" is a series of musical pictures of Spanish life, which had its premiere in New

Belated Symphony Season Opens

After two postponements due to the influenza, the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and Manager William H. Brennan announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct 25-26, shall be used. Concerts 1 and 2 will be given later.

The postponement, although embarrassing, has not been without its benefit. Mr Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing. As 25 percent of the orchestra is new, this period of rehearsal has been invaluable, and the results will be left to speak for themselves when the public hears the orchestra the end of the coming week.

The program Mr Monteux will play differs somewhat from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet pantomime, "La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

The first, second and fourth numbers are familiar and long-time favorites of Symphony audiences. Cesar Franck's Symphony, received sceptically when first produced here by Mr Gericke, has become one of the most popular works in the repertoire of the orchestra. Schumann's "Manfred" overture is the week's contribution of the older classics, while the fascinating color scheme of Debussy's Spanish pictures has been given frequently in recent years.

The Dukas work is new to Boston, if indeed not to America. "La Peri," a ballet-pantomime, employing two mimes, was written for production at the Opera in Paris by the Ballet Russe in 1911. Dedicated to the Russian dancer, Mlle Trouhanowa, Dukas intended to have it danced by her in collaboration with Nijinsky, although Trouhanowa was not a member of M Diagheleff's company. The work was put into rehearsal at the Opera under Mr Monteux; the scenery was built, but Diagheleff refused to allow Nijinsky to dance with Trouhanowa, and a production was made at the Chatelet by Trouhanowa and another Russian dancer. Dukas conducted.

The ballet is based on the Oriental story of Iskender, who goes to the ends of the world to find the flower of immortality. He finds it in the hands of a peri at the court of Ormuzd. In the course of the pantomime he finds that the flower is not for him and that his end is near. The entire score of the pantomime as written for the theatre is played by Mr Monteux and is a work of exceeding brilliance.

HERALD, OCTOBER 20

SYMPHONY VIOLA SOLOIST ARRIVES

Claude Barrier Is Veteran of War, Retired on Account of Wounds

Claude Barrier, the new solo viola of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston yesterday morning direct from France, having landed in New York on Thursday.

Mr. Barrier is 30 years old. He took the first prize in the Conservatoire in 1909, a pupil of Lafarge. While he was still in the Conservatoire he played with the Lamoureux Orchestra for three seasons. He was solo viola with the Lamoureux Orchestra at Scheveningen. He has had much experience in concert work both orchestral and quartet.

Mr. Barrier, like so many of the other Frenchmen who have become members of the orchestra, is a veteran of the war. He has been severely wounded and walks with a perceptible limp, having to use a cane. He went out at the first call in August, 1914, and was continually in the front line in the Champagne until September, 1915, when he was wounded in the thigh. Following his wound he spent 22 months in the hospital and then was discharged unfit for further military duty.

Mr. Barrier said that a great change had come over Paris since the Germans were turned back at the Marne last summer. The normal life had been resumed; the theatres were all open and doing well; the music season promised to be very active. The French people, he said, were very cheerful, and the morale had never been higher. Mr. Barrier remarked that when he came into New York Thursday, his first and deepest impression was gained through the sight of a great transport crowded with

POST, OCTOBER 20,

Monteux Plans Sparkling Programmes for Symphony During Coming Season

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 25 and 26, respectively. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct. 25-26, shall be used. Concerts 1 and 2 will be given later.

The programme that Mr. Monteux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime, "La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" by Debussy.

The first, second and fourth numbers are familiar and long-time favorites of Symphony audiences. Cesar Franck's Symphony, received sceptically when first produced here by Mr. Gericke, has become one of the most popular works in the repertoire of the orchestra.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture is the week's contribution of the older classics, while the fascinating color scheme of Debussy's Spanish pictures has been given frequently in recent years. The Dukas work is new to Boston, if, indeed, it is not new to America. "La Peri" is a ballet-pantomime, employing two mimes, and was written for production at the opera in Paris by the Ballet Russe in 1911. It is dedicated to the Russian dancer Mdle. Trouhanowa, and Dukas intended to have it danced by her in collaboration with Nijinsky. Trouhanowa was not a member of M. Diagheleff's company. The work was put into rehearsal at the Opera under Mr. Monteux; the scenery was built, but it was not produced there because Diagheleff refused to allow Nijinsky to dance with Trouhanowa. As a result, a production of the ballet-pantomime was made at the Chatelet by Trouhanowa and another Russian dancer, and Dukas conducted. It is based on the Oriental story of Iskender, who goes to the ends of the world to find the flower of immortality. He finds it in the hands of a peri at the court of Ormuzd. In the course of the pantomime he finds that the flower is not for him and that his end is near. The entire score of the pantomime as written for the theatre is played by Mr. Monteux.

One thing is certain, aside from the satisfaction which those who are part of the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra seem to feel with the methods of Mr. Monteux: he is a maker of programmes a hundred times more interesting than the moribund affairs that his predecessor used to resurrect from time to time from the Symphony chests of scores. Furthermore, though a lover of the classics—being even, for a great exception with a modern French musician, a proponent of Johannes Brahms—Mr. Monteux will give us for his regrettably brief season in Boston programmes which reflect the musical spirit of today.

It has been a habit, and especially a habit of the past German musical regime in this city and country, to decry this modern spirit and these remarkable tonal discoveries by which Frenchmen and not Germans have been opening news paths and disclosing new wonders of color and sonority and beauty to the world. Now, we hold no particular brief for modern French music as opposed to all other music of today. We are not by dispositions nationalists or chauvinists in our musical enthusiasms. We fully recognize the fact that since the beginning of the world much more poor music than good music has been composed, and that this is as true of the modern French school as of many others.

But of this modern French school another thing is true. While others—more particularly Germany in her music—were looking backward and feebly repeating the formulas which past masters struck out for themselves and made great for their time and enduring because of the creative spirit behind them, France, refusing to rest on stale tradition, has been the alert, eager, precise and creative pioneer of a new period in civilization. We do not know today how great Messrs. Debussy and D'Indy and a number of their colleagues will appear in a century hence—although all evidence at hand establishes their claim to enduring greatness more and more strongly as each year passes, but we do know, beyond a doubt or peradventure, that they are the men who speak a musical language of today, a language indicative of more culture, more spirit, less flesh, less sodden convention, than the music, probably, of any other school. The French Messiah of music may not have arrived as yet. It may require the world cataclysm to produce him. But the musical soil is already rich and fertile for his coming, and from this soil are springing beautiful flowers of a myriad colors, and a perfume that is the perfume of nothing less than the immortal and transcendent spirit of France.

It is time that this music received at once a more generous and a more sympathetic presentation than it has had at the Symphony concerts in the past. Suppose, for a change, that over-attention were given to music by modern Frenchmen and progressive composers of other countries—including America—whenever a progressive composer from this country can really be found—and the German classics ignored for a period, not because of the war, but simply because we in America wished to cultivate a different point of view and look at the art of music from a newer standpoint than we have been looking at it in late years? It would not hurt us.

Nor will it hurt us to listen at the Symphony concert to a conductor of a school other than German. By all accounts the Boston Symphony, under Mr. Monteux's assiduous rehearsing, is developing again much of the purity of tone and of pitch, the clearness and warmth of color which were its characteristics in the greatest days of its past. The French have an inalienable instinct for that which is clear and beautiful. Today they join the great invention, originality, curiosity in discovery in their art, a profound seriousness, and, incidentally, a mastery of the much-discussed matter of "form" which places a majority of German composers in the light of laborious plodders by their side. It is time this were realized. Even a cursory examination of modern French scores would demonstrate the fairness and accuracy of such a statement. As technicians these men are well nigh incomparable today. As creative artists they are in the vanguard of musical progress, and they have in their eyes a vision of a new beauty that is at once new and very old—that beauty which is the heritage of a long and noble culture, reborn again in the new and youthful spirit of today.

The second of the Sunday afternoon concerts, according to Mr. Mudgett's revised programme, will be given by Jascha Heifetz on the afternoon of Nov. 3. He will play a sonata of Tartini, a Paganini concerto and short pieces by Beethoven, Schumann, Moszkowski, Wieniawski, Glinka.

The public will learn with pleasure that the Handel and Haydn Society, Emil Mollenhauer, conductor, will give its concerts this season on Sunday afternoons instead of evenings. As usual, the first concert of the season, Dec. 22, will offer Handel's "Messiah"; the "mid-winter" concert, Verdi's "Requiem"; the Easter concert, Haydn's "Creation."

HERALD OCTOBER 21.

SYMPHONY TO FLY TWO HONOR FLAGS

One for Members in War Service, the Other Loan Purchases

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have a record of 100 per cent. in the fighting fourth Liberty loan. Besides this, 11 members of the organization are in the service of the allied governments in the present war. To commemorate these facts, two flags will be unfurled at the first concert to be held on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. One of the flags will be the one issued by the Liberty Loan committee to the members for going over the top in regard to the Liberty loan. The total subscriptions amounted to $15,150.

The service flag will contain 11 stars, representing nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff who have so far entered the fighting service of the United States or the allies. Three stars belong to France. Modeste Alloo, a Belgian subject, first trombone of the orchestra, has for the past year been director and trainer of bands at Camp Devens. Much of the work done in regard to the fourth Liberty loan was by Joseph Mann, the librarian. It is fairly safe to state that no large orchestra in the country can show a like record.

A Boston group that has reported a substantial total is that comprising the members of the Symphony Orchestra and the employes of Symphony Hall, who have raised a total of $15,150, an average of more than $100 for each individual.

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 19.

SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN FRIDAY

After two postponements, due to the influenza, the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 25 and 26, respectively. Boston is not the only city that has suffered in this respect, for the Philadelphia Orchestra is late in beginning, and likewise the Chicago Orchestra. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct. 25-26, should be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The postponement, although embarrassing, has not been without its benefit. Mr. Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing.

The program that Mr. Monteux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomine "Le Peri" by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

HERALD Oct 20

SOME BOSTON SYMPHONY ARTISTS

Left to Right, Arthur Rubinstein, Piano Soloist; Jacques Thibaud, French Violinist, to Appear in Joint Recital at Symphony Hall Sunday Afternoon, Oct. with Harold Bauer, Pianist.

n EAGLE
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

FRENCH MUSIC HERE.

The coming of the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, which gave its first concert outside of France at the Metropolitan Opera House last night, is a historic incident. It marks the first stage of the French influence which is bound to color both our art and our life for a generation to come, and whose effect will be most quickly and probably most widely felt in the domain of music.

Followed, as it will be in a few months, by the advent of Henry Rabaud as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the visit of these musicians will familiarize our ears with the French style of musical performance and with the French ideals of musical creative and interpretative art. These represent a considerable departure from the style to which we have been accustomed and at first will seem strange to the bulk of our audiences. We shall learn as we listen, however, and accustom ourselves to the greater attention which these musicians give to delicacy and distinction of finish and to the emphasis which M. Messager puts upon the intellectual side of music. At first many Americans will, perhaps, miss the incisiveness of rhythm and the emotional appeal to which they have been accustomed, but they will learn to appreciate the elegance, the beauty of tone and the mental force which mark the French playing, just as they have learned to admire those same qualities in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Indeed, judging by the playing last night and from a brief interview with M. Rabaud which has been cabled to this country, that conductor should find the Boston band, or what is left of it after its contingent of alien enemies has been weeded out, an instrument almost ready-made to his hand. M. Rabaud put his emphasis on the classics as the best means to develop artistic musical education, so that no doubt his programs will retain the masterpieces of that older idealistic Germany before Prussian savagery had obtained dominion and smothered its voices with the cacophonies of Strauss. We shall hear no doubt the symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann and Mozart, along with the French classics and the works of modern French composers. With these M. Rabaud will seek to satisfy the American appetite for novelty of which he says that he is well aware.

If one were to attempt to forecast the effect of the French domination of our musical life, which may be expected for the next dozen years, upon our national musical style, which is still in its formative stages and highly plastic, the guess would be of progress in the direction of greater refinement of expression and clearness of thinking. Vigor we have in plenty, a gift for melody and a highly developed instinct for rhythm. These qualities mark much of our music, which is born today only to be forgotten tomorrow. If they shall come to be applied to a foundation of French strength and developed with French elegance as the result of the French invasion, we may see a future for American music quite different from the direction in which it has tended for a generation.

However, speculation for the future is idle, even though attractive. What we have at present is a superb French orchestra through which we can express the profound admiration we have for French character, French endurance and French achievement. Hats off to Messager and the distinguished musicians who accompany him.

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 21,

SYMPHONY TO FLY TWO HONOR FLAGS

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have a record of 100 per cent. in the fighting fourth Liberty loan. Besides this, 11 members of the organization are in the service of the allied governments in the present war. To commemorate these facts, two flags will be unfurled at the first concert to be held on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. One of the flags will be the one issued by the Liberty loan committee to the members for going over the top in regard to the Liberty loan. The total subscriptions amounted to $15,150.

The service flag will contain 11 stars, representing nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff who have so far entered the fighting service of the United States or the allies. Three stars belong to France. Modeste Alloo, a Belgian subject, first trombone of the orchestra, has for the past year been director and trainer of bands at Camp Devens. Much of the work done in regard to the fourth Liberty loan was by Joseph Mann, the librarian. It is fairly safe to state that no large orchestra in the country can show a like record.

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 21,

SOLDIERS IN THE SYMPHONY

Director Monteux and Seven Members of Orchestra Have Taken Part in War—Organization Has Eleven-Star Service Flag

When the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra go into Symphony Hall Friday afternoon for the first concert, they will see two flags—one, the 100 per cent pennant issued by the Liberty loan committee, and the other the service flag of the orchestra. The Symphony Orchestra and the employees of Symphony Hall went over the top in the Liberty loan Friday. Every member of the orchestra and every employee in Symphony Hall bought bonds. The total for the organization was $15,150, which averaged something more than $100 for each individual.

The service flag contains eleven stars, which represent nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff who have so far entered the service of the United States or the Allies. Georges Grisez, first clarinet of the orchestra until 1914, has been in service as a brancardier since the beginning of the war and has been practically all of the time in the East. He went through the campaign of Gallipoli, and when the Allied armies established themselves at Salonica he accompanied them and has been there since. Pierre Fossé, third oboe in the season of 1913-14, went into the French army in August, 1914, served with the Forty-Second Regiment of Territorials for several months, and since then has been French interpreter with the British forces. Paul Mimart, second clarinet for many years, left Boston last July and is now with his regiment on the front in France.

Modeste Alloo, a Belgian subject, first trombone, for the past year has been director and trainer of bands at Camp Devens. André Gietzen, another Belgian subject, joined the American Army as interpreter last winter. Leslie J. Rogers, librarian of the orchestra, Charles Pinfield, Joseph Lewirtz and Samuel Rosen, violinists, entered the Army last summer in the draft. Leon Roby of the business staff has been in France as a sergeant in the Quartermaster's Corps since August, 1917, and Miss Florence Hayford, also of the business staff, sailed early this month for Red Cross service overseas.

There are also in the orchestra seven veterans of the French service, not including Mr. Monteux, who is conducting the early concerts and who had twenty-five months' active service at the beginning of the war. These veterans, not represented by stars on the service flag, are Ferdinand Zillois, violin; Claude Barrier, first viola, who was fourteen months in active service, which was followed by twenty-two months in the hospital; Georges Miquelle, cellist; Georges Mager, viola; Louis Speyer, oboe

HERALD OCTOBER 24

BOSTON HAS A FRENCH CONDUCTOR

(From the Nation.)

When Maj. Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881 he decided to spare no expense in making it as good as possible. Most of the violinists were secured in Vienna, while for his players of wood-wind instruments he went to France, which had long been famed for its flutists, clarinetists, oboeists and bassoonists. The successive conductors—Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler and Muck—came from Germany and Austria-Hungary. In view of the fact that these two countries have produced more first-class orchestral compositions than all other lands put together, it cannot, perhaps, be said that German music was unduly favored on the program of this organization. Most of the conductors named were fairly in sympathy with the spirit of French music, too. Nevertheless, one could not but wonder what the result would be if, in place of a Teuton or a Magyar, the Boston orchestra had, in addition to its wood-winds, a chef d'orchestre from Paris.

This curiosity is to be gratified during the present season. Two Frenchmen have been engaged, Pierre Monteux for October and Henri Rabaud for the remaining concerts, not only in Boston, but for those given on tour in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, which last-named city is now again open to this organization. The orchestra has been unionized, and of the new members as many as possible were recruited in France. Judges who have attended rehearsals think the ensemble will soon be as good as ever.

Except in Boston, Pierre Monteux will not be heard at the head of the Boston orchestra. His duties as conductor of the French operas at the Metropolitan Opera House prevent his acceptance of the post in Boston for more than a month. Nor is the conductorship of M. Rabaud to last longer than a year, for it is reported from Boston that Arturo Toscanini is to succeed him next year. He had promised to conduct "Nero," the posthumous opera of the late Arrigo Boito, in Rome, which prevents him from coming to Boston now. In Italy this temperamental wielder of the baton is esteemed equally in concert hall and opera house. On this side of the Atlantic he still has to win his spurs as a purely orchestral conductor.

It by no means follows that because Boston's two new conductors are patriotic Frenchmen they will eschew all German music. M. Monteux has announced that he will have none of Richard Struss or even of Richard Wagner, because of his foolish farce on the subject of the capitulation of Paris in 1871. But the older masters are not to be boycotted. M. Rabaud's intentions are not yet made known at this writing, but it is a safe surmise that he will not punish such innocent masters as Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven for the crimes of the present day. At the same time one cannot but hope that he will give certain overworked Teutonic symphonies and overtures a well-earned rest, substituting for them neglected masterworks of France and other countries. There are plenty of these, and it will be a delight to hear those that come from Paris interpreted in the true Gallic fashion. It is one of the paradoxes of music that only a Frenchman can quite reproduce the exact spirit and esprit of French music, whereas the best interpreters of German orchestral and operatic music have usually been Hungarians.

Between Bizet, Gounod, Berlioz, Debussy, Dukas, and Ravel there is a wide divergence of styles which will test the versatility of M. Rabaud. While he is best known as an operatic composer, he is far from being without experience as a conductor. It is almost superfluous to say that he is a product of the Paris Conservatoire, and, like nearly all prominent French composers, a winner of the Prix de Rome. Among his teachers was Massenet, from whom he acquired the knack of scoring an opera fluently. Of his three best-known operas, "La fille de Roland" (1904), "Le premier Glaive" (1908), and "Marouf" (1914), only the last is known in this country. It was produced at the Metropolitan with considerable success. For several years he has served as one of the conductors of the Paris Grand Opera. In appearance as well as in his music he is thoroughly French, and in the present temper of the public is sure of a cordial welcome.

HENRY T. FINCK.

TRANSCRIPT OCTOBER 21

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Dukas's "Peri," First "Novelty" of the Year at the Symphony Concerts—The Legend and the Piece—Mme. Galli-Curci's Return—Items and Opinions

DUKAS'S tone-poem, "The Peri," to be heard for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday next, was written in the days in which Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet was at the height of vogue in Paris. The manager was eager (as he said) that French composers should contribute to the repertory of his company; while they were nothing loth to experiment with the new and fashionable mimodrama. Debussy undertook one piece, ultimately seen and heard as "Jeux"; Ravel prepared another, the now celebrated "Daphnis and Chloe"; Reynaldo Hahn made a third, produced as 'The Blue God"; Dukas set his hand to a fourth, "The Peri." When, however, he delivered the manuscript to Mr. Diaghilev, it appeared that there were but two parts in the "dance-poem"—one for a man, one for a woman. The composer insisted that Miss Trouhanova, a Russian dancer but not of Mr. Diaghilev's forces, should have the woman's part, while Mr. Nijinsky was to mime the man. The manager declined to accept Miss Trouhanova and he decried "The Peri" as a music too symphonic for the theatre. Dukas was unyielding and recalled the score. Subsequently, in the spring and the summer of 1912, Miss Trouhanova produced "The Peri" in a "Dance-Concert" at the Chatelet whence it passed, for a few performances, to the Opéra-Comique. Again, the powers that were, on both sides of the footlights, judged the piece too symphonic for the stage. Seldom since has it been heard anywhere and then as a tone-poem of the concert-room. Mr. Monteux was to have conducted in "The Peri" in Paris for the Russian Ballet. Now, by curious turn of the wheel of chance, he will lead in it at Boston with the Symphony Orchestra.

In Persian folk-lore, a Peri is a fairy of a beauty that troubles and possesses the hearts of men when, in the secret places of the world, they look upon her. To such folk-tales Dukas went for the background of his "dance-poem," finally evolving a fable in which it comes to pass that Iskender, the king, foresaw approaching death. His star—the Magic said—was paling in the heavens. If he would live, he must go forth and seek the Flower of Immortality. For twelve years he sought the Flower in vain, until he came at last to the ends of the earth, to that place where the world and the sea and the clouds are one. And there on the steps which lead to Ormuzd, a Peri lay sleeping in her robe of precious stones. A star twinkled above her head; on her breast lay her lute, and the Flower shone in her hand. Now the Flower was a lotus, like an emerald, glimmering and pulsing as the sea in the morning light. And Iskender bent noiselessly over the sleeper and without waking her stole the flower, which became suddenly in his hands like the sky at noon over the forests of Ghilan. But presently the Peri, opening her eyes, struck the palms of her hands together and cried out, for she could not then rise towards the lights of Ormuzd. And Iskender, looking upon her, beheld her face, which surpassed in beauty the face of his beloved Gurdaferrid.

As the king gazed the Peri knew his thoughts; for in his right hand the lotus became crimson as the face of desire. And Iskender was divided between the thirst for immortality and the ravishment of his eyes. For him the Peri danced the dance of the Peris, coming ever nearer and nearer until she touched the face of Iskender, and at last he gave her the Flower without regret. Then the lotus seemed to be of snow and gold like the summit of Elbourz at sunset, and the body of the Peri seemed to melt in the light of the calyx, till nothing was visible but a hand holding upwards the flower of flame. Iskender watched it vanish, perceiving that his end was near. And he felt the shadows come around him.

So runs the mimed action for the stage that is now as "programme" to Dukas's tone-poem. Read in the score, the music seems to evoke the melancholy longing, the introspective languors, the remoteness and eeriness of the fantasmal tale. It weaves atmosphere; shadows forth the two personages; summons the illusion of the wistful encounter of prince and Peri; fades and dies in the pity and pang of the fatalistic end. Nowhere does it court effects of the theatre; nowhere does it fall into the routine of an oriental music. The Dukas, who is practised master of unified symphonic form, binding strand to strand in the expanding web of the tone-poem, speaks from the music. Transparent, luminous as it is, it is rich in the suggestion and ornament that play of harmonies and timbres may lend. And almost everywhere it glows with an ardor and a depth of imagination beyond his other symphonic pieces, comparable, rather, with the like qualities in his music-drama, "Ariana and Bluebeard" when it mounts highest and richest. In this glow his melodic invention basks; under it, his fancy warms into new graces; so heated, he kindles illudes, touches his hearers.

Here in Boston

When the public of the Symphony Concerts looks upon the orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening for the first times, it will see that Mr. Monteux has made appreciable changes in the arrangement of the players upon the stage. The whole band sits more closely together than it used to do, while the front ranks of the two choirs of violins more nearly enclose the conductor; the two harps have receded from the edge of the platform to the left wing, as it were, of the orchestra; the wood-wind choir, in the centre, no longer runs in horizontal but in vertical lines—oboe behind oboe instead of beside it—and flute behind flute. Every conductor has his theory and practice in such matters.

HERALD Oct 20

SOME BOSTON SYMPHONY ARTISTS

Left to Right, Arthur Rubinstein, Piano Soloist; Jacques Thibaud, French Violinist, to Appear in Joint Recital at Symphony Hall Sunday Afternoon, Oct. with Harold Bauer, Pianist.

n EAGLE
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

FRENCH MUSIC HERE.

The coming of the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, which gave its first concert outside of France at the Metropolitan Opera House last night, is a historic incident. It marks the first stage of the French influence which is bound to color both our art and our life for a generation to come, and whose effect will be most quickly and probably most widely felt in the domain of music.

Followed, as it will be in a few months, by the advent of Henry Rabaud as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the visit of these musicians will familiarize our ears with the French style of musical performance and with the French ideals of musical creative and interpretative art. These represent a considerable departure from the style to which we have been accustomed and at first will seem strange to the bulk of our audiences. We shall learn as we listen, however, and accustom ourselves to the greater attention which these musicians give to delicacy and distinction of finish and to the emphasis which M. Messager puts upon the intellectual side of music. At first many Americans will, perhaps, miss the incisiveness of rhythm and the emotional appeal to which they have been accustomed, but they will learn to appreciate the elegance, the beauty of tone and the mental force which mark the French playing, just as they have learned to admire those same qualities in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Indeed, judging by the playing last night and from a brief interview with M. Rabaud which has been cabled to this country, that conductor should find the Boston band, or what is left of it after its contingent of alien enemies has been weeded out, an instrument almost ready-made to his hand. M. Rabaud put his emphasis on the classics as the best means to develop artistic musical education, so that no doubt his programs will retain the masterpieces of that older idealistic Germany before Prussian savagery had obtained dominion and smothered its voices with the cacophonies of Strauss. We shall hear no doubt the symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann and Mozart, along with the French classics and the works of modern French composers. With these M. Rabaud will seek to satisfy the American appetite for novelty of which he says that he is well aware.

If one were to attempt to forecast the effect of the French domination of our musical life, which may be expected for the next dozen years, upon our national musical style, which is still in its formative stages and highly plastic, the guess would be of progress in the direction of greater refinement of expression and clearness of thinking. Vigor we have in plenty, gift for melody and a highly developed instinct for rhythm. These qualities mark much of our music, which is born today only to be forgotten tomorrow. If they shall come to be applied to a foundation of French strength and developed with French elegance as the result of the French invasion, we may see a future for American music quite different from the direction in which it has tended for a generation.

However, speculation for the future is idle, even though attractive. What we have at present is a superb French orchestra through which we can express the profound admiration we have for French character, French endurance and French achievement. Hats off to Messager and the distinguished musicians who accompany him.

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 21,

SYMPHONY TO FLY TWO HONOR FLAGS

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have a record of 100 per cent. in the fighting fourth Liberty loan. Besides this, 11 members of the organization are in the service of the allied governments in the present war. To commemorate these facts, two flags will be unfurled at the first concert to be held on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. One of the flags will be the one issued by the Liberty loan committee to the members for going over the top in regard to the Liberty loan. The total subscriptions amounted to $15,150.

The service flag will contain 11 stars, representing nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff who have so far entered the fighting service of the United States or the allies. Three stars belong to France. Modeste Alloo, a Belgian subject, first trombone of the orchestra, has for the past year been director and trainer of bands at Camp Devens. Much of the work done in regard to the fourth Liberty loan was by Joseph Mann, the librarian. It is fairly safe to state that no large orchestra in the country can show a like record.

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 21,

SOLDIERS IN THE SYMPHONY

Director Monteux and Seven Members of Orchestra Have Taken Part in War—Organization Has Eleven-Star Service Flag

When the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra go into Symphony Hall Friday afternoon for the first concert, they will see two flags—one, the 100 per cent pennant issued by the Liberty loan committee, and the other the service flag of the orchestra. The Symphony Orchestra and the employees of Symphony Hall went over the top in the Liberty loan Friday. Every member of the orchestra and every employee in Symphony Hall bought bonds. The total for the organization was $15,150, which averaged something more than $100 for each individual.

The service flag contains eleven stars, which represent nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff who have so far entered the service of the United States or the Allies. Georges Grisez, first clarinet of the orchestra until 1914, has been in service as a brancardier since the beginning of the war and has been practically all of the time in the East. He went through the campaign of Gallipoli, and when the Allied armies established themselves at Salonica he accompanied them and has been there since. Pierre Fossé, third oboe in the season of 1913-14, went into the French army in August, 1914, served with the Forty-Second Regiment of Territorials for several months, and since then has been French interpreter with the British forces. Paul Mimart, second clarinet for many years, left Boston last July and is now with his regiment on the front in France.

Modeste Alloo, a Belgian subject, first trombone, for the past year has been director and trainer of bands at Camp Devens. André Gietzen, another Belgian subject, joined the American Army as interpreter last winter. Leslie J. Rogers, librarian of the orchestra, Charles Pinfield, Joseph Lewirtz and Samuel Rosen, violinists, entered the Army last summer in the draft. Leon Roby of the business staff has been in France as a sergeant in the Quartermaster's Corps since August, 1917, and Miss Florence Hayford, also of the business staff, sailed early this month for Red Cross service overseas.

There are also in the orchestra seven veterans of the French service, not including Mr. Monteux, who is conducting the early concerts and who had twenty-five months' active service at the beginning of the war. These veterans, not represented by stars on the service flag, are Ferdinand Pillois, violin; Claude Barrier, first viola, who was fourteen months in active service which was followed by twenty-two months in the hospital; Georges Miquelle, 'cellist; Georges Mager, viola; Louis Speyer, oboe; Emile St...

HERALD OCTOBER 24

BOSTON HAS A FRENCH CONDUCTOR

(From the Nation.)

When Maj. Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881 he decided to spare no expense in making it as good as possible. Most of the violinists were secured in Vienna, while for his players of wood-wind instruments he went to France, which had long been famed for its flutists, clarinetists, oboeists and bassoonists. The successive conductors—Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler and Muck—came from Germany and Austria-Hungary. In view of the fact that these two countries have produced more first-class orchestral compositions than all other lands put together, it cannot, perhaps, be said that German music was unduly favored on the program of this organization. Most of the conductors named were fairly in sympathy with the spirit of French music, too. Nevertheless, one could not but wonder what the result would be if, in place of a Teuton or a Magyar, the Boston orchestra had, in addition to its wood-winds, a chef d'orchestre from Paris.

This curiosity is to be gratified during the present season. Two Frenchmen have been engaged, Pierre Monteux for October and Henri Rabaud for the remaining concerts, not only in Boston, but for those given on tour in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, which last-named city is now again open to this organization. The orchestra has been unionized, and of the new members as many as possible were recruited in France. Judges who have attended rehearsals think the ensemble will soon be as good as ever.

Except in Boston, Pierre Monteux will not be heard at the head of the Boston orchestra. His duties as conductor of the French operas at the Metropolitan Opera House prevent his acceptance of the post in Boston for more than a month. Nor is the conductorship of M. Rabaud to last longer than a year, for it is reported from Boston that Arturo Toscanini is to succeed him next year. He had promised to conduct "Nero," the posthumous opera of the late Arrigo Boito, in Rome, which prevents him from coming to Boston now. In Italy this temperamental wielder of the baton is esteemed equally in concert hall and opera house. On this side of the Atlantic he still has to win his spurs as a purely orchestral conductor.

It by no means follows that because Boston's two new conductors are patriotic Frenchmen they will eschew all German music. M. Monteux has announced that he will have none of Richard Struss or even of Richard Wagner, because of his foolish farce on the subject of the capitulation of Paris in 1871. But the older masters are not to be boycotted. M. Rabaud's intentions are not yet made known at this writing, but it is a safe surmise that he will not punish such innocent masters as Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven for the crimes of the present day. At the same time one cannot but hope that he will give certain overworked Teutonic symphonies and overtures a well-earned rest, substituting for them neglected masterworks of France and other countries. There are plenty of these, and it will be a delight to hear those that come from Paris interpreted in the true Gallic fashion. It is one of the paradoxes of music that only a Frenchman can quite reproduce the exact spirit and esprit of French music, whereas the best interpreters of German orchestral and operatic music have usually been Hungarians.

Between Bizet, Gounod, Berlioz, Debussy, Dukas, and Ravel there is a wide divergence of styles which will test the versatility of M. Rabaud. While he is best known as an operatic composer, he is far from being without experience as a conductor. It is almost superfluous to say that he is a product of the Paris Conservatoire, and, like nearly all prominent French composers, a winner of the Prix de Rome. Among his teachers was Massenet, from whom he acquired the knack of scoring an opera fluently. Of his three best-known operas, "La fille de Roland" (1904), "Le premier Glaive" (1908), and "Marouf" (1914), only the last is known in this country. It was produced at the Metropolitan with considerable success. For several years he has served as one of the conductors of the Paris Grand Opera. In appearance as well as in his music he is thoroughly French, and in the present temper of the public is sure of a cordial welcome.

HENRY T. FINCK.

TRANSCRIPT OCTOBER 21

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Dukas's "Peri," First "Novelty" of the Year at the Symphony Concerts—The Legend and the Piece—Mme. Galli-Curci's Return—Items and Opinions

DUKAS'S tone-poem, "The Peri," to be heard for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday next, was written in the days in which Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet was at the height of vogue in Paris. The manager was eager (as he said) that French composers should contribute to the repertory of his company; while they were nothing loth to experiment with the new and fashionable mimodrama. Debussy undertook one piece, ultimately seen and heard as "Jeux"; Ravel prepared another, the now celebrated "Daphnis and Chloe"; Reynaldo Hahn made a third, produced as 'The Blue God"; Dukas set his hand to a fourth, "The Peri." When, however, he delivered the manuscript to Mr. Diaghilev, it appeared that there were but two parts in the "dance-poem"—one for a man, one for a woman. The composer insisted that Miss Trouhanova, a Russian dancer but not of Mr. Diaghilev's forces, should have the woman's part, while Mr. Nijinsky was to mime the man. The manager declined to accept Miss Trouhanova and he decried "The Peri" as a music too symphonic for the theatre. Dukas was unyielding and recalled the score. Subsequently, in the spring and the summer of 1912, Miss Trouhanova produced "The Peri" in a "Dance-Concert" at the Chatelet whence it passed, for a few performances, to the Opéra-Comique. Again, the powers that were, on both sides of the footlights, judged the piece too symphonic for the stage. Seldom since has it been heard anywhere and then as a tone-poem of the concert-room. Mr. Monteux was to have conducted in "The Peri" in Paris for the Russian Ballet. Now, by curious turn of the wheel of chance, he will lead in it at Boston with the Symphony Orchestra.

In Persian folk-lore, a Peri is a fairy of a beauty that troubles and possesses the hearts of men when, in the secret places of the world, they look upon her. To such folk-tales Dukas went for the background of his "dance-poem," finally evolving a fable in which it comes to pass that Iskender, the king, foresaw approaching death. His star—the Magic said—was paling in the heavens. If he would live, he must go forth and seek the Flower of Immortality. For twelve years he sought the Flower in vain, until he came at last to the ends of the earth, to that place where the world and the sea and the clouds are one. And there on the steps which lead to Ormuzd, a Peri lay sleeping in her robe of precious stones. A star twinkled above her head; on her breast lay her lute, and the Flower shone in her hand. Now the Flower was a lotus, like an emerald, glimmering and pulsing as the sea in the morning light. And Iskender bent noiselessly over the sleeper and without waking her stole the flower, which became suddenly in his hands like the sky at noon over the forests of Ghilan. But presently the Peri, opening her eyes, struck the palms of her hands together and cried out, for she could not then rise towards the lights of Ormuzd. And Iskender, looking upon her, beheld her face, which surpassed in beauty the face of his beloved Gurdaferrid.

As the king gazed the Peri knew his thoughts; for in his right hand the lotus became crimson as the face of desire. And Iskender was divided between the thirst for immortality and the ravishment of his eyes. For him the Peri danced the dance of the Peris, coming ever nearer and nearer until she touched the face of Iskender, and at last he gave her the Flower without regret. Then the lotus seemed to be of snow and gold like the summit of Elbourz at sunset, and the body of the Peri seemed to melt in the light of the calyx, till nothing was visible but a hand holding upwards the flower of flame. Iskender watched it vanish, perceiving that his end was near. And he felt the shadows come around him.

So runs the mimed action for the stage that is now as "programme" to Dukas's tone-poem. Read in the score, the music seems to evoke the melancholy longings, the introspective languors, the remoteness and eeriness of the fantasmal tale. It weaves atmosphere; shadows forth the two personages; summons the illusion of the wistful encounter of prince and Peri; fades and dies in the pity and pang of the fatalistic end. Nowhere does it court effects of the theatre; nowhere does it fall into the routine of an oriental music. The Dukas, who is practised master of unified symphonic form, binding strand to strand in the expanding web of the tone-poem, speaks from the music. Transparent, luminous as it is, it is rich in the suggestion and ornament that play of harmonies and timbres may lend. And almost everywhere it glows with an ardor and a depth of imagination beyond his other symphonic pieces, comparable, rather, with the like qualities in his music-drama, "Ariana and Bluebeard" when it mounts highest and richest. In this glow his melodic invention basks; under it, his fancy warms into new graces; so heated, he kindles illudes, touches his hearers.

Here in Boston

When the public of the Symphony Concerts looks upon the orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening for the first times, it will see that Mr. Monteux has made appreciable changes in the arrangement of the players upon the stage. The whole band sits more closely together than it used to do, while the front ranks of the two choirs of violins more nearly enclose the conductor; the two harps have receded from the edge of the platform to the left wing, as it were, of the orchestra; the wood-wind choir, in the centre, no longer runs in horizontal but in vertical lines—oboe behind oboe instead of beside it—and flute behind flute. Every conductor has his theory and practice in such matters.

HERALD Oct 20

SOME BOSTON SYMPHONY ARTISTS

Left to Right, Arthur Rubinstein, Piano Soloist; Jacques Thibaud, French Violinist, to Appear in Joint Recital at Symphony Hall Sunday Afternoon, Oct. with Harold Bauer, Pianist.

n EAGLE

ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

FRENCH MUSIC HERE.

The coming of the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, which gave its first concert outside of France at the Metropolitan Opera House last night, is a historic incident. It marks the first stage of the French influence which is bound to color both our art and our life for a generation to come, and whose effect will be most quickly and probably most widely felt in the domain of music.

Followed, as it will be in a few months, by the advent of Henry Rabaud as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the visit of these musicians will familiarize our ears with the French style of musical performance and with the French ideals of musical creative and interpretative art. These represent a considerable departure from the style to which we have been accustomed and at first will seem strange to the bulk of our audiences. We shall learn as we listen, however, and accustom ourselves to the greater attention which these musicians give to delicacy and distinction of finish and to the emphasis which M. Messager puts upon the intellectual side of music. At first many Americans will, perhaps, miss the incisiveness of rhythm and the emotional appeal to which they have been accustomed, but they will learn to appreciate the elegance, the beauty of tone and the mental force which mark the French playing, just as they have learned to admire those same qualities in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Indeed, judging by the playing last night and from a brief interview with M. Rabaud which has been cabled to this country, that conductor should find the Boston band, or what is left of it after its contingent of alien enemies has been weeded out, an instrument almost ready-made to his hand. M. Rabaud put his emphasis on the classics as the best means to develop artistic musical education, so that no doubt his programs will retain the masterpieces of that older idealistic [illegible] many before Prussian savagery [illegible] obtained dominion and smothered [illegible] the cacophonies of [illegible] ear no doubt the [illegible] Schumann [illegible] French [illegible]

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 21,

SYMPHONY TO FLY TWO HONOR FLAGS

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have a record of 100 per cent. in the fighting fourth Liberty loan. Besides this, 11 members of the organization are in the service of the allied governments in the present war. To commemorate these facts, two flags will be unfurled at the first concert to be held on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. One of the flags will be the one issued by the Liberty loan committee to the members for going over the top in regard to the Liberty loan. The total subscriptions amounted to $15,150.

The service flag will contain 11 stars, representing nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff who have so far entered the fighting service of the United States or the allies. Three stars belong to France. Modeste Alloo, a Belgian subject, first trombone of the orchestra, has for the past year been director and trainer of bands at Camp Devens. Much of the work done in regard to the fourth Liberty loan was by Joseph Mann, the librarian. It is fairly safe to state that no large orchestra in the country can show a like record.

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 21,

SOLDIERS IN THE SYMPHONY

Director Monteux and Seven Members of Orchestra Have Taken Part in War—Organization Has Eleven-Star Service Flag

When the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra go into Symphony Hall Friday afternoon for the first concert, they will see two flags—one, the 100 per cent pennant issued by the Liberty loan committee, and the other the service flag of the orchestra. The Symphony Orchestra and the employees of Symphony Hall went over the top in the Liberty loan Friday. Every member of the orchestra and every employee in Symphony Hall bought bonds. The total for the organization was $15,150, which averaged something more than $100 for each individual.

The service flag contains eleven stars, which represent nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff who have so far entered the service of the United States or the Allies. Georges Grisez, first clarinet of the orchestra until 1914, has been in service as a brancardier since the beginning of the war and has been practically all of the time in the East. He went through the campaign of Gallipoli, and when the Allied armies established themselves at Salonica he accompanied them and has been there since. Pierre Fossé, third oboe in the season of 1913-14, went into the French army in August, 1914, served with the Forty-Second Regiment of Territorials for several months, and since then has been French interpreter with the British forces. Paul Mimart, second clarinet for many years, left Boston last July and is now with his regiment on the front in France.

Modeste Alloo, a Belgian subject, first trombone, for the past year has been director and trainer of bands at Camp Devens. André Gietzen, another Belgian subject, joined the American Army as interpreter last winter. Leslie J. Rogers, librarian of the orchestra, Charles Pinfield, Joseph Gewirtz and Samuel Rosen, violinists, entered the Army last summer in the draft. Leon Roby of the business staff has been in France as a sergeant in the Quartermaster's Corps since August, 1917, and Miss Florence Hayford, also of the business staff, sailed early this month for Red Cross service overseas.

There are also in the orchestra seven veterans of the French service, not including Mr. Monteux, who is conducting the early concerts and who had twenty-five months' active service at the beginning of the war. These veterans, not represented by stars on the service flag, are Ferdinand Thillois, violin; Claude Barrier, first viola who was fourteen months in active service which was followed by twenty-two months in the hospital; Georges Miquelle, 'cellist Georges Mager, viola; Louis Speyer, oboe

HERALD OCTOBER 24

BOSTON HAS A FRENCH CONDUCTOR

(From the Nation.)

When Maj. Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881 he decided to spare no expense in making it as good as possible. Most of the violinists were secured in Vienna, while for his players of wood-wind instruments he went to France, which had long been famed for its flutists, clarinetists, oboeists and bassoonists. The successive conductors—Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler and Muck—came from Germany and Austria-Hungary. In view of the fact that these two countries have produced more first-class orchestral compositions than all other lands put together, it cannot, perhaps, be said that German music was unduly favored on the program of this organization. Most of the conductors named were fairly in sympathy with the spirit of French music, too. Nevertheless, one could not but wonder what the result would be if, in place of a Teuton or a Magyar, the Boston orchestra had, in addition to its wood-winds, a chef d'orchestre from Paris.

This curiosity is to be gratified during the present season. Two Frenchmen have been engaged, Pierre Monteux for October and Henri Rabaud for the remaining concerts, not only in Boston, but for those given on tour in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, which last-named city is now again open to this organization. The orchestra has been unionized, and of the new members as many as possible were recruited in France. Judges who have attended rehearsals think the ensemble will soon be as good as ever.

Except in Boston, Pierre Monteux will not be heard at the head of the Boston orchestra. His duties as conductor of the French operas at the Metropolitan Opera House prevent his acceptance of the post in Boston for more than a month. Nor is the conductorship of M. Rabaud to last longer than a year, for it is reported from Boston that Arturo Toscanini is to succeed him next year. He had promised to conduct "Nero," the posthumous opera of the late Arrigo Boito, in Rome, which prevents him from coming to Boston now. In Italy this temperamental wielder of the baton is esteemed equally in concert hall and opera house. On this side of the Atlantic he still has to win his spurs as a purely orchestral conductor.

It by no means follows that because Boston's two new conductors are patriotic Frenchmen they will eschew all German music. M. Monteux has announced that he will have none of Richard Struss or even of Richard Wagner, because of his foolish farce on the subject of the capitulation of Paris in 1871. But the older masters are not to be boycotted. M. Rabaud's intentions are not yet made known at this writing, but it is a safe surmise that he will not punish such innocent masters as Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven for the crimes of the present day. At the same time one cannot but hope that he will give certain overworked Teutonic symphonies and overtures a well-earned rest, substituting for them neglected masterworks of France and other countries. There are plenty of these, and it will be a delight to hear those that come from Paris interpreted in the true Gallic fashion. It is one of the paradoxes of music that only a Frenchman can quite reproduce the exact spirit and esprit of French music, whereas the best interpreters of German orchestral and operatic music have usually been Hungarians.

Between Bizet, Gounod, Berlioz, Debussy, Dukas, and Ravel there is a wide divergence of styles which will test the versatility of M. Rabaud. While he is best known as an operatic composer, he is far from being without experience as a conductor. It is almost superfluous to say that he is a product of the Paris Conservatoire, and, like nearly all prominent French composers, a winner of the Prix de Rome. Among his teachers was Massenet, from whom he acquired the knack of scoring an opera fluently. Of his three best-known opéras, "La fille de Roland" (1904), "Le premier Glaive" (1908), and "Marouf" (1914), only the last is known in this country. It was produced at the Metropolitan with considerable success. For several years he has served as one of the conductors of the Paris Grand Opera. In appearance as well as in his music he is thoroughly French, and in the present temper of the public is sure of a cordial welcome.

HENRY T. FINCK.

TRANSCRIPT OCTOBER 21

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Dukas's "Peri," First "Novelty" of the Year at the Symphony Concerts—The Legend and the Piece—Mme. Galli-Curci's Return—Items and Opinions

DUKAS'S tone-poem, "The Peri," to be heard for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday next, was written in the days in which Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet was at the height of vogue in Paris. The manager was eager (as he said) that French composers should contribute to the repertory of his company; while they were nothing loth to experiment with the new and fashionable mimodrama. Debussy undertook one piece, ultimately seen and heard as "Jeux"; Ravel prepared another, the now celebrated "Daphnis and Chloe"; Reynaldo Hahn made a third, produced as 'The Blue God"; Dukas set his hand to a fourth, "The Peri." When, however, he delivered the manuscript to Mr. Diaghilev, it appeared that there were but two parts in the "dance-poem"—one for a man, one for a woman. The composer insisted that Miss Trouhanova, a Russian dancer but not of Mr. Diaghilev's forces, should have the woman's part, while Mr. Nijinsky was to mime the man. The manager declined to accept Miss Trouhanova and he decried "The Peri" as a music too symphonic for the theatre. Dukas was unyielding and recalled the score. Subsequently, in the spring and the summer of 1912, Miss Trouhanova produced "The Peri" in a "Dance-Concert" at the Chatelet whence it passed, for a few performances, to the Opéra-Comique. Again, the powers that were, on both sides of the footlights, judged the piece too symphonic for the stage. Seldom since has it been heard anywhere and then as a tone-poem of the concert-room. Mr. Monteux was to have conducted in "The Peri" in Paris for the Russian Ballet. Now, by curious turn of the wheel of chance, he will lead in it at Boston with the Symphony Orchestra.

In Persian folk-lore, a Peri is a fairy of a beauty that troubles and possesses the hearts of men when, in the secret places of the world, they look upon her. To such folk-tales Dukas went for the background of his "dance-poem," finally evolving a fable in which it comes to pass that Iskender, the king, foresaw approaching death. His star—the Magic said—was paling in the heavens. If he would live, he must go forth and seek the Flower of Immortality. For twelve years he sought the Flower in vain, until he came at last to the ends of the earth, to that place where the world and the sea and the clouds are one. And there on the steps which lead to Ormuzd, a Peri lay sleeping in her robe of precious stones. A star twinkled above her head; on her breast lay her lute, and the Flower shone in her hand. Now the Flower was a lotus, like an emerald, glimmering and pulsing as the sea in the morning light. And Iskender bent noiselessly over the sleeper and without waking her stole the flower, which became suddenly in his hands like the sky at noon over the forests of Ghilan. But presently the Peri, opening her eyes, struck the palms of her hands together and cried out, for she could not then rise towards the lights of Ormuzd. And Iskender, looking upon her, beheld her face, which surpassed in beauty the face of his beloved Gurdaferrid.

As the king gazed the Peri knew his thoughts; for in his right hand the lotus became crimson as the face of desire. And Iskender was divided between the thirst for immortality and the ravishment of his eyes. For him the Peri danced the dance of the Peris, coming ever nearer and nearer until she touched the face of Iskender, and at last he gave her the Flower without regret. Then the lotus seemed to be of snow and gold like the summit of Elbourz at sunset, and the body of the Peri seemed to melt in the light of the calyx, till nothing was visible but a hand holding upwards the flower of flame. Iskender watched it vanish, perceiving that his end was near. And he felt the shadows come around him.

So runs the mimed action for the stage that is now as "programme" to Dukas's tone-poem. Read in the score, the music seems to evoke the melancholy longing, the introspective languors, the remoteness and eeriness of the fantasmal tale. It weaves atmosphere; shadows forth the two personages; summons the illusion of the wistful encounter of prince and Peri; fades and dies in the pity and pang of the fatalistic end. Nowhere does it court effects of the theatre; nowhere does it fall into the routine of an oriental music. The Dukas, who is practised master of unified symphonic form, binding strand to strand in the expanding web of the tone-poem, speaks from the music. Transparent, luminous as it is, it is rich in the suggestion and ornament that play of harmonies and timbres may lend. And almost everywhere it glows with an ardor and a depth of imagination beyond his other symphonic pieces, comparable, rather, with the like qualities in his music-drama, "Ariana and Bluebeard" when it mounts highest and richest. In this glow his melodic invention basks; under it, his fancy warms into new graces; so heated, he kindles illudes, touches his hearers.

Here in Boston

When the public of the Symphony Concerts looks upon the orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening for the first times, it will see that Mr. Monteux has made appreciable changes in the arrangement of the players upon the stage. The whole band sits more closely together than it used to do, while the front ranks of the two choirs of violins more nearly enclose the conductor; the two harps have receded from the edge of the platform to the left wing, as it were, of the orchestra; the wood-wind choir, in the centre, no longer runs in horizontal but in vertical lines—oboe behind oboe instead of beside it—and flute behind flute. Every conductor has his theory and practice in such matters.

REDUCTION RATIO

16x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, this city, during the coming winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving; therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday morning, October 21, at the Heppe piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin, the distinguished violinist, who is now the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

NEWS
ess: Baltimore, Md.

RABAUD PROUD OF HONOR

French Conductor Outlines His Program For Boston Orchestra.

(Special Paris Cable Dispatch to the New York Herald.)

Henry Rabaud, who will take the place of Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said he expected to start soon for the United States; that he felt highly honored at being asked to lead such a fine body of musicians; that his program would be to give the music which he considered the most beautiful—namely, the great classics—and also works of the modern masters.

"I know Americans love novelty," he said, "but while satisfying this legitimate taste it must not be forgotten that our role is to develop artistic musical education. The best means of doing this is by the execution of the classics."

Of his work in Boston he said his primary aim would be to obtain perfection of execution.

EVENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.

The Three Arts

AND now comes further news of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the subscription books for the Baltimore concert at which will be opened next Monday. These entertainments will be given in the Lyric as usual, and on the Wednesday evenings hitherto announced, November 6, December 4, January 8 and March 19, and on one Tuesday evening, February 11.

Since last spring this splendid and justly famous orchestra has been entirely reorganized and is being presented under what is now popularly spoken of as a "100 per cent." American management. For the first time in its history the orchestra comes here with an American concert master—in these days the familiar and almost tender word concertmeister is naturally taboo—a young violinist named Frederic Fradkin. Also, it is to be noted that for the first time in its history the orchestra will be under the direction of French conductors.

At the first concert, in November, the baton will be held by Pierre Monteux, who is the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House and who will be the "guest" conductor until Henri Rabaud, who will permanently direct the orchestra and who is now in France in a few days, arrives in this country.

It will be of special interest to hear this Monteux, and for this reason I happened a day or so ago to meet a Baltimorean who is deeply versed in musical matters and who, in talking to converse, my interlocutor told me that, had I heard Monteux conduct a lustily assembled orchestra in New York, I would have been perfectly amazed at the completeness of his authority and the significance of his work, as well as illuminated by the beauty and inspiration of his reading of a Beethoven symphony. Such news of a conductor who has made a particular "mark" in classic work rather fires one with eagerness to "assist" at his Baltimore debut.

In the ranks of the Boston Orchestra since it was last heard here there have been changes affecting 25 per cent. of the membership. The Hun has been entirely eliminated, the vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft having been filled, for the most part, by young and enthusiastic musicians, many of whom are Italian-Americans, though several artists who are now included in the brass and wood-wind choirs have been corralled from the celebrated French military band that played here earlier in the season. Rehearsals have been progressing in Boston for the past month in spite of the "flu," and it is said that the tonal quality of the orchestra has never before been more beautiful, and that the discipline of the band and its technical perfection have never attained a higher notch.

For the forthcoming season four important soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Mme. Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is an Englishwoman who is spoken of as one of the most interesting of the younger generation of lyric sopranos. She will be heard here at the November concert. Melba, returning from Australia for a short concert tour, will sing at a later date. Fradkin, the orchestra's concert master, is a native of Troy, N. Y. Early in his career he went to Paris, where he studied at the Conservatoire, winning a "first prize," which means much in a musical career. Later he returned to this country as concert master of the orchestra organized to tour the States with the Ballet Russe. Fradkin is said to play with the peculiar elegance that is so marked a characteristic of the better French violinists.

Mr. Rubinstein is the season's pianist. During 1905-06, when he was only 19, he toured this country and made a most interesting impression. Since then he has spent most of his time abroad, although for the past year he has been in South America. As he is regarded as one of the pianistic "giants," his coming appearance with the Boston Orchestra will doubtless be one of the notable musical events of the winter.

J. O. L.

TELEGRAPH OCTO

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER ARRIVES

Henri Rabaud, Chosen to Succeed Dr. Muck, Reaches American Port on French Liner.

TO CONDUCT FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

Among the 197 passengers who arrived on a French liner at an American port yesterday was Henri Rabaud, the French conductor selected to head the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the committee, after Dr. Karl Muck, the German head, had been removed and later interned as an enemy alien.

Henri Rabaud is the chef d'orchestra of the National Opera House in Paris and is virtually here on a leave of absence from that institution. He is 43 years old. He said last night that until he sees the members of the committee in Boston, he will not know the program for the season, but it is probable that the orchestra will offer some novelties during the Winter.

M. Rabaud won the Grand Prix de Rome in 1890, and is the composer of the opera, "Maroni," which had its premiere in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House last year. He is also the composer of a number of symphonic poems, to use his own words.

RECORD Oct 26

OVATION FOR SYMPHONY AT FIRST CONCERT

Monteux in Brilliant Performance—Some Innovations

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. First concert of the 38th season, yesterday afternoon, Pierre Monteux, temporary conductor, conducting. Symphony Hall. The program:—

Franck, Symphony in D Minor.
Schumann, Overture to "Manfred."
Dukas, "Le Peri."
Debussy, "Iberia."

The audience wished to show in every way possible its joy at the resumption of these concerts, its appreciation of the efforts at the reorganization of the orchestra and, after hearing some brilliant playing by the orchestra, of the excellent work of the orchestra under Mr. Monteux.

Strangely enough, however, the first applause of the afternoon did not come for Mr. Monteux or any other of the Frenchmen who have replaced Germans dismissed from the band, but for the returning Alwin Schroeder, long a distinished and honorable citizen of this city. Mr. Schroeder bowed and acknowledged the hearty applause. The first applause should not have been for the veteran 'cellist. It should have been for the management, which modified the lighting. The harsh lighting of the hall was toned. Eye strain, which has previously followed many concerts, was thus prevented.

Mr. Monteux's appearance was the signal for prolonged applause, which he shared with the orchestra. After the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," which Mr. Monteux, like Mr. Messager, plays at a slow, highly dignified tempo, there was again much applause. Then the concert proceeded to the ever-increasing enjoyment of a house which occupied nearly the entire auditorium.

Mr. Monteux did well with the Franck symphony, a symphony which constantly grows in favor with many musicians. He and his musicians were heartily applauded. Then came the Schumann work, which Mr. Monteux, a Frenchman of Frenchmen, may have put on the program to show he was not bigoted in his attitude toward German music. The old overture came heavily from his hand. With the Dukas and the Debussy works, the conductor was again on firm ground. Both of the works were superbly played with the delicacy, the finesse and the brilliancy that the best French orchestra give this modern music.

Mr. Monteux has already made known to Record readers his interest in the Dukas poem and his desire to play it here so that Dukas should not be known solely as the composer of "The Sorcerer Apprentice." The first performance of "Le Peri" revealed it as a typical piece of ballet music, written by a composer who always thought of the narrative to be pantomimed by the dancers and of the gyrations of the premiere danseuse. Hearing "Le Peri," one could see the opera house in the mind's eye and see the ballet danced and pantomimed. The music is a beautiful work with interesting thematic material and a wide variety of color. The drums, the tambourine, cymbals, triangle, xylaphone and celesta are all effectively used. They are not dragged in to make a riot of sound. They belong in the work. An extremely clean cut, very French interpretation was given the work, although, perhaps, there was not displayed in the Dukas poem the vertuosity that characterized the playing of the Debussy images, which he calls "Iberia." Some who love the Debussy of "Pelleas" and of the songs also love "Iberia." We are not of their number. Brilliant it is, but, hearing it once, who yearns for a repetition? Someone has said of "Iberia," "Debussy appears in this work to have exaggerated his tendency to treat music with means of expression analogous to those on the impressionistic painters." The work is all tonal color and sharply defined rythms. There are little blocks of color, little blocks of brilliant tempos. We could carry the comparison to modern painting by saying that in "Iberia" Debussy employs pointism.

This work demands an extraordinarily brilliant interpretation. For the present there is no need of comparing the orchestra as a whole with the orchestra of other years. Fairness to performers, as well as to reviewers, demands that further hearings be given. Suffice to say, that Mr. Monteux has moulded a very brilliant band, especially well suited to the playing of modern French music.

Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster, had little or no chance to display his talents. Short solo passages in "Le Peri" and "Iberia" were played fluently by him. More of Mr. Fradkin anon. Three old friends, Messrs. Longy, Heim and De Mailly—the latter anything but old—distinguished themselves in the Debussy work. Mr. Heim played a single, terrifically difficult passage with perfectly pure intonation. Mr. DeMailly again impressed us as a remarkably brilliant first flute. As for Mr. Longy, the oboe has no greater player. Soloists and members of orchestra come and go, but none come who play with finer phrasing than Mr. Longy employed yesterday and as he has employed for our delight these many years. Mention of individual excellencies would not be complete without a reference to the playing of the English horn by Mr. Mueller in the French symphony.

Mr. Monteux may well be proud of his achievements with a reorganized orchestra. He has drilled his orchestra till he has balance and final tonal quality; but, as one said already, more of the present status of the orchestra later.

For the concerts of Nov. 1 and 2 Mr. Monteux has selected this program; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, A minor; Ravel, poem, "Une Bonne Chanson"; Ravel "Daphnis et Chloe," suite No. 1. Mme. Florence Easton will sing songs by Mozart and Debussy.

HOTEL BELLEVUE

m RECORD
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te OCT 18

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Season In This City Will Offer Customary Five Concerts.

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the Orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn, represented a large number of other men.

Many changes have been made in the personnel. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, American violinist, is now concertmaster. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the Orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein, Russian pianist.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 9 1918

SIX TIMES WITH BOSTON

Florence Easton.

The soprano, the much-admired soprano of the Metropolitan Company, is to sing six times with the Boston Symphony.

SUN, OCTOBER 28

Henri Rabaud, who will replace Dr. Muck (interned as an enemy alien) as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, admitted that he had some "novelties" that he suspected American music lovers might like. He is director of the National Opera in Paris and a composer, his best known work being the opera "Maroni." He is totally unlike the usual German conductor. He is gentle mannered, soft voiced and aesthetic looking. He is tall, slim, olive skinned, wears an iron gray beard and has large, expressive dark eyes. He said he could not tell what his plans might be until he had talked with the Boston committee that has charge of the orchestra.

HERALD OCTOBER 28.

NEW SYMPHONY DIRECTOR ARRIVES

Henri Rabaud Has Several Novelties

[Special Dispatch to Herald and Journal.]

AN ATLANTIC PORT, Oct. 27—Among the passengers arriving today from France on a French steamship was Henri Rabaud, the new director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has come over to replace Dr. Karl Muck. M. Rabaud has been for some years the musical director of the orchestra at the National Opera House, Paris, and is the composer of the French opera "Maroni," performed last season in New York, as well as of a symphony already heard here, and of several symphonic poems. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894 for the excellence of his musical works.

The new director of the Boston Symphony does not in any way look like the customary leader of an orchestra. He is tall, slight, has gray hair, mustache and whiskers, and wears a frock coat, with a small clerical type of wide brimmed soft hat. He does not speak any English at present, he explained, but hopes to learn during the coming season in America. He said he believed he had several novelties, but did not know whether they had been played in the United States.

On this and other matters he preferred to wait until he consulted with the nine trustees who have taken charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Maj. Higginson retired after the dismissal of Dr. Muck.

On the same steamship were two artists for the Metropolitan Opera House, Robert Couzinou, the new French baritone, and Mme. Raymonde Delanois, a young contralto who has sung here for the last four seasons.

GLOBE—OCTOBER 27

Mr Monteux to Conduct Last Concerts This Week

It will be with mingled regret and gratitude that many will hear Mr Monteux conduct the last two symphony concerts this week of his short sojourn here. This admirable musician and conductor and courteous gentleman has performed a great service for the orchestra and for all who regard it with a personal affection and pride. The first concerts revealed the surprising degree, not only to which he had secured amalgamation in new and more or less disintegrated forces, but had drawn from them a spontaneity, air ardor, and, an enriched frolerie of colors which added new elements to the expression of the orchestra.

This week Mr Monteux will show his hand with a classic in a Beethoven symphony. There will be a concession of Mr Loeffler's "Une Bonne Chanson," first played in Mr Gericke's time, but since largely revised and rewritten. Following the second suite of "Daphnis and Chloe," by Ravel, played last year, Mr Monteux will bring to its first hearing in Boston the first suite. It employs a small mixed chorus. These 32 voices from the Boston Symphony chorus have been prepared by Stephen Townsend.

As soloist, Mme Florence Easton will make her first appearance at these concerts. This excellent soprano will be remembered as the Gilda of Mr Savage's English Opera company at the Tremont Theatre 14 years ago, and last season for the good impression of a beautiful voice she gave in the "L'Oracolo" of the Metropolitan company, of which she is a member. Successes in Berlin, London and Chicago had preceded.

The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 7 in A major, Beethoven; air, "Dore Sono" from Figaro's Marriage," Mozart; poeme, "Une Bonne Chanson," Loeffler, recit and air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," Debussy; "Daphnis and Chloe," suite No. 1, Ravel.

Cambridge Symphony Concert

The first Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be that master pianist Josef Hofmann, who will play Chopin's Concerto for piano and orchestra in E minor. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's 7th Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia." Mr Monteux will conduct.

n TRIBUNE
ress New York City
0 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French musician, who is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on his way from France and is expected to arrive this week. He will go at once to Boston, but his activities with the orchestra will not begin until November 11, when he will old his first rehearsal. Owing to the uncertainty of his arrival, arrangements were made with Mr. Gatti-Casazza whereby Pierre Monteux could stay with the orchestra through its first Southern trip, and he will therefore conduct the first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, on November 7 and 9. The opening of its season in Boston has been postponed for two weeks on account of the prevailing influenza, but Mr. Monteux has held rehearsals daily, with excellent results.

ess: New York City
Aug 10 1918

Raband and Messager—A Meeting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has postponed for two weeks now, until next Friday, the opening of its home season. This was due to the prevailing influenza, which it is hoped will have abated before the men come here on tour.

"There is the usual waiting list of prospective patrons—a list which, curiously enough, despite unfavorable conditions, has grown greatly during the last Summer," concludes the first official statement of the Boston Symphony plans in New York. Subscribers to last year's concerts have had an option until yesterday to retain their seats at Carnegie Hall. The prospectus recites again those events which led up to the retirement of Boston's former leader and the turning over of the orchestra's affairs by its founder to a board of nine trustees, composed of citizens of Boston.

One of the coincidences of interest here is the fact that Henri Rabaud, who recently sailed from France to take the command now held by Pierre Monteux, through the courtesy of the Metropolitan, will follow overseas André Messager, with whom he was associated at the Paris Opera. M. Rabaud will make his first New York appearance at a second pair of concerts in December.

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, this city, during the coming winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving; therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday morning, October 21, at the Heppe piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin, the distinguished violinist, who is now the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

NEWS
ess: Baltimore, Md.

RABAUD PROUD OF HONOR

French Conductor Outlines His Program For Boston Orchestra.

(Special Paris Cable Dispatch to the New York Herald.)

Henry Rabaud, who will take the place of Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said he expected to start soon for the United States; that he felt it a great honored at being asked to lead such a fine body of musicians; that his program would be to give the music which he considered the most beautiful—namely, the great classics—and also works of the modern masters.

"I know Americans love novelty," he said, "but while satisfying this legitimate taste it must not be forgotten that our role is to develop artistic musical education. The best means of doing this is by the execution of the classics."

Of his work in Boston he said his primary aim would be to obtain perfection of execution.

EVENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.

The Three Arts

AND now comes further news of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the subscription books for the Baltimore concert of which will be opened next Monday. These entertainments will be given in this city, round and on the Wednesday evenings, tickets announced, November 6, December 4, January 8 and March 19, and on one Tuesday evening, February 1.

Since last spring this splendid and justly famous orchestra has been entirely reorganized and is being presented under what is now popularly spoken of as a "100 per cent." American management. For the first time in its history the orchestra comes here with an American concert master; in these days the familiar and almost technical word concertmaster is unfamiliar; when a young violinist named Frederic Fradkin! Also, it is to be noted that for the first time in its history the orchestra will be under the direction of French conductors.

At the first concert, in November, the baton will be held by Pierre Monteux, who is the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House and who will be the "guest" conductor until Henri Rabaud, who will permanently direct the orchestra and who is sailing from France in a few days, arrives in this country.

It will be of special interest to hear this Monteux concert, and for this reason a hasty journey was made by a Baltimorean who is deeply versed in musical happenings and, stopping to converse, as he passed, with the man, had I heard Monteux conduct a hastily assembled civic orchestra in New York. I would have been profoundly amazed at the comprehensive of his authority and the significance of his work, as well as illuminated by the beauty and inspiration of his reading of a Beethoven symphony. Such news of a conductor who has made a particular impression by one such work rather lures one with eagerness to "assist" at his Baltimore debut.

In the ranks of the Boston Orchestra since it was first heard here there have been changes affecting 25 per cent. of the membership. The Horn has been entirely eliminated, the vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft having been filled, for the most part, by young and enthusiastic musicians, many of whom are Italian-Americans, though several artists who are now included in the brass and wood-wind choirs have been recruited from the celebrated French military band that played here earlier in the season. Rehearsals have been progressing in Boston for the past month in spite of the "flu," and it is said that the tonal quality of the orchestra has never before been more beautiful, and that the discipline of the band and its technical perfection have never attained a higher notch.

For the forthcoming season four important soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Mme. Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is an Englishwoman who is spoken of as one of the most interesting of the younger generation of lyric sopranos. She will be heard here at the November concert. Melba, returning from Australia for a short concert tour, will sing at a later date. Fradkin, the orchestra's concert master, is a native of Troy, N. Y. Early in his career he went to Paris, where he studied at the Conservatoire, winning a "first prize," which means much in a musical career. Later he returned to this country as concert master of the orchestra organized to tour the States with the Ballet Russe. Fradkin is said to play with the peculiar elegance that is so marked a characteristic of the better French violinists.

Mr. Rubinstein is the season's pianist. During 1915-16, when he was only 19, he toured this country and made a most interesting impression. Since then he has spent most of his time abroad, although for the past year he has been in South America. As he is regarded as one of the pianistic "giants," his coming appearance with the Boston Orchestra will doubtless be one of the notable musical events of the winter.

J. O. L.

TELEGRAPH OCTO

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER ARRIVES

Henri Rabaud, Chosen to Succeed Dr. Muck, Reaches American Port on French Liner.

TO CONDUCT FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

Among the 197 passengers who arrived on a French liner at an American port yesterday was Henri Rabaud, the French conductor selected to head the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the committee, after Dr. Karl Muck, the German head, had been removed and later interned as an enemy alien.

Henri Rabaud is the chef d'orchestra of the National Opera House in Paris and is virtually here on a leave of absence from that institution. He is 45 years old. He said last night that until he sees the members of the committee in Boston he will not know the program for the season, but it is probable that the orchestra will offer some novelties during the Winter.

M. Rabaud won the Grand Prix de Rome in 1890, and is the composer of the opera, "Marouf," which had its premiere in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House last year. He is also the composer of a number of symphonic poems, to use his own words.

[illegible] French hard

TIMES
s: New York City

Rabaud and Messager—A Meeting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has postponed for two weeks now, until next Friday, the opening of its home season. This was due to the prevailing influenza, which it is hoped will have abated before the men come here on tour.

"There is the usual waiting list of prospective patrons—a list which, curiously enough, despite unfavorable conditions, has grown greatly during the last Summer," concludes the first official statement of the Boston Symphony plans in New York. Subscribers to last year's concerts have had an option until yesterday to retain their seats at Carnegie Hall. The prospectus recites again those events which led up to the retirement of Boston's former leader and the turning over of the orchestra's affairs by its founder to a board of nine trustees, composed of citizens of Boston.

One of the coincidences of interest here is the fact that Henri Rabaud, who recently sailed from France to take the command now held by Pierre Monteux, through the courtesy of the Metropolitan, will follow overseas André Messager, with whom he was associated at the Paris Opera. M. Rabaud will make his first New York appearance at a second pair of concerts in December.

SUN, OCTOBER 28

Henri Rabaud, who will replace Dr. Muck (interned as an enemy alien) as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, admitted that he had some "novelties" up his suspected American musical sleeve when like he is director of the National Opera in Paris and a composer, his best known work being the opera "Marouf." He is totally unlike the usual German conductor. He is gentle mannered, soft voiced and aesthetic looking. He is tall, slim, olive skinned, wears an iron gray beard and has large, expressive dark eyes. He said he could not tell what his plans might be until he had talked with the Boston committee that has charge of the orchestra.

HERALD OCTOBER 28.

NEW SYMPHONY DIRECTOR ARRIVES

Henri Rabaud Has Several Novelties

[Special Dispatch to Herald and Journal.]

AN ATLANTIC PORT, Oct. 27—Among the passengers arriving today from France on a French steamship was Henri Rabaud, the new director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has come over to replace Dr. Karl Muck. M. Rabaud has been for some years the musical director of the orchestra at the National Opera House, Paris, and is the composer of the French opera "Marouf," performed last season in New York, as well as of a symphony already heard here, and of several symphonic poems. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894 for the excellence of his musical works.

The new director of the Boston Symphony does not in any way look like the customary leader of an orchestra. He is tall, slight, has gray hair, mustache and whiskers, and wears a frock coat, with a small clerical type of wide brimmed soft hat. He does not speak any English at present, he explained, but hopes to learn during the coming season in America. He said he believed he had several novelties, but did not know whether they had been played in the United States.

On this and other matters he preferred to wait until he consulted with the nine trustees who have taken charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Maj. Higginson retired after the dismissal of Dr. Muck.

On the same steamship were two artists for the Metropolitan Opera House. Robert Couzinou, the new French baritone, and Mme. Raymonde Delanoix, a young contralto who has sung here for the last four seasons.

OVATION FOR SYMPHONY AT FIRST CONCERT

Monteux in Brilliant Performance—Some Innovations

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. First concert of the 28th season, yesterday afternoon, Pierre Monteux, temporary conductor, conducting. Symphony Hall. The program:—

French, Symphony in D Minor.
Schumann, Overture to "Manfred."
Dukas, "Le Peri."
Debussy, "Iberia."

The audience wished to show in every way possible its joy at the resumption of these concerts, its appreciation of the efforts at the reorganization of the orchestra and, after hearing some brilliant playing by the orchestra, of the excellent work of the orchestra under Mr. Monteux.

Strangely enough, however, the first applause of the afternoon did not come for Mr. Monteux or any other of the Frenchmen who have replaced Germans dismissed from the band, but for the returning Alwin Schroeder, long a distinguished and honorable citizen of this city. Mr. Schroeder bowed and acknowledged the hearty applause. The first applause should not have been for the veteran 'cellist. It should have been for the management, which modified the lighting. The harsh lighting of the hall was toned. Eye strain, which has previously followed many concerts, was thus prevented.

Mr. Monteux's appearance was the signal for prolonged applause, which he shared with the orchestra. After the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," which Mr. Monteux, like Mr. Messager, plays at a slow, highly dignified tempo, there was again much applause. Then the concert proceeded to the ever-increasing enjoyment of a house which occupied nearly the entire auditorium.

Mr. Monteux did well with the Franck symphony, a symphony which constantly grows in favor with many musicians. He and his musicians were heartily applauded. Then came the Schumann work, which Mr. Monteux, a Frenchman of Frenchmen, may have put on the program to show he was not bigoted in his attitude toward German music. The old overture came heavily from his hand. With the Dukas and the Debussy works, the conductor was again on firm ground. Both of the works were superbly played with the delicacy, the finesse and the brilliance that the best French orchestra give this modern music.

Mr. Monteux has already made known to Record readers his interest in the Dukas poem and his desire to play it here so that Dukas should not be known solely as the composer of "The Sorcerer Apprentice." The first performance of "Le Peri" revealed it as a typical piece of ballet music, written by a composer who always thought of the narrative to be pantomimed by the dancers and of the gyrations of the premiere danseuse. Hearing "Le Peri," one could see the opera house in the mind's eye and see the ballet danced and mimed. The music is a beautiful one, with interesting thematic material and a wide variety of color. The drums, the tambourine, cymbals, triangle, xylaphone and celesta are all effectively used. They are not dragged in to make a riot of sound. They belong in the work. An extremely clean cut, very French interpretation was given the work, although, perhaps, there was not displayed in the Dukas poem the vertuosity that characterized the playing of the Debussy images, which he calls "Iberia." Some who love the Debussy of "Pelleas" and of the songs also love "Iberia." We are not of their number. Brilliant it is, but, hearing it once, who yearns for a repetition? Someone has said of "Iberia," "Debussy appears in this work to have exaggerated his tendency to treat music with means of expression analogous to those on the Impressionistic painters." The work is all tonal color and sharply defined rythms. There are little blocks of color, little blocks of brilliant tempos. We could carry the comparison to modern painting by saying that in "Iberia" Debussy employs pointism.

This work demands an extraordinarily brilliant interpretation. For the present there is no need of comparing the orchestra as a whole with the orchestra of other years. Fairness to performers, as well as to reviewers, demands that further hearings be given. Suffice to say, that Mr. Monteux has moulded a very brilliant band, especially well suited to the playing of modern French music.

Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster, had little or no chance to display his talents. Short solo passages in "Le Peri" and "Iberia" were played fluently by him. More of Mr. Fradkin anon. Three old friends, Messrs. Longy, Heim and De Mailly—the latter anything but old—distinguished themselves in the Debussy work. Mr. Heim played a single, terrifically difficult passage with perfectly pure intonation. Mr. DeMailly again impressed us as a remarkably brilliant first flute. As for Mr. Longy, the oboe has no greater player. Soloists and members of orchestra come and go, but none come who play with finer phrasing than Mr. Longy employed yesterday and as he has employed for our delight these many years. Mention of individual excellencies would not be complete without a reference to the playing of the English horn by Mr. Mueller in the French symphony.

Mr. Monteux may well be proud of his achievements with a reorganized orchestra. He has drilled his orchestra till he has balance and final tonal quality; but, as one said already, more of the present status of the orchestra later.

For the concerts of Nov. 1 and 2 Mr. Monteux has selected this program: Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, A minor; Ravel, "Une Bonne Chanson"; Ravel "Daphnis et Chloe," suite No. 1. Mme. Florence Easton will sing songs by Mozart and Debussy.

RECORD
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Season In This City Will Offer Customary Five Concerts.

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the Orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn, represent a large number of other men.

Many changes have been made in the personnel. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, American violinist, is now concertmaster. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the Orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein, Russian pianist.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 1918

SIX TIMES WITH BOSTON

Florence Easton.

The soprano, the much admired soprano of the Metropolitan Company, is to sing six times with the Boston Symphony.

GLOBE OCTOBER 27

Mr Monteux to Conduct Last Concerts This Week

It will be with mingled regret and gratitude that many will hear Mr Monteux conduct the last two Symphony concerts this week of his short sojourn here. This admirable musician and conductor and courteous gentleman has rendered a great service for the orchestra and for all who regard it with a personal affection and pride. The first concert was of the surprising degree, not only to which he had secured amalgamation but to which he had so or less disintegrated forces, but had drawn from them a spontaneity, air ardor, and, an enriched frolette of colors which added new elements to the expression of the orchestra.

This week Mr Monteux will show his hand with a classic in a Beethoven symphony. There will be a composition of Mr Loeffler's "Une Bonne Chanson," first played in Mr Gerlicke's time, but since largely revised and rewritten. Following the second suite of "Daphnis and Chloe," by Ravel, played last year, Mr Monteux will bring to its first hearing in Boston the first suite. It employs a small mixed chorus. These 32 voices from the Boston Symphony chorus have been prepared by Stephen Townsend.

As soloist, Mme Florence Easton will make her first appearance in these concerts. This excellent soprano will be remembered as the Gilda of Mr Savage's English Opera company at the Tremont Theatre 14 years ago, and last season for the good impression of a beautiful voice she gave in the "L'Oracolo" of the Metropolitan company, of which she is a member. Successes in Berlin, London and Chicago had preceded.

The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 7 in A major, Beethoven; air, "Dove Sono" from Figaro's Marriage," Mozart; poeme, "Une Bonne Chanson," Loeffler, rest and air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," Debussy; "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 1, Ravel.

Cambridge Symphony Concert

The first Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be that master pianist Josef Hofmann, who will play Chopin's Concerto for piano and orchestra in E minor. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's 7th Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia." Mr Monteux will conduct.

TRIBUNE
ress New York City 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French musician, who is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has left his way from France and is expected to arrive this week. He will go at once to Boston, but his activities with the orchestra will not begin until November 11, when he will old his first rehearsal. Owing to the uncertainty of his arrival, arrangements were made with Mr. Gatti-Casazza whereby Pierre Monteux could stay with the orchestra through its first Southern trip, and he will therefore conduct the first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, on November 7 and 9. The opening of its season in Boston has been postponed for two weeks on account of the prevailing influenza, but Mr. Monteux has held rehearsals daily, with excellent results.

HOTEL

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 13 1918

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, this city, during the coming winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving; therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday morning, October 21, at the Heppe piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin, the distinguished violinist, who is now the concertmasetr of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russian pianist.

NEWS
ess: Baltimore, Md.
OCT 14 1918

RABAUD PROUD OF HONOR

French Conductor Outlines His Program For Boston Orchestra.

(Special Paris Cable Dispatch in the New York Herald.)

Henry Rabaud, who will take the place of Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said he expected to start soon for the United States; that he felt highly honored at being asked to lead such a fine body of musicians; that his program would be to give the music which he considered the most beautiful—namely, the great classics—and also works of the modern masters.

"I know Americans love novelty," he said, "but while satisfying this legitimate taste it must not be forgotten that our role is to develop artistic musical education. The best means of doing this is by the execution of the classics."

Of his work in Boston he said his primary aim would be to obtain perfection of execution.

TIMES
s: New York City
OCT 20 1918

Rabaud and Messager—A Meeting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has postponed for two weeks now, until next Friday, the opening of its home season. This was due to the prevailing influenza, which it is hoped will have abated before the men come here on tour.

"There is the usual waiting list of prospective patrons—a list which, curiously enough, despite unfavorable conditions, has grown greatly during the last Summer," concludes the first official statement of the Boston Symphony plans in New York. Subscribers to last year's concerts have had an option until yesterday to retain their seats at Carnegie Hall. The prospectus recites again those events which led up to the retirement of Boston's former leader and the turning over of the orchestra's affairs by its founder to a board of nine trustees, composed of citizens of Boston.

One of the coincidences of interest here is the fact that Henri Rabaud, who recently sailed from France to take the command now held by Pierre Monteux, through the courtesy of the Metropolitan, will follow overseas André Messager, with whom he was associated at the Paris Opera. M. Rabaud will make his first New York appearance at a second pair of concerts in December.

EVENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 10 1918

The Three Arts

AND now comes further news of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the subscription books for the Baltimore concert of which will be opened next Monday. These entertainments will be given in the Lyric as usual, and on the Wednesday evenings hitherto announced, November 6, December 4, January 8 and March 19, and on one Tuesday evening, February 4.

Since last spring this splendid and justly famous orchestra has been entirely reorganized and is being presented under what is now popularly spoken of as a "100 per cent." American management. For the first time in its history the orchestra comes here with an American concert master—in these days the familiar and almost technical word concertmeister is naturally taboo—a young violinist named Frederic Fradkin. Also, it is to be noted that for the first time in its history the orchestra will be under the direction of French conductors.

At the first concert, in November, the baton will be held by Pierre Monteux, who is the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House and who will be the "guest" conductor until Henri Rabaud, who will permanently direct the orchestra and who is sailing from France in a few days, arrives in this country.

It will be of special interest to hear this Monteux concert, and for this reason I happened a day or so ago to meet a Baltimorean who is deeply versed in musical happenings and, stopping to converse, my interlocutor told me that, had I heard Monteux conduct a hastily assembled civic orchestra in New York, I would have been perfectly amazed at the completeness of his authority and the significance of his work, as well as illuminated by the beauty and inspiration of his reading of a Beethoven symphony. Such news of a conductor who has made a particular "mark" in operatic work rather fires one with eagerness to "assist" at his Baltimore debut.

In the ranks of the Boston Orchestra since it was last heard here there have been changes affecting 25 per cent. of the membership. The Hun has been entirely eliminated, the vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft having been filled, for the most part, by young and enthusiastic musicians, many of whom are Italian-Americans, though several artists who are now included in the brass and wood-wind choirs have been corralled from the celebrated French military band that played here earlier in the season. Rehearsals have been progressing in Boston for the past month in spite of the "flu," and it is said that the tonal quality of the orchestra has never before been more beautiful, and that the discipline of the band and its technical perfection have never attained a higher notch.

For the forthcoming season four important soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Mme. Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is an Englishwoman who is spoken of as one of the most interesting of the younger generation of lyric soprani. She will be heard here at the November concert. Melba, returning from Australia for a short concert tour, will sing at a later date. Fradkin, the orchestra's concert master, is a native of Troy, N. Y. Early in his career he went to Paris, where he studied at the Conservatoire, winning a "first prize," which means much in a musical career. Later he returned to this country as concert master of the orchestra organized to tour the States with the Ballet Russe. Fradkin is said to play with the peculiar elegance that is so marked a characteristic of the better French violinists.

Mr. Rubinstein is the season's pianist. During 1905-06, when he was only 19, he toured this country and made a most interesting impression. Since then he has spent most of his time abroad, although for the past year he has been in South America. As he is regarded as one of the pianistic "giants," his coming appearance with the Boston Orchestra will doubtless be one of the notable musical events of the winter. J. O. L.

TELEGRAPH OCTO 23

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER ARRIVES

Henri Rabaud, Chosen to Succeed Dr. Muck, Reaches American Port on French Liner.

TO CONDUCT FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

Among the 197 passengers who arrived on a French liner at an American port yesterday was Henri Rabaud, the French conductor selected to head the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the committee, after Dr. Karl Muck, the German head, had been removed and later interned as an enemy alien.

Henri Rabaud is the chef d'orchestra of the National Opera House in Paris and is virtually here on a leave of absence from that institution. He is 45 years old. He said last night that until he sees the members of the committee in Boston, he will not know the program for the season, but it is probable that the orchestra will offer some novelties during the Winter.

M. Rabaud won the Grand Prix de Rome in 1890, and is the composer of the opera, "Marouf," which had its premiere in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House last year. He is also the composer of a number of symphonic poems, to use his own words.

[illegible] a new French bar[illegible]

RECORD Oct. 26

OVATION FOR SYMPHONY AT FIRST CONCERT

Monteux in Brilliant Performance—Some Innovations

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. First concert of the 38th season, yesterday afternoon, Pierre Monteux, temporary conductor, conducting. Symphony Hall. The program:—

Franck, Symphony in D Minor.
Schumann, Overture to "Manfred."
Dukas, "Le Peri."
Debussy, "Iberia."

The audience wished to show in every way possible its joy at the resumption of these concerts, its appreciation of the efforts at the reorganization of the orchestra and, after hearing some brilliant playing by the orchestra, of the excellent work of the orchestra under Mr. Monteux.

Strangely enough, however, the first applause of the afternoon did not come for Mr. Monteux or any other of the Frenchmen who have replaced Germans dismissed from the band, but for the returning Alwin Schroeder, long a distinguished and honorable citizen of this city. Mr. Schroeder bowed and acknowledged the hearty applause. The first applause should not have been for the veteran 'cellist. It should have been for the management, which modified the lighting. The harsh lighting of the hall was toned. Eye strain, which has previously followed many concerts, was thus prevented.

Mr. Monteux's appearance was the signal for prolonged applause, which he shared with the orchestra. After the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," which Mr. Monteux, like Mr. Messager, plays at a slow, highly dignified tempo, there was again much applause. Then the concert proceeded to the ever-increasing enjoyment of a house which occupied nearly the entire auditorium.

Mr. Monteux did well with the Franck symphony, a symphony which constantly grows in favor with many musicians. He and his musicians were heartily applauded. Then came the Schumann work, which Mr. Monteux, a Frenchman of Frenchmen, may have put on the program to show he was not bigoted in his attitude toward German music. The old overture came heavily from his hand. With the Dukas and the Debussy works, the conductor was again on firm ground. Both of the works were superbly played with the delicacy, the finesse and the brilliancy that the best French orchestra give this modern music.

Mr. Monteux has already made known to Record readers his interest in the Dukas poem and his desire to play it here so that Dukas should not be known solely as the composer of "The Sorcerer Apprentice." The first performance of "Le Peri" revealed it as a typical piece of ballet music, written by a composer who always thought of the narrative to be [redacted]utomimed by the dancers and of the gyrations of the premiere danseuse. Hearing "Le Peri," one could see the opera house in the mind's eye and see the ballet danced and mimed. Th[redacted] music is v[redacted] beautiful, fine, with interesting thematic material and a wide variety of color. The drums, the tambourine, cymbals, triangle, xylaphone and celesta are all effectively used. They are not dragged in to make a riot of sound. They belong in the work. An extremely clean cut, very French interpretation was given the work, although, perhaps, there was not displayed in the Dukas poem the vertuosity that characterized the playing of the Debussy images, which he calls "Iberia." Some who love the Debussy of "Pelleas" and of the songs also love "Iberia." We are not of their number. Brilliant it is, but, hearing it once, who yearns for a repetition? Someone has said of "Iberia," "Debussy appears in this work to have exaggerated his tendency to treat music with means of expression analogous to those on the impressionistic painters." The work is all tonal color and sharply defined rythms. There are little blocks of color, little blocks of brilliant tempos. We could carry the comparison to modern painting by saying that in "Iberia" Debussy employs pointism.

This work demands an extraordinarily brilliant interpretation. For the present there is no need of comparing the orchestra as a whole with the orchestra of other years. Fairness to performers, as well as to reviewers, de-

SUN, OCTOBER 28

Henri Rabaud, who will replace Dr. Muck (interned as an enemy alien) as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, admitted that he had some "novelties" that he suspected American music lovers might like. He is director of the National Opera in Paris and a composer, his best known work being the opera "Marouf." He is totally unlike the usual German conductor. He is gentle mannered, soft voiced and æsthetic looking. He is tall, slim, olive skinned, wears an iron gray beard and has large, expressive dark eyes. He said he could not tell what his plans might be until he had talked with the Boston committee that has charge of the orchestra.

HERALD OCTOBER 28.

NEW SYMPHONY DIRECTOR ARRIVES

Henri Rabaud Has Several Novelties

[Special Dispatch to Herald and Journal.]

AN ATLANTIC PORT, Oct. 27—Among the passengers arriving today from France on a French steamship was Henri Rabaud, the new director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has come over to replace Dr. Karl Muck. M. Rabaud has been for some years the musical director of the orchestra at the National Opera House, Paris, and is the composer of the French opera "Marouf," performed last season in New York, as well as of a symphony already heard here, and of several sy-mphonic poems. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894 for the excellence of his musical works.

The new director of the Boston Symphony does not in any way look like the customary leader of an orchestra. He is tall, slight, has gray hair, mustache and whiskers, and wears a frock coat, with a small clerical type of wide brimmed soft hat. He does not speak any English at present, he explained, but hopes to learn during the coming season in America. He said he believed he had several novelties, but did not know whether they had been played in the United States.

On this and other matters he preferred to wait until he consulted with the nine trustees who have taken charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Maj. Higginson retired after the dismissal of Dr. Muck.

On the same steamship were two artists for the Metropolitan Opera House, Robert Couzinou, the new French baritone, and Mme. Raymonde Delanois, a young contralto who has sung here for the last four seasons.

m RECORD
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te OCT 13 1918

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Season In This City Will Offer Customary Five Concerts.

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the Orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn, represented a large number of other men.

Many changes have been made in the personnel. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, American violinist, is now concertmaster. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the Orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropoltan Opera Company.

The Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein, Russian pianist.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 9 1918

SIX TIMES WITH BOSTON

Florence Easton.

The soprano, the much-admired soprano of the Metropolitan Company, is to sing six times with the Boston Symphony.

GLOBE—OCTOBER 27

Mr Monteux to Conduct Last Concerts This Week

It will be with mingled regret and gratitude that many will hear Mr Monteux conduct the last two symphony concerts this week of his short sojourn here. This admirable musician and conductor and courteous gentleman has performed a great service for the orchestra and for all who regard it with a personal affection and pride. The first concerts revealed the surprising degree, not only to which he had secured amalgamation in new and more or less disintegrated forces, but had drawn from them a spontaneity, air ardor, and, an enriched frolette of colors which added new elements to the expression of the orchestra.

This week Mr Monteux will show his hand with a classic in a Beethoven symphony. There will be a composition of Mr Loeffler's "Une Bonne Chanson," first played in Mr Gericke's time, but since largely revised and rewritten. Following the second suite of "Daphnis and Chloe," by Ravel, played last year, Mr Monteux will bring to its first hearing in Boston the first suite. It employs a small mixed chorus. These 32 voices from the Boston Symphony chorus have been prepared by Stephen Townsend.

As soloist, Mme Florence Easton will make her first appearance at these concerts. This excellent soprano will be remembered as the Gilda of Mr Savage's English Opera company at the Tremont Theatre 14 years ago, and last season for the good impression of a beautiful voice she gave in the "L'Oracolo" of the Metropolitan company, of which she is a member. Successes in Berlin, London and Chicago had preceded.

The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 7 in A major, Beethoven; air, "Dore Sono" from Figaro's Marriage," Mozart; poeme, "Une Bonne Chanson," Loeffler, recit and air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," Debussy; "Daphnis and Chloe," suite No. 1, Ravel.

Cambridge Symphony Concert

The first Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be that master pianist Josef Hofmann, who will play Chopin's Concerto for piano and orchestra in E minor. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's 7th Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia." Mr Monteux will conduct.

n TRIBUNE
ress New York City
OCT 20 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French musician, who is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on his way from France and is expected to arrive this week. He will go at once to Boston, but his activities with the orchestra will not begin until November 11, when he will hold his first rehearsal. Owing to the uncertainty of his arrival, arrangements were made with Mr. Gatti-Casazza whereby Pierre Monteux could stay with the orchestra through its first Southern trip, and he will therefore conduct the first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, on November 7 and 9. The opening of its season in Boston has been postponed for two weeks on account of the prevailing influenza, but Mr. Monteux has held rehearsals daily, with excellent results.

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music, this city, during the coming winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving; therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday morning, October 21, at the Heppe piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin, the distinguished violinist, who is now the concertmasetr of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russin pianist.

NEWS
ess: Baltimore, Md.

RABAUD PROUD OF HONOR

French Conductor Outlines His Program For Boston Orchestra.

(Special Paris Cable Dispatch in the New York Herald.)

Henry Rabaud, who will take the place of Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said he expected to start soon for the United States; that he felt highly honored at being asked to lead such a fine body of musicians; that his program would be to give the music which he considered the most beautiful—namely, the great classics—and also works of the modern masters.

"I know Americans love novelty," he said, "but while satisfying this legitimate taste it must not be forgotten that our role is to develop artistic musical education. The best means of doing this is by the execution of the classics."

Of his work in Boston he said his primary aim would be to obtain perfection of execution.

TIMES
s: New York City

Rabaud and Messager—A Meeting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has postponed for two weeks now, until next Friday, the opening of its home season. This was due to the prevailing influenza, which it is hoped will have abated before the men come here on tour.

"There is the usual waiting list of prospective patrons—a list which, curiously enough, despite unfavorable conditions, has grown greatly during the last Summer," concludes the first official statement of the Boston Symphony plans in New York. Subscribers to last year's concerts have had an option until yesterday to retain their seats at Carnegie Hall. The prospectus recites again those events which led up to the retirement of Boston's former leader and the turning over of the orchestra's affairs by its founder to a board of nine trustees, composed of citizens of Boston.

One of the coincidences of interest here is the fact that Henri Rabaud, who recently sailed from France to take the command now held by Pierre Monteux, through the courtesy of the Metropolitan, will follow overseas André Messager, with whom he was associated at the Paris Opera. M. Rabaud will make his first New York appearance at a second pair of concerts in December.

EVENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.

The Three Arts

AND now comes further news of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the subscription books for the Baltimore concert of which will be opened next Monday. These entertainments will be given in the Lyric as usual, and on the Wednesday evenings hitherto announced, November 6, December 4, January 8 and March 19, and on one Tuesday evening, February 4.

Since last spring this splendid and justly famous orchestra has been entirely reorganized and is being presented under what is now popularly spoken of as a "100 per cent." American management. For the first time in its history the orchestra comes here with an American concert master—in these days the familiar and almost technical word concertmeister is naturally taboo—a young violinist named Frederic Fradkin! Also, it is to be noted that for the first time in its history the orchestra will be under the direction of French conductors.

At the first concert, in November, the baton will be held by Pierre Monteux, who is the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House and who will be the "guest" conductor until Henri Rabaud, who will permanently direct the orchestra and who is sailing from France in a few days, arrives in this country.

It will be of special interest to hear this Monteux concert, and for this reason I happened a day or so ago to meet a Baltimorean who is deeply versed in musical happenings and, stopping to converse, my interlocutor told me that, had I heard Monteux conduct a hastily assembled civic orchestra in New York, I would have been perfectly amazed at the completeness of his authority and the significance of his work, as well as illuminated by the beauty and inspiration of his reading of a Beethoven symphony. Such news of a conductor who has made a particular "mark" in operatic work rather fires one with eagerness to "assist" at his Baltimore debut.

In the ranks of the Boston Orchestra since it was last heard here there have been changes affecting 25 per cent. of the membership. The Hun has been entirely eliminated, the vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft having been filled, for the most part, by young and enthusiastic musicians, many of whom are Italian-Americans, though several artists who are now included in the brass and wood-wind choirs have been corralled from the celebrated French military band that played here earlier in the season. Rehearsals have been progressing in Boston for the past month in spite of the "flu," and it is said that the tonal quality of the orchestra has never before been more beautiful, and that the discipline of the band and its technical perfection have never attained a higher notch.

For the forthcoming season four important soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Mme. Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is an Englishwoman who is spoken of as one of the most interesting of the younger generation of lyric soprani. She will be heard here at the November concert. Melba, returning from Australia for a short concert tour, will sing at a later date. Fradkin, the orchestra's concert master, is a native of Troy, N. Y. Early in his career he went to Paris, where he studied at the Conservatoire, winning a "first prize," which means much in a musical career. Later he returned to this country as concert master of the orchestra organized to tour the States with the Ballet Russe. Fradkin is said to play with the peculiar elegance that is so marked a characteristic of the better French violinists.

Mr. Rubinstein is the season's pianist. During 1905-06, when he was only 19, he toured this country and made a most interesting impression. Since then he has spent most of his time abroad, although for the past year he has been in South America. As he is regarded as one of the pianistic "giants," his coming appearance with the Boston Orchestra will doubtless be one of the notable musical events of the winter. J. O. L.

TELEGRAPH OCTO 28

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER ARRIVES

Henri Rabaud, Chosen to Succeed Dr. Muck, Reaches American Port on French Liner.

TO CONDUCT FAMOUS ORCHESTRA

Among the 197 passengers who arrived on a French liner at an American port yesterday was Henri Rabaud, the French conductor selected to head the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the committee, after Dr. Karl Muck, the German head, had been removed and later interned as an enemy alien.

Henri Rabaud is the chef d'orchestra of the National Opera House in Paris and is virtually here on a leave of absence from that institution. He is 45 years old. He said last night that until he sees the members of the committee in Boston, he will not know the program for the season, but it is probable that the orchestra will offer some novelties during the Winter.

M. Rabaud won the Grand Prix de Rome in 1890, and is the composer of the opera, "Marouf," which had its premiere in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House last year. He is also the composer of a number of symphonic poems, to use his own words.

Robert Couzinou, a new French bari-

RECORD Oct. 26

OVATION FOR SYMPHONY AT FIRST CONCERT

Monteux in Brilliant Performance—Some Innovations

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. First concert of the 38th season, yesterday afternoon, Pierre Monteux, temporary conductor, conducting. Symphony Hall. The program:—

Franck, Symphony in D Minor.
Schumann, Overture to "Manfred."
Dukas, "Le Peri."
Debussy, "Iberia."

The audience wished to show in every way possible its joy at the resumption of these concerts, its appreciation of the efforts at the reorganization of the orchestra and, after hearing some brilliant playing by the orchestra, of the excellent work of the orchestra under Mr. Monteux.

Strangely enough, however, the first applause of the afternoon did not come for Mr. Monteux or any other of the Frenchmen who have replaced Germans dismissed from the band, but for the returning Alwin Schroeder, long a distinguished and honorable citizen of this city. Mr. Schroeder bowed and acknowledged the hearty applause. The first applause should not have been for the veteran 'cellist. It should have been for the management, which modified the lighting. The harsh lighting of the hall was toned. Eye strain, which has previously followed many concerts, was thus prevented.

Mr. Monteux's appearance was the signal for prolonged applause, which he shared with the orchestra. After the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," which Mr. Monteux, like Mr. Messager, plays at a slow, highly dignified tempo, there was again much applause. Then the concert proceeded to the ever-increasing enjoyment of a house which occupied nearly the entire auditorium.

Mr. Monteux did well with the Franck symphony, a symphony which constantly grows in favor with many musicians. He and his musicians were heartily applauded. Then came the Schumann work, which Mr. Monteux, a Frenchman of Frenchmen, may have put on the program to show he was not bigoted in his attitude toward German music. The old overture came heavily from his hand. With the Dukas and the Debussy works, the conductor was again on firm ground. Both of the works were superbly played with the delicacy, the finesse and the brilliancy that the best French orchestra give this modern music.

Mr. Monteux has already made known to Record readers his interest in the Dukas poem and his desire to play it here so that Dukas should not be known solely as the composer of "The Sorcerer Apprentice." The first performance of "Le Peri" revealed it as a typical piece of ballet music, written by a composer who always thought of the narrative to be pantomimed by the dancers and of the gyrations of the premiere danseuse. Hearing "Le Peri," one could see the opera house in the mind's eye and see the ballet danced and mimed. Th[illegible] music is v[illegible] beautiful, fine, with interesting thematic material and a wide variety of color. The drums, the tambourine, cymbals, triangle, xylaphone and celesta are all effectively used. They are not dragged in to make a riot of sound. They belong in the work. An extremely clean cut, very French interpretation was given the work, although, perhaps, there was not displayed in the Dukas poem the vertuosity that characterized the playing of the Debussy images, which he calls "Iberia." Some who love the Debussy of "Pelleas" and of the songs also love "Iberia." We are not of their number. Brilliant it is, but, hearing it once, who yearns for a repetition? Someone has said of "Iberia," "Debussy appears in this work to have exaggerated his tendency to treat music with means of expression analogous to those on the impressionistic painters." The work is all tonal color and sharply defined rythms. There are little blocks of color, little blocks of brilliant tempos. We could carry the comparison to modern painting by saying that in "Iberia" Debussy employs pointism.

This work demands an extraordinarily brilliant interpretation. For the present there is no need of comparing the orchestra as a whole with the orchestra of other years. Fairness to performers, as well as to reviewers, de-

SUN, OCTOBER 28

Henri Rabaud, who will replace Dr. Muck (interned as an enemy alien) as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, admitted that he had some "novelties" that he suspected American music lovers might like. He is director of the National Opera in Paris and a composer, his best known work being the opera "Marouf." He is totally unlike the usual German conductor. He is gentle mannered, soft voiced and æsthetic looking. He is tall, slim, olive skinned, wears an iron gray beard and has large, expressive dark eyes. He said he could not tell what his plans might be until he had talked with the Boston committee that has charge of the orchestra.

HERALD OCTOBER 28.

NEW SYMPHONY DIRECTOR ARRIVES

Henri Rabaud Has Several Novelties

[Special Dispatch to Herald and Journal.]

AN ATLANTIC PORT, Oct. 27—Among the passengers arriving today from France on a French steamship was Henri Rabaud, the new director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has come over to replace Dr. Karl Muck. M. Rabaud has been for some years the musical director of the orchestra at the National Opera House, Paris, and is the composer of the French opera "Marouf," performed last season in New York, as well as of a symphony already heard here, and of several symphonic poems. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894 for the excellence of his musical works.

The new director of the Boston Symphony does not in any way look like the customary leader of an orchestra. He is tall, slight, has gray hair, mustache and whiskers, and wears a frock coat, with a small clerical type of wide brimmed soft hat. He does not speak any English at present, he explained, but hopes to learn during the coming season in America. He said he believed he had several novelties, but did not know whether they had been played in the United States.

On this and other matters he preferred to wait until he consulted with the nine trustees who have taken charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Maj. Higginson retired after the dismissal of Dr. Muck.

On the same steamship were two artists for the Metropolitan Opera House, Robert Couzinou, the new French baritone, and Mme. Raymonde Delanois, a young contralto who has sung here for the last four seasons.

m RECORD
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te OCT 1 3 1918

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Season In This City Will Offer Customary Five Concerts.

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the Orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn, represented a large number of other men.

Many changes have been made in the personnel. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, American violinist, is now concertmaster. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the Orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropoltan Opera Company.

The Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein, Russian pianist.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 9 1918

SIX TIMES WITH BOSTON

Florence Easton.

The soprano, the much-admired soprano of the Metropolitan Company, is to sing six times with the Boston Symphony.

GLOBE—OCTOBER 27

Mr Monteux to Conduct Last Concerts This Week

It will be with mingled regret and gratitude that many will hear Mr Monteux conduct the last two symphony concerts this week of his short sojourn here. This admirable musician and conductor and courteous gentleman has performed a great service for the orchestra and for all who regard it with a personal affection and pride. The first concerts revealed the surprising degree, not only to which he had secured amalgamation in new and more or less disintegrated forces, but had drawn from them a spontaneity, air ardor, and, an enriched frolette of colors which added new elements to the expression of the orchestra.

This week Mr Monteux will show his hand with a classic in a Beethoven symphony. There will be a composition of Mr Loeffler's "Une Bonne Chanson," first played in Mr Gericke's time, but since largely revised and rewritten. Following the second suite of "Daphnis and Chloe," by Ravel, played last year, Mr Monteux will bring to its first hearing in Boston the first suite. It employs a small mixed chorus. These 32 voices from the Boston Symphony chorus have been prepared by Stephen Townsend.

As soloist, Mme Florence Easton will make her first appearance at these concerts. This excellent soprano will be remembered as the Gilda of Mr Savage's English Opera company at the Tremont Theatre 14 years ago, and last season for the good impression of a beautiful voice she gave in the "L'Oracolo" of the Metropolitan company, of which she is a member. Successes in Berlin, London and Chicago had preceded.

The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 7 in A major, Beethoven; air, "Dore Sono" from Figaro's Marriage," Mozart; poeme, "Une Bonne Chanson," Loeffler, recit and air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," Debussy; "Daphnis and Chloe," suite No. 1, Ravel.

Cambridge Symphony Concert

The first Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be that master pianist Josef Hofmann, who will play Chopin's Concerto for piano and orchestra in E minor. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's 7th Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia." Mr Monteux will conduct.

n TRIBUNE
ress New York City 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French musician, who is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on his way from France and is expected to arrive this week. He will go at once to Boston, but his activities with the orchestra will not begin until November 11, when he will hold his first rehearsal. Owing to the uncertainty of his arrival, arrangements were made with Mr. Gatti-Casazza whereby Pierre Monteux could stay with the orchestra through its first Southern trip, and he will therefore conduct the first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, on November 7 and 9. The opening of its season in Boston has been postponed for two weeks on account of the prevailing influenza, but Mr. Monteux has held rehearsals daily, with excellent results.

early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the kind courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

The sale of seats to the general public will open Monday morning, October 21, at the Heppe piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin, the distinguished violinist, who is now the concertmasetr of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubinstein, the great Russin pianist.

---

m RECORD

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

te OCT 1 1918

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Season In This City Will Offer Customary Five Concerts.

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the Orchestra and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston who, in turn, represented a large number of other men.

Many changes have been made in the personnel. The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Fredric Fradkin, American violinist, is now concertmaster. The 'cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris, and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind section, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the Orchestra, including the first concert in Philadelphia, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropoltan Opera Company.

The Orchestra will give its usual series of five evening concerts in the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17.

The soloists announced for the season are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Fredric Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein, Russian pianist.

RECORD

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 9 1918

SIX TIMES WITH BOSTON

Florence Easton.

The soprano, the much-admired soprano of the Metropolitan Company, is to sing six times with the Boston Symphony.

---

ously enough, despite unfavorable conditions, has grown greatly during the last Summer," concludes the first official statement of the Boston Symphony plans in New York. Subscribers to last year's concerts have had an option until yesterday to retain their seats at Carnegie Hall. The prospectus recites again those events which led up to the retirement of Boston's former leader and the turning over of the orchestra's affairs by its founder to a board of nine trustees, composed of citizens of Boston.

One of the coincidences of interest here is the fact that Henri Rabaud, who recently sailed from France to take the command now held by Pierre Monteux, through the courtesy of the Metropolitan, will follow overseas André Messager, with whom he was associated at the Paris Opera. M. Rabaud will make his first New York appearance at a second pair of concerts in December.

---

sist at his Baltimore debut.

In the ranks of the Boston Orchestra since it was last heard here there have been changes affecting 25 per cent. of the

---

SUN, OCTOBER 28

Henri Rabaud, who will replace Dr. Muck (interned as an enemy alien) as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, admitted that he had some "novelties" that he suspected American music lovers might like. He is director of the National Opera in Paris and a composer, his best known work being the opera "Marouf." He is totally unlike the usual German conductor. He is gentle mannered, soft voiced and æsthetic looking. He is tall, slim, olive skinned, wears an iron gray beard and has large, expressive dark eyes. He said he could not tell what his plans might be until he had talked with the Boston committee that has charge of the orchestra.

GLOBE—OCTOBER 27

Mr Monteux to Conduct Last Concerts This Week

It will be with mingled regret and gratitude that many will hear Mr Monteux conduct the last two symphony concerts this week of his short sojourn here. This admirable musician and conductor and courteous gentleman has performed a great service for the orchestra and for all who regard it with a personal affection and pride. The first concerts revealed the surprising degree, not only to which he had secured amalgamation in new and more or less disintegrated forces, but had drawn from them a spontaneity, air ardor, and, an enriched frolette of colors which added new elements to the expression of the orchestra.

This week Mr Monteux will show his hand with a classic in a Beethoven symphony. There will be a composition of Mr Loeffler's "Une Bonne Chanson," first played in Mr Gericke's time, but since largely revised and rewritten. Following the second suite of "Daphnis and Chloe," by Ravel, played last year, Mr Monteux will bring to its first hearing in Boston the first suite. It employs a small mixed chorus. These 32 voices from the Boston Symphony chorus have been prepared by Stephen Townsend.

As soloist, Mme Florence Easton will make her first appearance at these concerts. This excellent soprano will be remembered as the Gilda of Mr Savage's English Opera company at the Tremont Theatre 14 years ago, and last season for the good impression of a beautiful voice she gave in the "L'Oracolo" of the Metropolitan company, of which she is a member. Successes in Berlin, London and Chicago had preceded.

The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 7 in A major, Beethoven; air, "Dore Sono" from Figaro's Marriage," Mozart; poeme, "Une Bonne Chanson," Loeffler, recit and air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," Debussy; "Daphnis and Chloe," suite No. 1, Ravel.

Cambridge Symphony Concert

The first Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be that master pianist Josef Hofmann, who will play Chopin's Concerto for piano and orchestra in E minor. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's 7th Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia." Mr Monteux will conduct.

---

n TRIBUNE

ress New York City 0 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French musician, who is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on his way from France and is expected to arrive this week. He will go at once to Boston, but his activities with the orchestra will not begin until November 11, when he will old his first rehearsal. Owing to the uncertainty of his arrival, arrangements were made with Mr. Gatti-Casazza whereby Pierre Monteux could stay with the orchestra through its first Southern trip, and he will therefore conduct the first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, on November 7 and 9. The opening of its season in Boston has been postponed for two weeks on account of the prevailing influenza, but Mr. Monteux has held rehearsals daily, with excellent results.

---

the pianistic "giants," his coming appearance with the Boston Orchestra will doubtless be one of the notable musical events of the winter. J. O. L.

HERALD OCTOBER 28.

NEW SYMPHONY DIRECTOR ARRIVES

Henri Rabaud Has Several Novelties

[Special Dispatch to Herald and Journal.]

AN ATLANTIC PORT, Oct. 27—Among the passengers arriving today from France on a French steamship was Henri Rabaud, the new director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has come over to replace Dr. Karl Muck. M. Rabaud has been for some years the musical director of the orchestra at the National Opera House, Paris, and is the composer of the French opera "Marouf," performed last season in New York, as well as of a symphony already heard here, and of several symphonic poems. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894 for the excellence of his musical works.

The new director of the Boston Symphony does not in any way look like the customary leader of an orchestra. He is tall, slight, has gray hair, mustache and whiskers, and wears a frock coat, with a small clerical type of wide brimmed soft hat. He does not speak any English at present, he explained, but hopes to learn during the coming season in America. He said he believed he had several novelties, but did not know whether they had been played in the United States.

On this and other matters he preferred to wait until he consulted with the nine trustees who have taken charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Maj. Higginson retired after the dismissal of Dr. Muck.

On the same steamship were two artists for the Metropolitan Opera House, Robert Couzinou, the new French baritone, and Mme. Raymonde Delanois, a young contralto who has sung here for the last four seasons.

OVATION FOR SYMPHONY AT FIRST CONCERT

Monteux in Brilliant Performance—Some Innovations

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. First concert of the 38th season, yesterday afternoon, Pierre Monteux, temporary conductor, conducting. Symphony Hall. The program:—

Franck, Symphony in D Minor.
Schumann, Overture to "Manfred."
Dukas, "Le Peri."
Debussy, "Iberia."

The audience wished to show in every way possible its joy at the resumption of these concerts, its appreciation of the efforts at the reorganization of the orchestra and, after hearing some brilliant playing by the orchestra, of the excellent work of the orchestra under Mr. Monteux.

Strangely enough, however, the first applause of the afternoon did not come for Mr. Monteux or any other of the Frenchmen who have replaced Germans dismissed from the band, but for the returning Alwin Schroeder, long a distinguished and honorable citizen of this city. Mr. Schroeder bowed and acknowledged the hearty applause. The first applause should not have been for the veteran 'cellist. It should have been for the management, which modified the lighting. The harsh lighting of the hall was toned. Eye strain, which has previously followed many concerts, was thus prevented.

Mr. Monteux's appearance was the signal for prolonged applause, which he shared with the orchestra. After the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," which Mr. Monteux, like Mr. Messager, plays at a slow, highly dignified tempo, there was again much applause. Then the concert proceeded to the ever-increasing enjoyment of a house which occupied nearly the entire auditorium.

Mr. Monteux did well with the Franck symphony, a symphony which constantly grows in favor with many musicians. He and his musicians were heartily applauded. Then came the Schumann work, which Mr. Monteux, a Frenchman of Frenchmen, may have put on the program to show he was not bigoted in his attitude toward German music. The old overture came heavily from his hand. With the Dukas and the Debussy works, the conductor was again on firm ground. Both of the works were superbly played with the delicacy, the finesse and the brilliancy that the best French orchestra give this modern music.

Mr. Monteux has already made known to Record readers his interest in the Dukas poem and his desire to play it here so that Dukas should not be known solely as the composer of "The Sorcerer Apprentice." The first performance of "Le Peri" revealed it as a typical piece of ballet music, written by a composer who always thought of the narrative to be pantomimed by the dancers and of the gyrations of the premiere danseuse. Hearing "Le Peri," one could see the opera house in the mind's eye and see the ballet danced and mimed. The music is very beautiful, fine, with interesting thematic material and a wide variety of color. The drums, the tambourine, cymbals, triangle, xylaphone and celesta are all effectively used. They are not dragged in to make a riot of sound. They belong in the work. An extremely clean cut, very French interpretation was given the work, although, perhaps, there was not displayed in the Dukas poem the vertuosity that characterized the playing of the Debussy images, which he calls "Iberia." Some who love the Debussy of "Pelleas" and of the songs also love "Iberia." We are not of their number. Brilliant it is, but, hearing it once, who yearns for a repetition? Someone has said of "Iberia," "Debussy appears in this work to have exaggerated his tendency to treat music with means of expression analogous to those on the impressionistic painters." The work is all tonal color and sharply defined rythms. There are little blocks of color, little blocks of brilliant tempos. We could carry the comparison to modern painting by saying that in "Iberia" Debussy employs pointism.

This work demands an extraordinarily brilliant interpretation. For the present there is no need of comparing the orchestra as a whole with the orchestra of other years. Fairness to performers, as well as to reviewers, demands that further hearings be given. Suffice to say, that Mr. Monteux has moulded a very brilliant band, especially well suited to the playing of modern French music.

Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster, had little or no chance to display his talents. Short solo passages in "Le Peri" and "Iberia" were played fluently by him. More of Mr. Fradkin anon. Three old friends, Messrs. Longy, Heim and De Mailly—the latter anything but old—distinguished themselves in the Debussy work. Mr. Heim played a single, terrifically difficult passage with perfectly pure intonation. Mr. DeMailly again impressed us as a remarkably brilliant first flute. As for Mr. Longy, the oboe has no greater player. Soloists and members of orchestra come and go, but none come who play with finer phrasing than Mr. Longy employed yesterday and as he has employed for our delight these many years. Mention of individual excellencies would not be complete without a reference to the playing of the English horn by Mr. Mueller in the French symphony.

Mr. Monteux may well be proud of his achievements with a reorganized orchestra. He has drilled his orchestra till he has balance and final tonal quality; but, as one said already, more of the present status of the orchestra later.

For the concerts of Nov. 1 and 2 Mr. Monteux has selected this program: Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, A minor; Loeffler, poem, "Une Bonne Chanson"; Ravel "Daphnis et Chloe," suite No. 1. Mme. Florence Easton will sing songs by Mozart and Debussy.

HOTEL

REDUCTION RATIO 13x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890 — 1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890 — 1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890 — 2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890 — 2.5 mm

A5

A4

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 26,

FLORENCE EASTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST

The second pair of Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Nov. 1, and Saturday evening, Nov. 2. These concerts will mark the last appearances in Boston of Mr. Monteux as conductor. The following week the orchestra departs on its first southern trip, all of the concerts of which Mr. Monteux will conduct.

This second pair of concerts brings the first soloist of the season, Florence Easton, who is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mme. Easton aroused warm commendation last spring when she sang in the performance of "L'Oracolo" during the engagement of the Metropolitan at the Boston Opera House. She is an artist of rare gifts.

Mme. Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the air "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "Prodigal Son."

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A major. The other works will be Charles Martin Loeffler's poeme, "Une Bonne Chanson," and the first suite in Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." Loeffler's work is almost new to Boston, and Ravel's suite is entirely so. "Une Bonne Chanson" was played once by the orchestra, back in Mr. Gericke's time. Since then it has been largely revised and rewritten. The second suite of "Daphnis and Chloe" appeared on the Symphony program last year. In the first suite of "Daphnis and Chloe" there is a mixed chorus "off stage." This chorus comprises 32 picked voices carefully chosen from the Boston Symphony chorus, and has been prepared by Mr. Stephen Townsend.

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 24

THERE is good news of the Boston Symphony Chorus that under Mr. Townsend's training and Dr. Muck's leadership so distinguished itself last winter. It was good to believe then that its vogue and quality signalled a new era in choral music in this town and that the orchestra had at last a choir worthy to join with it in pieces that exacted the devoted and expert service of both. Next came the débacle of last spring, now happily repaired, and for the time, the Symphony Chorus seemed to sink below the horizon. Now, it has risen again with auspicious sign for the future. The first suite that Ravel drew from his ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe" has choral parts, sung "off stage," as from remote and eery distance, by men's and women's voices—choral parts so essential to the music that the composer quarrelled bitterly with Mr. Diaghiley of the Russian Ballet when the manager omitted them in his performance in London. Next week that suite is to be played at the Symphony Concerts for the first times in Boston and, according to the standards of conductor and management, in integrity as the composer wrote it. Accordingly, Mr. Townsend has made ready a choir of thirty-two voices "from the Boston Symphony Chorus."

Evidently, then, that chorus still exists at least in skeleton, and is ready to return to its new-old place in the scheme of the Symphony Concerts and in the musical pleasure and profit of Boston. If Mr. Townsend can assemble and prepare a choir of thirty-two for Mr. Monteux—and the audiences—next week, presumably he could later assemble a much larger and not less willing body of singers for Mr. Rabaud and an appreciative public. No doubt, on the masculine side, Mr. Townsend's cadres, as the military term is, have been somewhat depleted by calls and classifications, since last spring, for the colors. On the other hand, none in Boston knows better than him the resources of the region in choral music or is more expert in the summoning and preliminary training of them. Mr. Rabaud, in turn, has led a chorus often in the opera houses and the concert-halls of Paris, with mastery and eloquence. He is almost sure to include in his twenty-two programmes of the season, symphonic pieces that ask voices as well as instruments, while he would not be the diligent, ambitious conductor that he is were he not eager, if opportunity served, to undertake such choral pieces as Berlioz's mighty Requiem or Schmitt's resplendent psalm. The Boston Symphony Chorus, as it was last winter, as, doubtless, Mr. Townsend could reconstitute it, drafts to the contrary notwithstanding, would be a superb instrument for such music. Now that the chorus, like all the other essentials to the Symphony Concerts, has flowered anew, the trustees of the orchestra have their inherited obligations to choral music also to fulfil.

Here in Boston

Subscribers to the Symphony Concerts may be reminded once more that they should bring to Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening their tickets for the actual day, Oct. 25 or 26, and not their tickets for the first concert of the series. They should begin with the tickets numbered 3 in the left-hand corner. The tickets numbered 1 and 2 will be available later in the season when concerts are substituted for those that the epidemic of influenza prevented.

If Mr. Rabaud has kept to the departure from Paris that he proposed to Symphony Hall and if the ships from Bordeaux have sailed approximately according to schedule, he should arrive in New York within the next fortnight. Thus he is likely to lead the Symphony Orchestra for the first times in public at the concerts in Boston of Nov. 15 and 16.

Mr. Loeffler has renamed his tone-poem, to be heard at the Symphony Concerts of next week. In first draft, fifteen years and more ago, he gave the piece the rather whimsy title, "Avant que Tu ne t'en Ailles." Now he calls it, "Une Bonne Chanson," from the verses of Verlaine that suggested the music. The composer has made so many changes in the score that he has almost written a new tone-poem of his

AMERICAN, OCTOBER 26,

PRESTIGE OF SYMPHONY UNDIMMED

By FRED J. McISAAC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is still incomparable.

When the conductor, concert master and more than a score of prominent performers were turned out of the big band last Spring, there were prophets who announced that the day of the Boston Symphony was done.

That no one person is indispensable was admitted, of course, but that such a huge gap in the ranks could be repaired without doing great permanent injury to the orchestra seemed incredible.

That's why the first concert of the season yesterday afternoon was of far more significance than an ordinary opening in other years.

After the first movement of the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor, the lovers of the orchestra leaned back with joyful faces. In sonority, in sweetness, in mellowness and brilliancy, this remodeled orchestra did not have to bow to its own great past.

Every German who stepped out was replaced by an American, a Frenchman or a member of some other Allied nation. The conductor was a Frenchman who had no reputation as a symphonic conductor in this country. Nevertheless the orchestra hadn't suffered in the least.

And the fetish of German musical superiority got another body blow.

This most agreeable result was only achieved by the exercise of admirable judgment by Manager W. H. Brennan in replacing the ejected Germans with equal or superior performers of more pleasing nationalities.

And the three weeks' hiatus due to the epidemic enabled Pierre Monteux to rehearse the orchestra until the new elements were perfectly welded upon the body of the old.

In the concert master's chair now sits an American, Frederick Fradkin, who comes to this high post from the seat of concert master in important European orchestras. Half a dozen skillful French veterans from the band from the trenches were visible in the brass and woodwind section.

Among the strings numerous American violinists have replaced the Germans most satisfactorily. It was a pleasure to see the white head of Alwyn Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist, who has been summoned back to the Boston orchestra for the third time.

Pierre Monteux revealed himself as a singularly competent conductor and his interpretation of the Franck Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia" was full of surprises for those of us who had heard those works as read through German spectacles. The beauty and majesty of the Franck Symphony was wholly revealed, and the fantastic impressions of Debussy in Spain were clean cut and finely etched.

The novelty of the program was Dukas "Le Peri," a piece of ballet music written for one of the Russian dance stars. Full of original orchestration and alluring rhythm this work is after all but an accompaniment to twinkling feet and gorgeous costuming and pantomime. Without them it makes little impression.

Schmann's noble overture from "Manfred" was performed by Mr. Monteux, in a manner which proved that there is little Chauvinism in his make-up.

NEW YORK HERALD, OCTOBER 28.

Henri Rabaud Comes to Direct Boston Orchestra

French Conductor Succeeds Karl Muck—Mme. Delaunois Returns—Robert Couzinon Arrives.

Several noted musicians came to New York yesterday, having arrived recently at an Atlantic port from Europe. Among them were Henri Rabaud, Robert Couzinou and Mme. Raymonde Delaunois.

Mr. Rabaud is on his way to Boston, where he will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which last season played under the baton of Karl Muck, now an inmate of an interment camp for enemy aliens. Mr. Rabaud is forty-five years old, tall and of an exceedingly pleasant manner. He has been conductor of the National Opera House in Paris and is the composer of "Marouf" and other operas.

WORLD, OCTOBER 28,

Henri Rabaud, the French conductor selected to head the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Dr. Karl Muck, interned as an enemy alien, was a passenger. M. Rabaud is head of the orchestra of the National Opera House in Paris and comes to this country on leave.

TRIBUNE, OCTOBER 2

Another passenger was Henri Rabaud, conductor of the National Opera House in Paris and composer of "Marouf," who has come to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taking the place of Dr. Karl Muck, now interned.

NEW YORK AMERICAN, OCTOBER 28

Another passenger was M. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He takes the place of Dr. Karl Muck, the German head of the orchestra for several years, who is now interned. M. Rabaud has conducted the orchestra at the National Opera House in Paris, and is the composer of the opera "Marouf," which had its premiere at the Metropolitan Opera House last year.

TIMES, OCTOBER 28

HENRI RABAUD ARRIVES.

Robert Couzinou, Opera Star, Here With Boston's New Conductor.

AN ATLANTIC PORT, Oct. 27.—Among the passengers arriving today from France on a French steamship was Henri Rabaud, the new Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has come over to replace Dr. Carl Muck. M. Rabaud has been for some years the musical director of the orchestra at the National Opera House, Paris, and is the composer of the French opera "Marouf," performed last season in New York, as well as of a symphony already heard here, and of several symphonic poems. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894 for the excellence of his musical works.

The new director of the Boston Symphony does not in any way look like the customary leader of an orchestra. He is tall, slight, has gray hair, moustache, and whiskers, and wears a frock coat, with a somewhat clerical type of wide-brimmed soft hat. He does not speak any English at present, he explained, but hopes to learn during the coming season in America. M. Rabaud said he believed he had several novelties, but did not know whether they have been played in the United States. On this and other matters he preferred to wait until he had consulted with the nine Trustees who have take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Colonel Higginson retired after the di

MONITOR, OCTOBER

BEGINNING BOSTON SYMPHONY SEAS

Specially for The Christian Science Mo

Boston Symphony Orchestra, P Monteux conducting, first concert thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall ternoon of Oct. 25, 1918. The prog César Franck, Symphony in D mi Schumann, Overture to Byron's "M fred," Op. 115; Dukas, "Le Péri, P Dansé," (first time in Boston); Debu "Ibéria," "Images" for Orchestra, N

BOSTON, Mass.—An emancip orchestra stood up to play "The S Spangled Banner" at the first con of the thirty-eighth Boston Symph season. Above them hung a h American flag; elsewhere in the were a service flag and the "Hund Per Cent" Liberty Loan flag. the emancipation was evident in playing of the air. Uniform bow feeling phrasing, vigorous attac these and the spirited playing m of the anthem something other t an empty ceremony, grudgingly formed.

Since its foundation this organ tion has been under German dom tion. Now that domination has b broken and the freedom is alre apparent in the different spirit of orchestra. A French conductor, American concert master, various faces in the ranks and a slight arrangement of the players are ward signs of change. All the techn enemy aliens are gone.

The real change, however, is no be seen with the eye, and it is ha to be heard with the ear. It is an definable air of freedom that perva a conscious loss of hampering tr tions. The efficiency of this body players has been a matter of envi emulation among orchestras. precision of its playing has bee cause for remark. Its slavish at tion to detail has afforded a topic many a complimentary criticism. short, as a heretical spirit has so times given voice, the content of music has often been lost sight o the meticulousness of its product The manner has received more att tion than the matter.

Now, however, that the emanci tion from Teutonic methods ideals has taken place, the orches stands at the threshold of a n epoch in its career. In place of chill of efficiency will come warmth of color; succeeding the m iculous reading of a score will be gratifying elasticity. In short days of the Boston Symphony Orch tra as a wonderful machine are ove instead it will be an organizati made up of men subject to like p sions as those in its audiences a All of which is by way of saying th an era of humanity has dawned for

This was apparent in the playi of the satisfactory program which M Monteux had put together. Not with long memory has the César Fran symphony had such a performan as it had yesterday afternoon. It a work to which superlatives natura apply. In its high nobility it tra scends most of the other music of th noble composer because cast in a m heroic mold. The exaltation of Franck music is perhaps its outstanding cha acteristic; it shines through the son ata for piano and violin and the won derful piano quintet, it touches t second movement of the sympho like glints of golden sunlight on mo tall pops, it lights up certa ments in the first movemen unworldly radiance. To César influence has been ascribed th of the current of French compos away from the fascinating but treac erous influence of Wagner and his music dramas toward the classical lines of symphony and opera. In the fen of stagnant water which German scholarship and uninspired writing have got us into we have need of César Franck at this hour. May it not be that as his example and kindly encouragement exerted such powerful appeal on the French composers of his day, so his music shall exercise its benign suasion on us who are in process of forming new musical standards?

The novelty of the program, Dukas' "Le Péri," made an excellent impression. It was presented with authority by Mr. Monteux, as would be expected from a conductor of ballet. From the program notes telling the story of the dance one can easily see why it would be possible to consider the music as more adapted to symphonic than choreographic purposes. Decidedly in what we have come to consider as the modern French idiom, it gave opportunity for a display of orchestral coloring which would have been impossible with the old orchestra.

Mr. Monteux was warmly applauded and made an excellent impression on his audience. He conducted without a score, ably and capably.

POST, OCTOBER 30.

WILL PLAY BEST MUSIC OF GERMANY

Rabaud Says Great Music Is Not Our Enemy

BY OLIN DOWNES

"A sincere artist," said Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived last night in this city, "cannot refuse great music its 'place in the sun.' Great music is not our enemy. I intend that the classic masters of German music shall be represented from time to time on the Boston Symphony programmes. I would wish to follow the Germans no more in their musical than in their political propaganda. In the one field they have been nearly as active as in the other.

HAD WORLD HYPNOTIZED

"It is astonishing, is it not, that at the same time the world awoke to the menace of German political domination it should have become alive to the boastfulness and falsity of many of Germany's musical pretensions? That, I think, is the case. More than one public has been hypnotized for years into the belief, not only that German composers were greatest but that there were practically no great composers outside of Germany. But I think," he added with a smile, "that today we are waking up."

Tall, spare, keen-eyed, erect of carriage, Mr. Raband's evident alertness of mind and affability of manner are those of a delightful gentleman and cultured man of the world.

Has Keen Sense of Humor

He was undergoing his first experience of an American railway as he talked, and the conversation was punctuated from time to time by a sudden gesture of energy which contrasted strikingly with his ordinarily contained manner, or a smile which would light up the face and sometimes leave behind it a droll twinkle of the eye which meant that certain things in life were not to be taken too seriously, even by distinguished gentlemen appointed to lead Symphony orchestras.

While he was talking he was quietly taking note of the country flying by the car window, the appointments and occupants of the railway carriage, and every other aspect of his journey. He was listening, observing, interviewing, in his own unofficial way, as well as being interviewed, and he could doubtless write back to Mme. Rabaud a lengthy list of observations.

Not a Propagandist

"Propoganda," he went on, "I like least of all in art. Of the art of my own country I wish to be a faithful interpreter, but not a 'propogandist.' I think a majority believe with me that French composers of today are in the vanguard of musical progress. For that very reason I desire only that they shall have opportunity to be heard as they deserve, on programmes which are properly compounded of the old and new works of many countries—heard, in other words, in just perspective and comparison with the master works of other nations.

"To impose an art on another people, to force music or a sword down the throats of a people—that, I assure you, is neither the spirit of artists, nor of France!"

Curious About Composers

Mr. Rabaud, in looking up American composers, has read with interest the music of MacDowell and inquired curiously into the accomplishments of younger American musicians of today, and looks forward, he says, with much eagerness to becoming better acquainted with their works. "You understand," he continued, "that I don't believe in musical chauvenism, or in nationalism in the narrow sense of the word in my art. But I am curious to know if there is in America a sign of a school of composers who, without being local or narrow about it, will try to develop a music unmistakably representative of the spirit of their country."

When his interviewer said that as yet there were indications rather than complate developments in this direction, Mr. Rabaud replied:

Russia's Sudden Development

"I can imagine such a thing taking place quite rapidly—as it did, for instance, in Russia. For years Russia had no music of her own. Then, quite suddenly, as if a seed which had laid in the ground for a long time had commenced to sprout, came the composer Glinka, and on his heels the amazing music of the modern Russian school. So its native art may come to America after this war—if it has not already grown itself.

"The spirit of such an art is certainly here. The nation cannot be what America has been in this war to herself and the whole world without producing important music."

France's Great Conductors

Asked who were the greatest conductors of the day in France, Mr. Rabaud mentioned, among others, Camille Chevillard; Andre Messager, who appears in Boston this evening, and with whom Alfred Cortot, the pianist, who came on to Boston with Mr. Rabaud, will play, and Pierre Monteux, who, after his brilliant success with the Boston Symphony will in a fortnight yield his baton to Mr. Rabaud.

"You will be very interested," Mr. Rabaud continued, "to hear in the performance of the orchestra of the Conservatoire one of the most famous of French orchestras, led by one of the greatest of French conductors. The orchestra is an ensemble organization perfected by years of constant rehearsal together and inspired by the highest ideals of our French musical art. You will find in Mr. Messager a remarkable musician, a man extraordinarily skilled in his profession, of the broadest taste and the most versatile abilities.

"Let me also say that nothing makes me happier, in following in the footsteps of my brilliantly talented colleague, Mr. Monteux, than to feel in these artistic associations of French and American musicians, that unity of spirit between the two nations, which stand today as one, heart to heart and hand to hand."

Transcript, Oct. 31, 1918

WEEK-END CONCERTS

MORE REVELATION AT SYMPHONY HALL

The Expectant and Satisfied Audience of Saturday Evening—Mr. Thibaud and Mr. Bauer Surpass Themselves in the First of the Sunday Concerts—An Inauspicious Afternoon for Mme. Galli-Curci—Mr. Rabaud Arrives in New York—Items and Incidents

WELL had the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon, by much good report in print and in word of mouth, prepared the way for the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening. There had been sign of a somewhat meagre audience; yet in the course of the day up to the very hour of beginning, almost every place in the hall was sold. The company of Friday afternoon had received Mr. Monteux with the plaudits of courteous curiosity; the expectant assembly of Saturday evening welcomed him with long, hearty, significant applause. The turn of the orchestra came at the end of Franck's symphony, after Dukas's tone-poem of "The Peri," at the close of the concert on the snapping Finale of Debussy's "Iberia." For weeks the town had heard the uninformed or the deliberately malicious insinuation that the reorganized orchestra was not, could not be, the Symphony Orchestra of old. Now it was hearing with its own ears, discriminating with its own mind, answering with sincere, spontaneous feeling. And lo! the new Symphony Orchestra was not only that of twenty-five glorious years but, in some respects, even surpassed it. It is related that when the negotiations for the formation of the United States Steel Company were in progress, Mr. Carnegie, weary of the feints, evasions and distortions of some of his colleagues at last broke out: "Now, let's tell the truth." Last Friday and Saturday, the truth about the new Symphony Orchestra was told by eighty-odd men at as many instruments. No wonder that the audience was in a mood to applaud even the lowering of the lights, much desired, at last achieved.

Similarly with the conductor. Incredible as it seems, it was soberly said last spring in this Boston, assumed to be an educated capital of music, that none but a German or an Austrian conductor could "really" read a score—as though Mr. Toscanini, the Italian, Sir H. Wood, the Englishman, Russian and French conductors of distinction had not been reading scores—and eloquently—in the daily practice of their calling. And there was Mr. Monteux, ordering his pace, adjusting his accents, moulding his phrases, designing his whole version of Franck's symphony in a fashion that illuminated the music, and rhythming and coloring Debussy's "Iberia" as Bostonian ears had never before heard it. What was to be expected of this conductor of ballets, even though a Stravinsky, a Rimsky-Korsakov, a Ravel had made the music to them? Yet to this very experience with the Russian Ballet Mr. Monteux owes not a little of the grace of contour, the brightness of rhythm, the lightness of flow he can lend at due moment to the music in hand. Every conductor of opera must practice his subterfuges—they are one of the limitations of lyric drama in the theatre—make his ostensible effects. Yet here again was Mr. Monteux as honest as the day, as sincere as the sun, actually surprising the veterans of his orchestra and his audience by his zeal for artfully proportioned detail, by the subtleties of his shadings, by his instinct for the varying touch that averts mechanism. In more senses than one the first Symphony Concerts were the timeliest of revelation.

Mr. Rabaud Lands

Arriving earlier than the trustees and the managers of the Symphony Orchestra had anticipated, Mr. Rabaud, conductor for the present season, disembarked yesterday in New York. As the "ship-news" reporters record it, his appearance bore out descriptions and portraits already published here. "He is," say The Times, "tall, slight, with gray hair, moustache and whiskers; while he wears a frock coat and a wide-brimmed soft felt hat of clerical shape. Like most Frenchmen of his generation—the cosmopolitan and cultivated Mr. Monteux is an exception—Rabaud speaks no English and inquirers could elicit from him only that he has brought along a trunkful of scores and that he has no plans to announce until he has tested his orchestra, surveyed his new field and taken counsel with his employers in Boston. He will arrive here tomorrow evening.

To the short programme proposed by Mr. Monteux for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday, he has now added Franck's tone-poem, "The Daughters of Æolus" ("Les Eolides"), suggested by Leconte de Lisle's verses of the winds. It will precede and make contrast for the suite from Ravel's ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe." In Dr. Muck's day, the piece was played at a pair of concerts. It then gave pleasure for beauty of line and transparency of voice.

For the first visits of the new orchestra to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington during the week beginning Nov. 4, Mr. Monteux has put together programmes drawn from the pieces heard in Boston last week or to be heard here next Friday and Saturday. To them, however, he has added two numbers, rehearsed but not played at Symphony Hall—the variations, "Istar," that restore Mr. d'Indy to the active repertory, and a Concerto Grosso by Händel, admirably displaying the qualities of the reorganized string choir. Both these pieces Mr. Monteux has included in his programme for Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, in New York. In that city on the preceding Thursday evening, he will repeat the concert of last Friday and Saturday in Boston. In New York, Baltimore, and Washington the orchestra will play Mr. Loeffler's new tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson." Outside New York, Miss Easton will be the assisting singer.

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 26, AMERICAN OCTOBER 26, OCTOBER 28 POST OCTOBER 30, Transcript, Oct. 24 1918

FLORENCE EASTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST

The second pair of Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Nov. 1, and Saturday evening, Nov. 2. These concerts will mark the last appearances in Boston of Mr. Monteux as conductor. The following week the orchestra departs on its first southern trip, all of the concerts of which Mr. Monteux will conduct.

This second pair of concerts brings the first soloist of the season, Florence Easton, who is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mme. Easton aroused warm commendation last spring when she sang in the performance of "L'Oracolo" during the engagement of the Metropolitan at the Boston Opera House. She is an artist of rare gifts.

Mme. Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the air "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "Prodigal Son."

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A major. The other works will be Charles Martin Loeffler's poeme, "Une Bonne Chanson," and the first suite in Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." Loeffler's work is almost new to Boston, and Ravel's suite is entirely so. "Une Bonne Chanson" was played once by the orchestra, back in Mr. Gericke's time. Since then it has been largely revised and rewritten. The second suite of "Daphnis and Chloe" appeared on the Symphony program last year. In the first suite of "Daphnis and Chloe" there is a mixed chorus "off stage." This chorus comprises 32 picked voices carefully chosen from the Boston Symphony chorus, and has been prepared by Mr. Stephen Townsend.

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 24

THERE is good news of the Boston Symphony Chorus that under Mr. Townsend's training and Dr. Muck's leadership so distinguished itself last winter. It was good to believe then that its vogue and quality signalled a new era in choral music in this town and that the orchestra had at last a choir worthy to join with it in pieces that exacted the devoted and expert service of both. Next came the débacle of last spring, now happily repaired, and for the time, the Symphony Chorus seemed to sink below the horizon. Now, it has risen again with auspicious sign for the future. The first suite that Ravel drew from his ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe" has choral parts, sung "off stage," as from remote and eery distance, by men's and women's voices—choral parts so essential to the music that the composer quarrelled bitterly with Mr. Diaghiley of the Russian Ballet when the manager omitted them in his performance in London. Next week that suite is to be played at the Symphony Concerts for the first times in Boston and, according to the standards of conductor and management, in integrity as the composer wrote it. Accordingly, Mr. Townsend has made ready a choir of thirty-two voices "from the Boston Symphony Chorus."

Evidently, then, that chorus still exists at least in skeleton, and is ready to return to its new-old place in the scheme of the Symphony Concerts and in the musical pleasure and profit of Boston. If Mr. Townsend can assemble and prepare a choir of thirty-two for Mr. Monteux—and the audiences—next week, presumably he could later assemble a much larger and not less willing body of singers for Mr. Rabaud and an appreciative public. No doubt, on the masculine side, Mr. Townsend's cadres, as the military term is, have been somewhat depleted by calls and classifications, since last spring, for the colors. On the other hand, none in Boston knows better than him the resources of the region in choral music or is more expert in the summoning and preliminary training of them. Mr. Rabaud, in turn, has led a chorus often in the opera houses and the concert-halls of Paris, with mastery and eloquence. He is almost sure to include in his twenty-two programmes of the season, symphonic pieces that ask voices as well as instruments, while he would not be the diligent, ambitious conductor that he is were he not eager, if opportunity served, to undertake such choral pieces as Berlioz's mighty Requiem or Schmitt's resplendent psalm. The Boston Symphony Chorus, as it was last winter, as, doubtless, Mr. Townsend could reconstitute it, drafts to the contrary notwithstanding, would be a superb instrument for such music. Now that the chorus, like all the other essentials to the Symphony Concerts, has flowered anew, the trustees of the orchestra have their inherited obligations to choral music also to fulfil.

Here in Boston

Subscribers to the Symphony Concerts may be reminded once more that they should bring to Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening their tickets for the actual day, Oct. 25 or 26, and not their tickets for the first concert of the series. They should begin with the tickets numbered 3 in the left-hand corner. The tickets numbered 1 and 2 will be available later in the season when concerts are substituted for those that the epidemic of influenza prevented.

If Mr. Rabaud has kept to the departure from Paris that he proposed to Symphony Hall and if the ships from Bordeaux have sailed approximately according to schedule, he should arrive in New York within the next fortnight. Thus he is likely to lead the Symphony Orchestra for the first times in public at the concerts in Boston of Nov. 15 and 16.

Mr. Loeffler has renamed his tone-poem, to be heard at the Symphony Concerts of next week. In first draft, fifteen years and more ago, he gave the piece the rather misty title, "Avant que Tu ne t'en Ailles." Now he calls it, "Une Bonne Chanson," from the verses of Verlaine that suggested the music. The composer has made so many changes in the score that he has practically written a new tone-poem of his

PRESTIGE OF SYMPHONY UNDIMMED

By FRED J. McISAAC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is still incomparable.

When the conductor, concert master and more than a score of prominent performers were turned out of the big band last Spring, there were prophets who announced that the day of the Boston Symphony was done.

That no one person is indispensable was admitted, of course, but that such a huge gap in the ranks could be repaired without doing great permanent injury to the orchestra seemed incredible.

That's why the first concert of the season yesterday afternoon was of far more significance than an ordinary opening in other years.

After the first movement of the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor, the lovers of the orchestra leaned back with joyful faces. In sonority, in sweetness, in mellowness and brilliancy, this remodeled orchestra did not have to bow to its own great past.

Every German who stepped out was replaced by an American, a Frenchman or a member of some other Allied nation. The conductor was a Frenchman who had no reputation as a symphonic conductor in this country. Nevertheless the orchestra hadn't suffered in the least.

And the fetish of German musical superiority got another body blow.

This most agreeable result was only achieved by the exercise of admirable judgment by Manager W. H. Brennan in replacing the ejected Germans with equal or superior performers of more pleasing nationalities.

And the three weeks' hiatus due to the epidemic enabled Pierre Monteux to rehearse the orchestra until the new elements were perfectly welded upon the body of the old.

In the concert master's chair now sits an American, Frederick Fradkin, who comes to this high post from the seat of concert master in important European orchestras. Half a dozen skillful French veterans from the band from the trenches were visible in the brass and woodwind section.

Among the strings numerous American violinists have replaced the Germans most satisfactorily. It was a pleasure to see the white head of Alwyn Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist, who has been summoned back to the Boston orchestra for the third time.

Pierre Monteux revealed himself as a singularly competent conductor and his interpretation of the Franck Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia" was full of surprises for those of us who had heard those works as read through German spectacles. The beauty and majesty of the Franck Symphony was wholly revealed, and the fantastic impressions of Debussy in Spain were clean cut and finely etched.

The novelty of the program was Dukas "Le Peri," a piece of ballet music written for one of the Russian dance stars. Full of original orchestration and alluring rhythm this work is after all but an accompaniment to twinkling feet and gorgeous costuming and pantomime. Without them it makes little impression.

Schmann's noble overture from "Manfred" was performed by Mr. Monteux, in a manner which proved that there is little Chauvinism in his make-up.

NEW YORK HERALD, OCTOBER 28.

Henri Rabaud Comes to Direct Boston Orchestra

French Conductor Succeeds Karl Muck—Mme. Delaunois Returns—Robert Couzinon Arrives.

Several noted musicians came to New York yesterday, having arrived recently at an Atlantic port from Europe. Among them were Henri Rabaud, Robert Couzinou and Mme. Raymonde Delaunois.

Mr. Rabaud is on his way to Boston, where he will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which last season played under the baton of Karl Muck, now an inmate of an internment camp for enemy aliens. Mr. Rabaud is forty-five years old, tall and of an exceedingly pleasant manner. He has been conductor of the National Opera House in Paris and is the composer of "Marouf" and other operas.

WORLD, OCTOBER 28,

Henri Rabaud, the French conductor selected to head the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Dr. Karl Muck, interned as an enemy alien, was a passenger. M. Rabaud is head of the orchestra of the National Opera House in Paris and comes to this country on leave.

TRIBUNE OCTOBER 2

Another passenger was Henri Rabaud, conductor of the National Opera House in Paris and composer of "Marouf," who has come to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taking the place of Dr. Karl Muck, now interned.

NEW YORK AMERICAN

Another passenger was M. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He takes the place of Dr. Karl Muck, the German head of the orchestra for several years, who is now interned. M. Rabaud has conducted the orchestra at the National Opera House in Paris, and is the composer of the opera "Marouf," which had its premiere at the Metropolitan Opera House last year.

TIMES, OCTOBER 28

HENRI RABAUD ARRIVES.

Robert Couzinou, Opera Star, Here With Boston's New Conductor.

AN ATLANTIC PORT, Oct. 27.—Among the passengers arriving today from France on a French steamship was Henri Rabaud, the new Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has come over to replace Dr. Carl Muck. M. Rabaud has been for some years the musical director of the orchestra at the National Opera House, Paris, and is the composer of the French opera "Marouf," performed last season in New York, as well as of a symphony already heard here, and of several symphonic poems. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894 for the excellence of his musical works.

The new director of the Boston Symphony does not in any way look like the customary leader of an orchestra. He is tall, slight, has gray hair, moustache, and whiskers, and wears a frock coat, with a somewhat clerical type wide-brimmed soft hat. He does not speak any English at present, he explained, but hopes to learn during the coming season in America. M. Rabaud said he believed he had several novelties, but did not know whether they have been played in the United States. On this and other matters he preferred to wait until he had consulted with the nine Trustees who have take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Colonel Higginson retired after the di

MONITOR, OCTOBER

BEGINNING BOSTON SYMPHONY SEAS

Specially for The Christian Science Mo

Boston Symphony Orchestra, P Monteux conducting, first concert thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall ternoon of Oct. 25, 1918. The progr

César Franck, Symphony in D mi Schumann, Overture to Byron's "M fred," Op. 115; Dukas, "Le Péri, Po Dansé," (first time in Boston); Debu "Ibéria," "Images" for Orchestra, N

BOSTON, Mass.—An emancip orchestra stood up to play "The S Spangled Banner" at the first con of the thirty-eighth Boston Symph season. Above them hung a h American flag; elsewhere in the were a service flag and the "Hund Per Cent" Liberty Loan flag. the emancipation was evident in playing of the air. Uniform bow feeling phrasing, vigorous attac these and the spirited playing m of the anthem something other t an empty ceremony, grudgingly formed.

Since its foundation this organ tion has been under German dom tion. Now that domination has b broken and the freedom is alre apparent in the different spirit of orchestra. A French conductor, American concert master, various faces in the ranks and a slight arrangement of the players are ward signs of change. All the techn enemy aliens are gone.

The real change, however, is no be seen with the eye, and it is ha to be heard with the ear. It is an definable air of freedom that perva a conscious loss of hampering tr tions. The efficiency of this body players has been a matter of env emulation among orchestras. precision of its playing has bee cause for remark. Its slavish at tion to detail has afforded a topic many a complimentary criticism. short, as a heretical spirit has so times given voice, the content of music has often been lost sight of the meticulousness of its product The manner has received more att tion than the matter.

Now, however, that the emanci tion from Teutonic methods ideals has taken place, the orches stands at the threshold of a n epoch in its career. In place of chill of efficiency will come warmth of color; succeeding the m iculous reading of a score will be gratifying elasticity. In short days of the Boston Symphony Orch tra as a wonderful machine are ov instead it will be an organizati made up of men subject to like p sions as those in its audiences a All of which is by way of saying th an era of humanity has dawned for

This was apparent in the playi of the satisfactory program which M Monteux had put together. Not with long memory has the César Fran symphony had such a performan as it had yesterday afternoon. It a work to which superlatives natura apply. In its high nobility it tra seends most of the other music of th noble composer because cast in a m heroic mold. The exaltation of Franck' music is perhaps its outstanding char acteristic; it shines through the son ata for piano and violin and the won derful piano quintet, it touches t second movement of the sympho like glints of golden sunlight on mo tall tops, it rights up certa ments in the first movemen unworldly radiance. To César influence has been ascribed th of the current of French compos away from the fascinating but treac erous influence of Wagner and his music dramas toward the classical lines of symphony and opera. In the fen of stagnant water which German scholarship and uninspired writing have got us into we have need of César Franck at this hour. May it not be that as his example and kindly encouragement exerted such powerful appeal on the French composers of his day, so his music shall exercise its benign suasion on us who are in process of forming new musical standards?

The novelty of the program, Dukas' "Le Péri," made an excellent impression. It was presented with authority by Mr. Monteux, as would be expected from a conductor of ballet. From the program notes telling the story of the dance one can easily see why it would be possible to consider the music as more adapted to symphonic than choreographic purposes. Decidedly in what we have come to consider as the modern French idiom, it gave opportunity for a display of orchestral coloring which would have been impossible with the old orchestra.

Mr. Monteux was warmly applauded and made an excellent impression on his audience. He conducted without a score, ably and capably.

WILL PLAY BEST MUSIC OF GERMANY

Rabaud Says Great Music Is Not Our Enemy

BY OLIN DOWNES

"A sincere artist," said Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived last night in this city, "cannot refuse great music its 'place in the sun.' Great music is not our enemy. I intend that the classic masters of German music shall be represented from time to time on the Boston Symphony programmes. I would wish to follow the Germans no more in their musical than in their political propaganda. In the one field they have been nearly as active as in the other.

HAD WORLD HYPNOTIZED

"It is astonishing, is it not, that at the same time the world awoke to the menace of German political domination it should have become alive to the boastfulness and falsity of many of Germany's musical pretensions? That, I think, is the case. More than one public has been hypnotized for years into the belief, not only that German composers were greatest but that there were practically no great composers outside of Germany. But I think," he added with a smile, "that today we are waking up."

Tall, spare, keen-eyed, erect of carriage, Mr. Raband's evident alertness of mind and affability of manner are those of a delightful gentleman and cultured man of the world.

Has Keen Sense of Humor

He was undergoing his first experience of an American railway as he talked, and the conversation was punctuated from time to time by a sudden gesture of energy which contrasted strikingly with his ordinarily contained manner, or a smile which would light up the face and sometimes leave behind it a droll twinkle of the eye which meant that certain things in life were not to be taken too seriously, even by distinguished gentlemen appointed to lead Symphony orchestras.

While he was talking he was quietly taking note of the country flying by the car window, the appointments and occupants of the railway carriage, and every other aspect of his journey. He was listening, observing, interviewing, in his own unofficial way, as well as being interviewed, and he could doubtless write back to Mme. Rabaud a lengthy list of observations.

Not a Propagandist

"Propoganda," he went on, "I like least of all in art. Of the art of my own country I wish to be a faithful interpreter, but not a 'propogandist.' I think a majority believe with me that French composers of today are in the vanguard of musical progress. For that very reason I desire only that they shall have opportunity to be heard as they deserve, on programmes which are properly compounded of the old and new works of many countries—heard, in other words, in just perspective and comparison with the master works of other nations.

"To impose an art on another people, to force music or a sword down the throats of a people—that, I assure you, is neither the spirit of artists, nor of France!"

Curious About Composers

Mr. Rabaud, in looking up American composers, has read with interest the music of MacDowell and inquired curiously into the accomplishments of younger American musicians of today, and looks forward, he says, with much eagerness to becoming better acquainted with their works. "You understand," he continued, "that I don't believe in musical chauvenism, or in nationalism in the narrow sense of the word in my art. But I am curious to know if there is in America a sign of a school of composers who, without being local or narrow about it, will try to develop a music unmistakably representative of the spirit of their country."

When his interviewer said that as yet there were indications rather than complete developments in this direction, Mr. Rabaud replied:

Russia's Sudden Development

"I can imagine such a thing taking place quite rapidly—as it did, for instance, in Russia. For years Russia had no music of her own. Then, quite suddenly, as if a seed which had laid in the ground for a long time had commenced to sprout, came the composer Glinka, and on his heels the amazing music of the modern Russian school. So its native art may come to America after this war—if it has not already done so—of itself.

"The spirit of such an art is certainly here. The nation cannot be what America has been in this war to herself and the whole world without producing important music."

France's Great Conductors

Asked who were the greatest conductors of the day in France, Mr. Rabaud mentioned, among others, Camille Chevillard; Andre Messager, who appears in Boston this evening, and with whom Alfred Cortot, the pianist, who came on to Boston with Mr. Rabaud, will play, and Pierre Monteux, who, after his brilliant success with the Boston Symphony will in a fortnight yield his baton to Mr. Rabaud.

"You will be very interested," Mr. Rabaud continued, "to hear in the performance of the orchestra of the Conservatoire one of the most famous of French orchestras, led by one of the greatest of French conductors. The orchestra is an ensemble organization perfected by years of constant rehearsal together and inspired by the highest ideals of our French musical art. You will find in Mr. Messager a remarkable musician, a man extraordinarily skilled in his profession, of the broadest taste and the most versatile abilities.

"Let me also say that nothing makes me happier, in following in the footsteps of my brilliantly talented colleague, Mr. Monteux, than to feel in these artistic associations of French and American musicians, that unity of spirit between the two nations, which stand today as one, heart to heart and hand to hand."

WEEK-END CONCERTS

MORE REVELATION AT SYMPHONY HALL

The Expectant and Satisfied Audience of Saturday Evening—Mr. Thibaud and Mr. Bauer Surpass Themselves in the First of the Sunday Concerts—An Inauspicious Afternoon for Mme. Galli-Curci—Mr. Rabaud Arrives in New York—Items and Incidents

WELL had the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon, by much good report in print and in word of mouth, prepared the way for the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening. There had been sign of a somewhat meagre audience; yet in the course of the day up to the very hour of beginning, almost every place in the hall was sold. The company of Friday afternoon had received Mr. Monteux with the plaudits of courteous curiosity; the expectant assembly of Saturday evening welcomed him with long, hearty, significant applause. The turn of the orchestra came at the end of Franck's symphony, after Dukas's tone-poem of "The Peri," at the close of the concert on the snapping Finale of Debussy's "Iberia." For weeks the town had heard the uninformed or the deliberately malicious insinuation that the reorganized orchestra was not, could not be, the Symphony Orchestra of old. Now it was hearing with its own ears, discriminating with its own mind, answering with sincere, spontaneous feeling. And lo! the new Symphony Orchestra was not only that of twenty-five glorious years but, in some respects, even surpassed it. It is related that when the negotiations for the formation of the United States Steel Company were in progress, Mr. Carnegie, weary of the feints, evasions and distortions of some of his colleagues at last broke out: "Now, let's tell the truth." Last Friday and Saturday, the truth about the new Symphony Orchestra was told by eighty-odd men at as many instruments. No wonder that the audience was in a mood to applaud even the lowering of the lights, much desired, at last achieved.

Similarly with the conductor. Incredible as it seems, it was soberly said last spring in this Boston, assumed to be an educated capital of music, that none but a German or an Austrian conductor could "really" read a score—as though Mr. Toscanini, the Italian, Sir H. Wood, the Englishman, Russian and French conductors of distinction had not been reading scores—and eloquently—in the daily practice of their calling. And there was Mr. Monteux, ordering his pace, adjusting his accents, moulding his phrases, designing his whole version of Franck's symphony in a fashion that illuminated the music, and rhythming and coloring Debussy's "Iberia" as Bostonian ears had never before heard it. What was to be expected of this conductor of ballets, even though a Stravinsky, a Rimsky-Korsakov, a Ravel had made the music to them? Yet to this very experience with the Russian Ballet Mr. Monteux owes not a little of the grace of contour, the brightness of rhythm, the lightness of flow he can lend at due moment to the music in hand. Every conductor of opera must practice his subterfuges—they are one of the limitations of lyric drama in the theatre—make his ostensible effects. Yet here again was Mr. Monteux as honest as the day, as sincere as the sun, actually surprising the veterans of his orchestra and his audience by his zeal for artfully proportioned detail, by the subtleties of his shadings, by his instinct for the varying touch that averts mechanism. In more senses than one the first Symphony Concerts were the timeliest of revelation.

Mr. Rabaud Lands

Arriving earlier than the trustees and the managers of the Symphony Orchestra had anticipated, Mr. Rabaud, conductor for the present season, disembarked yesterday in New York. As the "ship-news" reporters record it, his appearance bore out descriptions and portraits already published here. "He is," say The Times, "tall, slight, with gray hair, moustache and whiskers; while he wears a frock coat and a wide-brimmed soft felt hat of clerical shape. Like most Frenchmen of his generation—the cosmopolitan and cultivated Mr. Monteux is an exception—Rabaud speaks no English and inquirers could elicit from him only that he has brought along a trunkful of scores and that he has no plans to announce until he has tested his orchestra, surveyed his new field and taken counsel with his employers in Boston. He will arrive here tomorrow evening.

To the short programme proposed by Mr. Monteux for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday, he has now added Franck's tone-poem, "The Daughters of Æolus" ("Les Eolides"), suggested by Leconte de Lisle's verses of the winds. It will precede and make contrast for the suite from Ravel's ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe." In Dr. Muck's day, the piece was played at a pair of concerts. It then gave pleasure for beauty of line and transparency of voice.

For the first visits of the new orchestra to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington during the week beginning Nov. 4, Mr. Monteux has put together programmes drawn from the pieces heard in Boston last week or to be heard here next Friday and Saturday. To them, however, he has added two numbers, rehearsed but not played at Symphony Hall—the variations, "Istar," that restore Mr. d'Indy to the active repertory, and a Concerto Grosso by Händel, admirably displaying the qualities of the reorganized string choir. Both these pieces Mr. Monteux has included in his programme for Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, in New York. In that city on the preceding Thursday evening, he will repeat the concert of last Friday and Saturday in Boston. In New York, Baltimore, and Washington the orchestra will play Mr. Loeffler's new tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson." Outside New York, Miss Easton will be the assisting singer.

[illegible] postponed appearances [illegible]

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

TRANSCRIPT OCTOBER 29.

Henri Rabaud Sketched on His First Day in America

An Ingratiating, but Reticent, Man

The New Conductor

(From a Photograph by Bain Taken in New York on Monday)

I HAVE no attitude except that of a stranger who has been honored by the appointment to conduct one of your great orchestras," was the carefully-phrased and dignified response of Henri Rabaud, newly-appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the question of his attitude towards German music.

It was no easy matter to see Mr. Rabaud. Either because he had been carefully coached regarding the insistent American newspaper man or because he prefers to let his work speak for his opinions, or because of a natural gentleman-like courtesy towards the trustees of the orchestra he is to conduct, he has kept in New York to an extreme reticence. But in addition Mr. Rabaud was tired from his long journey and when The Transcript representative called at his hotel he had been out of touch with the management of the Symphony Orchestra for many hours. Telephoning his room for an interview was of little avail, but the casual knock on the door of that room brought the response sought. As the reporter entered Mr. Rabaud was stretched flat on the bed, tired out by the fatigue of a first day ashore. His only companion, the New York representative of the Renault Automobile Company, said that Mr. Rabaud was tired, had refused admittance to everyone, but would see The Transcript's correspondent for a very few minutes.

In apperance Mr. Rabaud bears little resemblance to the stereotyped ideas of European composers. Tall, spare, with stooping shoulders, he presents rather the appearance of an easy-going, genial scholar. There are hundreds of serious clergymen throughout New England who might wear the same form and face. It is a kindly, gentle face, small in comparison to the long length of body—in repose quiet and dignified, almost patriarchal with full gray beard and moustache. The nose, not prominent, is crowned by deep-set eyes of gray—or are they of that indeterminate color we describe as gray-green?—; the hair, sparse, especially towards the back of the head, is carefully brushed. Mr. Rabaud wore a suit of dull gray and brown, the clothes of a modest American business man. It fitted loosely his lank form.

As Mr. Rabaud talks, however, particularly as his interest increases, his eyes, at first lack-lustreless, grow into a sparkling animation until his face breaks gradually into a succession of swiftly moving smiles. Almost as ripples on a summer lake do these smiles follow one another. Mild mannered, quiet of speech, dignified, courteous—such was the swiftly drawn first impression.

So far as plans for Mr. Rabaud's year with the orchestra are concerned he has nothing to say; they must be left until he has taken counsel with the trustees of the orchestra. He has with him certain novel pieces. What they are and how highly he values them he preferred not to say until later. He did admit almost unwittingly that his attitude towards "la musique allemande" might well be that of any other French musician.

W. B. M.

MONITOR OCTOBER 30.

NEW CONDUCTOR REACHES BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—Mr. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arrived in Boston ready to take up his new work. He is proceeding carefully in his statements until he gets accustomed to place and people. To a group of newspaper men who raised the question as to the kind of music he would place on his programs, and the composers he would eliminate because of national feeling, he emphasized the fact that Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms were classical and as such entitled to a hearing irrespective of their nationality.

Mr. Rabaud will hold his first rehearsal with the orchestra, now under the direction of Pierre Monteux, on Nov. 11, and will conduct his first concert in America at the appearance of the orchestra at Cambridge on Nov. 14.

MONITOR OCTOBER 29.

MR. RABAUD, BOSTON CONDUCTOR, ARRIVES

Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern Bureau

NEW YORK, N. Y.—Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived from France at an Atlantic port on Sunday, is spending a little time here preparatory to taking up his work. With him is W. H. Brennan, the manager of the orchestra. Talking with a representative of The Christian Science Monitor, Mr. Rabaud said that he was anxious to get in touch with the trustees of the orchestra, to meet the players, and to begin rehearsing his programs as soon as possible. He plans to arrive in Boston late on Tuesday evening.

HERALD OCTOBER 30.

NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HERE

Henri Rabaud Enthusiastic Over Prospects of Work Here

STATES ATTITUDE ON GERMAN MUSIC

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reached this city last night fresh from his successes in Paris and full of enthusiasm for the work he is to take up here.

Accompanied from New York by Manager W. H. Brennan, he preceeded at once to the Copley-Plaza, where he was welcomed by a group of admirers and friends. He is a man above average height, slimly built, with iron-gray beard and hair, alert of movement and still in the forties; he wears a loose frock coat and a soft hat with a wide brim. He is modesty personified, thinks more than he speaks, but can warm up on subjects that interest him and is not averse to being questioned. The only reserve he showed last night in his talk with newspaper men arose out of his wish not to embarrass the nine trustees of the orchestra with any definite pronouncements of his own.

Cannot Outline Program

"I cannot definitely outline any program I shall follow," he said, "for being here in a friendly country, under invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I feel that before consultation with the trustees it would be indelicate, even indiscreet, were I to discuss matters which will have to be taken up with them. All I would say of German music is that I see no reason why I should not conduct the orchestra in classical productions, such as those of Beethoven, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert and Brahms; as to Wagner, Strauss and other composers, I need not mention, all I would say is that in the allied countries there is a tacit agreement that they should not be played."

Speaking in French, for his English is not yet mature enough for conversation, M. Rabaud went on to chat pleasantly about his work for seven years past as director of the orchestra at the National Opera House in Paris, and about the numerous trips he has made to Sweden, Denmark and Italy. He sees as yet no direct influence of the war on French music, but he looks for a distinct revival of interest in music generally after the war, extending to composers as well as to the musical public. The war, he said, had called a number of artists from their accustomed places in Paris, but that was only to be expected; in some cases women had been called in to act as substitutes for the men. Asked how he liked the present war situation, with Germany and Austria begging for peace, the conductor's face lighted up for his emphatic reply: "It pleases me—I like it immensely."

M. Rabaud arrived in this country from France on Sunday last and remained only a day in New York before hastening to take up his engagement here. He will confer with the trustees today and will make his first appearance as conductor on Nov. 14 in Cambridge. He will conduct in Boston for the first time at the concerts to be given on Nov. 15 and 16.

RECORD, OCTOBER 28.

Henri Rabaud In New York on Way to Boston

Boston music lovers today learned with keen interest of the arrival in New York of Henri Rabaud, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has come to the United States to take the place of Dr. Karl Muck, recently deposed. The new leader will come to Boston at once for a conference with Maj. Higginson.

Interviewed by New York reporters, M. Rabaud declined to discuss the plans, saying he preferred to wait until he has had time to consult with the Symphony officials. M. Rabaud said he believed he had several novelties in store for Boston, but he expressed some doubt as to whether these had been played in America.

M. Rabaud is described as tall, slight, with gray mustache and whiskers. He does not speak English, but said he hoped to be able to learn the language during his stay in the United States.

M. Rabaud is well and favorably known in international musical circles. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894.

GLOBE OCTOBER 30.

WAGNER'S WORKS BARRED IN BOSTON

But New Symphony Leader Approves of "Classics"

While the works of Wagner will be barred by the Boston Symphony Orchestra throughout the war, as essentially German, those of Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms, being world classics, will not be banned, so far as the new French conductor of that orchestra, Henri Rabaud, is concerned.

HENRI RABAUD.

Mr Rabaud so stated last evening to newspaper men on his arrival from New York. He said that the "classics" mentioned have been freely rendered in Paris during the war and he could see no reason for any other policy in Boston.

The new conductor, who is at the Copley-Plaza for the present, was disinclined to talk further about the local situation till he had seen his orchestra and familiarized himself with conditions generally.

Mr Rabaud is aged 45, yet quite gray; has a full beard, is rather tall and slender, unpretentious in dress and unmistakably of a retiring tendency. He speaks no English. He came to this country alone, his wife remaining for the present in Paris. From New York to Boston he was accompanied by W. H. Brennan, representing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and by Alfred Costot, French pianist, who is to appear here as a soloist within a day or two.

Mr Rabaud will begin rehearsing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov 11. His first public appearance in America will be on Nov 14, when he will lead that organization at its second concert in Cambridge. He will conduct in Boston on Nov 15 and 16.

Mr Rabaud is of distinguished musical ancestry, a native of Paris. He graduated from the famous Paris Conservatoire and when quite young organized and conducted orchestras in Rome and Vienna. For 20 years his work has been largely as a conductor in Paris, the last seven years at the Grand Opera. He has composed three operas, several [illegible] and two important

POST OCTOBER 26.

SEASON OF SYMPHONY IS OPENED

Famous Band Better Than Ever Under Monteux

BY OLIN DOWNES

For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a French conductor, Mr. Pierre Monteux, stood at its head when the season of 1918-1919 opened yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The reception given conductor and band, the quality of the performances, the make-up, as well as the evident enthusiasm of the audience, augur very happily for the future of Boston's famous musical organization. The same subscribers, in the great majority of cases, occupied the same seats. The audience was a large one, animated by the sentiment, "Stand by the orchestra."

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

There have been many important changes of personnel in the orchestra since last season. There will be later occasions to particularize as to the effect of these changes. The band has undoubtedly gained by many of the substitutions. This is particularly evident in the string division, led by the new concertmaster, Mr. Fradkin, not only the rarely talented violinist he showed himself to be when he visited Boston, under Mr. Monteux, with the orchestra of the Russian ballet, but as evidently a leader of musical stability and authority.

But the improvements in the quality of the orchestra are not only in the string division. They show everywhere. The tone is warmer, more beautiful, more transparent; the intonation is purer; there is greater technical finish and eloquence of detail. The main responsibility for this is not the changes in personnel, valuable, on the whole, as they undoubtedly have been. The responsibility is Mr. Monteux's.

Mr. Monteux is a very simple man, rather under medium height, erect, uncommonly clear-eyed, unostentatious, self-possessed in the presence of an audience, and quietly master of his men. He had not conducted two minutes before it was apparent that he had made of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a finer instrument than it has been for many seasons He is a supremely artistic interpreter, a man profoundly in earnest, and thoroughly equipped for his task.

There may be a number of conductors equally gifted in France. If this is so, it is time that the Aemrican musical public should awaken to the fact, and realize that conductors are not exclusively manfactured in Germany.

Interpretation of Symphony

The fact, we believe, was yesterday self-evident that Mr. Monteux's interpretation of Franck's symphony surpassed in eloquence, in mastery of line and mood, in sympathy with the genius of the composer, that of his predecessor. It had wamer feeling, more sensitive color, more dramatic emotion. It was more vital as it was more elastic in its rhythmical current. A great flood of music ebbed and flowed, sank to whispers of the most intimate self-communion, or mounted to the very heavens in its supplications and its ecstasies. There was heard the voice of the man alone with his maker, the terrors and exaltations of him who in his secret hour cries out, "Lord, I believe. Help thou mine unbelief." Each solo instrument, every atom of the orchestra, in tender dialogue or prophetic acclamation, was possessed of the emotion of music, now compassionate, now beseeching, now lofty contemplative, or aflame with the vision of the day to come. In this sensitiveness of mood and plasticity of phrase lies much of the secret of Franck's genius, whose genius was felt and profoundly impressed on the audience by the conductor.

This symphony, which hymns the compassion of God and the ultimate triumph of the meek and the humble, was composed by a man of Liege, the city which gave its life that freedom might live.

The other works on the programme were Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas, ballet music, "Le Peri: Poeme Danse," composed in 1910 for Madamoiselle Trouhanowa, and performed yesterday for the first time in Boston; and Debussy's "Iberia." The performance of Schumann's work, a remarkable testimony of Mr. Monteux's catholicity of taste, was perhaps the most sympathetic that we have heard of this work, genuinely Schumannish, and as romantic as might be. As for the music itself, it seemed yesterday of another period, and a combination of good Schumann and waterly Mendelssohn, beautifully as it was played. The music of Dukas, while not perhaps of great intrinsic worth, is as gorgeous as a peacock's wing. For its full effect it would require scenery and pantomime, but it sounds superbly, and the modern French musical idiom is employed with consummate skill. It also served as a superb display of the virtuosity of the orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT OCTOBER 29,

Henri Rabaud Sketched on His First Day in America

An Ingratiating, but Reticent, Man

The New Conductor

(From a Photograph by Bain Taken in New York on Monday)

I HAVE no attitude except that of a stranger who has been honored by the appointment to conduct one of your great orchestras," was the carefully-phrased and dignified response of Henri Rabaud, newly-appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the question of his attitude towards German music.

It was no easy matter to see Mr. Rabaud. Either because he had been carefully coached regarding the insistent American newspaper man or because he prefers to let his work speak for his opinions, or because of a natural gentleman-like courtesy towards the trustees of the orchestra he is to conduct, he has kept in New York to an extreme reticence. But in addition Mr. Rabaud was tired from his long journey and when The Transcript representative called at his hotel he had been out of touch with the management of the Symphony Orchestra for many hours. Telephoning his room for an interview was of little avail, but the casual knock on the door of that room brought the response sought. As the reporter entered Mr. Rabaud was stretched flat on the bed, tired out by the fatigue of a first day ashore. His only companion, the New York representative of the Renault Automobile Company, said that Mr. Rabaud was tired, had refused admittance to everyone, but would see The Transcript's correspondent for a very few minutes.

In apperance Mr. Rabaud bears little resemblance to the stereotyped ideas of European composers. Tall, spare, with stooping shoulders, he presents rather the appearance of an easy-going, genial scholar. There are hundreds of serious clergymen throughout New England who might well bear the same form and face. It is a kindly, gentle face, small in comparison to the long length of body—in repose quiet and dignified, almost patriarchal with full gray beard and moustache. The nose, not prominent, is crowned by deep-set eyes of gray—or are they of that indeterminate color we describe as gray-green?—; the hair, sparse, especially towards the back of the head, is carefully brushed. Mr. Rabaud wore a suit of dull gray and brown, the clothes of a modest American business man. It fitted loosely his lank form.

As Mr. Rabaud talks, however, particularly as his interest increases, his eyes, at first lack-lustreless, grow into a sparkling animation until his face breaks gradually into a succession of swiftly moving smiles. Almost as ripples on a summer lake do these smiles follow one another. Mild mannered, quiet of speech, dignified, courteous—such was the swiftly drawn first impression.

So far as plans for Mr. Rabaud's year with the orchestra are concerned he has nothing to say; they must be left until he has taken counsel with the trustees of the orchestra. He has with him certain novel pieces. What they are and how highly he values them he preferred not to say until later. He did admit almost unwittingly that his attitude towards "la musique allemande" might well be that of any other French musician.

W. B. M.

MONITOR OCTOBER 30,

NEW CONDUCTOR REACHES BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Mass.—Mr. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arrived in Boston ready to take up his new work. He is proceeding carefully in his statements until he gets accustomed to place and people. To a group of newspaper men who raised the question as to the kind of music he would place on his programs, and the composers he would eliminate because of national feeling, he emphasized the fact that Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms were classical and as such entitled to a hearing irrespective of their nationality.

Mr. Rabaud will hold his first rehearsal with the orchestra, now under the direction of Pierre Monteux, on Nov. 11, and will conduct his first concert in America at the appearance of the orchestra at Cambridge on Nov. 14.

MONITOR OCTOBER 29,

MR. RABAUD, BOSTON CONDUCTOR, ARRIVES

Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern Bureau

NEW YORK, N. Y.—Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived from France at an Atlantic port on Sunday, is spending a little time here preparatory to taking up his work. With him is W. H. Brennan, the manager of the orchestra. Talking with a representative of The Christian Science Monitor, Mr. Rabaud said that he was anxious to get in touch with the trustees of the orchestra, to meet the players, and to begin rehearsing his programs as soon as possible. He plans to arrive in Boston late on Tuesday evening.

HERALD OCTOBER 30,

NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HERE

Henri Rabaud Enthusiastic Over Prospects of Work Here

STATES ATTITUDE ON GERMAN MUSIC

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reached this city last night fresh from his successes in Paris and full of enthusiasm for the work he is to take up here.

Accompanied from New York by Manager W. H. Brennan, he preceeded at once to the Copley-Plaza, where he was welcomed by a group of admirers and friends. He is a man above average height, slimly built, with iron-gray beard and hair, alert of movement and still in the forties; he wears a loose frock coat and a soft hat with a wide brim. He is modesty personified, thinks more than he speaks, but can warm up on subjects that interest him and is not averse to being questioned. The only reserve he showed last night in his talk with newspaper men arose out of his wish not to embarrass the nine trustees of the orchestra with any definite pronouncements of his own.

Cannot Outline Program

"I cannot definitely outline any program I shall follow," he said, "for being here in a friendly country, under invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I feel that before consultation with the trustees it would be indelicate, even indiscreet, were I to discuss matters which will have to be taken up with them. All I would say of German music is that I see no reason why I should not conduct the orchestra in classical productions, such as those of Beethoven, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert and Brahms; as to Wagner, Strauss and other composers, I need not mention, all I would say is that in the allied countries there is a tacit agreement that they should not be played."

Speaking in French, for his English is not yet mature enough for conversation, M. Rabaud went on to chat pleasantly about his work for seven years past as director of the orchestra at the National Opera House in Paris, and about the numerous trips he has made to Sweden, Denmark and Italy. He sees as yet no direct influence of the war on French music, but he looks for a distinct revival of interest in music generally after the war, extending to composers as well as to the musical public. The war, he said, had called a number of artists from their accustomed places in Paris, but that was only to be expected; in some cases women had been called in to act as substitutes for the men. Asked how he liked the present war situation, with Germany and Austria begging for peace, the conductor's face lighted up for his emphatic reply: "It pleases me—I like it immensely."

M. Rabaud arrived in this country from France on Sunday last and remained only a day in New York before hastening to take up his engagement here. He will confer with the trustees today and will make his first appearance as conductor on Nov. 14 in Cambridge. He will conduct in Boston for the first time at the concerts to be given on Nov. 15 and 16.

RECORD, OCTOBER 28.

Henri Rabaud In New York on Way to Boston

Boston music lovers today learned with keen interest of the arrival in New York of Henri Rabaud, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has come to the United States to take the place of Dr. Karl Muck, recently deposed. The new leader will come to Boston at once for a conference with Maj. Higginson.

Interviewed by New York reporters, M. Rabaud declined to discuss the plans, saying he preferred to wait until he has had time to consult with the Symphony officials. M. Rabaud said he believed he had several novelties in store for Boston, but he expressed some doubt as to whether these had been played in America.

M. Rabaud is described as tall, slight, with gray mustache and whiskers. He does not speak English, but said he hoped to be able to learn the language during his stay in the United States.

M. Rabaud is well and favorably known in international musical circles. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894.

GLOBE OCTOBER 30.

WAGNER'S WORKS BARRED IN BOSTON

But New Symphony Leader Approves of "Classics"

While the works of Wagner will be barred by the Boston Symphony Orchestra throughout the war, as essentially German, those of Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms, being world classics, will not be banned, so far as the new French conductor of that orchestra, Henri Rabaud, is concerned.

HENRI RABAUD.

Mr Rabaud so stated last evening to newspaper men on his arrival from New York. He said that the "classics" mentioned have been freely rendered in Paris during the war and he could see no reason for any other policy in Boston.

The new conductor, who is at the Copley-Plaza for the present, was disinclined to talk further about the local situation till he had seen his orchestra and familiarized himself with conditions generally.

Mr Rabaud is aged 45, yet quite gray; has a full beard, is rather tall and slender, unpretentious in dress and unmistakably of a retiring tendency. He speaks no English. He came to this country alone, his wife remaining for the present in Paris. From New York to Boston he was accompanied by W. H. Brennan, representing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and by Alfred Costot, French pianist, who is to appear here as a soloist within a day or two.

Mr Rabaud will begin rehearsing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov 11. His first public appearance in America will be on Nov 14, when he will lead that organization at its second concert in Cambridge. He will conduct in Boston on Nov 15 and 16.

Mr Rabaud is of distinguished musical ancestry, a native of Paris. He graduated from the famous Paris Conservatoire and when quite young organized and conducted orchestras in Rome and Vienna. For 20 years his work has been largely as a conductor in Paris, the last seven years at the Grand Opera. He has composed three operas, several [illegible] and two important

POST, OCTOBER 26.

SEASON OF SYMPHONY IS OPENED

Famous Band Better Than Ever Under Monteux

BY OLIN DOWNES

For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a French conductor, Mr. Pierre Monteux, stood at its head when the season of 1918-1919 opened yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The reception given conductor and band, the quality of the performances, the make-up, as well as the evident enthusiasm of the audience, augur very happily for the future of Boston's famous musical organization. The same subscribers, in the great majority of cases, occupied the same seats. The audience was a large one, animated by the sentiment, "Stand by the orchestra."

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

There have been many important changes of personnel in the orchestra since last season. There will be later occasions to particularize as to the effect of these changes. The band has undoubtedly gained by many of the substitutions. This is particularly evident in the string division, led by the new concertmaster, Mr. Fradkin, not only the rarely talented violinist he showed himself to be when he visited Boston, under Mr. Monteux, with the orchestra of the Russian ballet, but as evidently a leader of musical stability and authority.

But the improvements in the quality of the orchestra are not only in the string division. They show everywhere. The tone is warmer, more beautiful, more transparent; the intonation is purer; there is greater technical finish and eloquence of detail. The main responsibility for this is not the changes in personnel, valuable, on the whole, as they undoubtedly have been. The responsibility is Mr. Monteux's.

Mr. Monteux is a very simple man, rather under medium height, erect, uncommonly clear-eyed, unostentatious, self-possessed in the presence of an audience, and quietly master of his men. He had not conducted two minutes before it was apparent that he had made of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a finer instrument than it has been for many seasons He is a supremely artistic interpreter, a man profoundly in earnest, and thoroughly equipped for his task.

There may be a number of conductors equally gifted in France. If this is so, it is time that the Aemrican musical public should awaken to the fact, and realize that conductors are not exclusively manfactured in Germany.

Interpretation of Symphony

The fact, we believe, was yesterday self-evident that Mr. Monteux's interpretation of Franck's symphony surpassed in eloquence, in mastery of line and mood, in sympathy with the genius of the composer, that of his predecessor. It had wamer feeling, more sensitive color, more dramatic emotion. It was more vital as it was more elastic in its rhythmical current. A great flood of music ebbed and flowed, sank to whispers of the most intimate self-communion, or mounted to the very heavens in its supplications and its ecstasies. There was heard the voice of the man alone with his maker, the terrors and exaltations of him who in his secret hour cries out, "Lord, I believe. Help thou mine unbelief." Each solo instrument, every atom of the orchestra, in tender dialogue or prophetic acclamation, was possessed of the emotion of music, now compassionate, now beseeching, now lofty contemplative, or aflame with the vision of the day to come. In this sensitiveness of mood and plasticity of phrase lies much of the secret of Franck's genius, whose genius was felt and profoundly impressed on the audience by the conductor.

This symphony, which hymns the compassion of God and the ultimate triumph of the meek and the humble, was composed by a man of Liege, the city which gave its life that freedom might live.

The other works on the programme were Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas, ballet music, "Le Peri: Poeme Danse," composed in 1910 for Madamoiselle Trouhanowa, and performed yesterday for the first time in Boston; and Debussy's "Iberia." The performance of Schumann's work, a remarkable testimony of Mr. Monteux's catholicity of taste, was perhaps the most sympathetic that we have heard of this work, genuinely Schumannish, and as romantic as might be. As for the music itself, it seemed yesterday of another period, and a combination of good Schumann and waterly Mendelssohn, beautifully as it was played. The music of Dukas, while not perhaps of great intrinsic worth, is as gorgeous as a peacock's wing. For its full effect it would require scenery and pantomime, but it sounds superbly, and the modern French musical idiom is employed with consummate skill. It also served as a superb display of the virtuosity of the orchestra.

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Maintained, Refreshed, Rekindled

The Symphony Concerts Begin with a New Orchestra Worthy of the Old, an Engrossing Conductor, a Novel and Notable Piece

SINCE the very first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Oct. 22, 1881, none, probably, has marked so many new beginnings as that of yesterday, Oct. 25, 1918, at the outset of the thirty-eighth season. To the single proprietorship of Mr. Higginson had succeeded the more representative and democratic control of a board of nine trustees. Saved by them from the perils threatening its existence last spring, the Boston Symphony Orchestra Incorporated (as the programme-book labels it) now sat upon the stage, with one-quarter and more of the players new to its ranks. For the first time, since the passing visit of Mr. d' Indy, twelve years ago, a Parisian, Mr. Monteux, led the band, new, likewise, to Bostonian ears as conductor in symphonic music. Even the programme, divided between three French pieces and a single German classic, was conditioned by the obligations and the prejudices of wartime.

Details of the day likewise bore witness to a new and open-minded régime, less self-centred and remote, more responsive to the reasonable wishes of its public. From the ceiling nearly in line with the edge of the platform hung, for example, a large United States flag; on the rear rails of the balconies were a service flag and the pennant of a full subscription to the recent war-loan. For the first time within the memory of the oldest frequenter of the concerts, the lights in the auditorium were lowered during performance, while those above the stage threw orchestra and conductor into high relief—a salutary and grateful change, contributing not a little to the enjoyment of the music. At every turn, some minor departure from old routine caught the eye. The harps, for example, had receded from the front of the stage to the rear of the first violins; familiar faces in the orchestra sat in unfamiliar places; even the plush upon the rails of the balconies, the carpets upon the aisles were new. For the first time, finally, throughout a Symphony Concert, a conductor led without a score before him, Toscanini-wise. Unchanged only were the programme-book, familiar repository of learning made entertainment, and the audience. Doubtless a few chairs were empty, but the listeners at cursory glance seemed to fill the hall. In aspect, they might have been any audience, for ten years past, of a Friday afternoon.

Details of the Day

No incident diversified the preliminaries of the concert until, lingering long after the rest of the orchestra, old Mr. Schroeder, who has been recalled to the violoncellos, come conspicuously to his place, was immediately recognized and received a hearty round of applause. Much less conspicuously and by no means so warmly clapped, followed the conductor himself, Mr. Monteux. Almost before the audience had recognized him, he set to "The Star-Spangled Banner," in a version for full orchestra, prepared by Mr. Converse, here and there retouched by the conductor, and heard for the first time hereabouts. The composer has set down the hymn as played in the Army and the Navy, then harmonized it richly and distributed the instrumental voices sonorously, treating it less as a tune that might be sung by an audience than as an anthem to be eloquently intoned by the orchestra. Even his counterpoint moves in stately progress. The result was a nobler voice than usual for music that as such bears repetition none too well—a dignity and largeness accented by Mr. Monteux's pace, phrasing, emphasis. Somehow, as Mr. Messager will again demonstrate next Wednesday, these French conductors make much more of our national hymn than do most Americans. Perhaps they respect it more.

So far as applause may go, the audience made ample amends to Mr. Monteux at each pause in Franck's symphony, the first item of the programme, and at the end. By that time, it had discovered that the reorganized orchestra was in every respect the peer of the old; that in some particulars it excelled it; that the conductor himself had ear, intelligence, imagination, sensibility and force; that he and his men were perfectly responsive to each other. To them, indeed, Mr. Monteux would transfer the plaudits. He called them to their feet as soon as the clapping began; he turned to them before he turned to the audience. Not until, at the third acknowledgment, when the orchestra, with happy tact, obstinately kept its seat, would he take the applause for himself—a conductor as modest and generous as he is able and eloquent. Onward through the rest of the concert, though it was beyond expectation that so crowded a piece as Schumann's overture to "Manfred" would excite the plaudits that answered Franck's luminous symphony; while not all ears hear too gladly such ultra-modern Parisian pieces as Dukas's "danced poem" of "The Peri," or Debussy's more familiar "Iberia." So the end crowned the day. A single concert had dispelled doubts and fears. The new orchestra was no less the Boston Symphony Orchestra of old—unmatched in America, unexcelled in Europe. If no genius led it—such are few and far between—a conductor of signal ability and persuasive personality held it in the hollow of his hand. In programme, performance, personnel not a standard had abated. The Symphony Orchestra, the Symphony Concerts go on. A thrilled public heard and knew.

The New Orchestra

Four-fold has been the good fortune of the band; first in the tireless pains and the relentless exaction with which Mr. Monteux and Mr. Fradkin, the concert-master, have tested and chosen many of the new recruits; second, in the month, instead of a fortnight, that the postponement of the concerts yielded for daily rehearsals; third, in the diligence, ambition and good will of the men themselves; fourth, above and beyond the rest, in the work of Mr. Monteux in the fusing of the orchestra into a sensitive and responsive body, in the schooling of it to plasticity, euphony and the whole gamut of symphonic eloquence. What Mr. Gericke or Dr. Muck, at his coming to the concerts, spreads over a season, Mr. Monteux, without haste, without waste, has largely accomplished in a month. Few conductors have done the Symphony Orchestra such signal service. Two weeks hence, Mr. Rabaud may well marvel at the instrument that awaits his hand. He has known none such in the Paris that has enclosed, hitherto, his whole working life.

To write so of the orchestra is not to imply that it is beyond betterment. A maturer first flute than Mr. de Mailly would serve it well. The English horn, under the exactions of Dukas and Debussy, left something to be desired; the present tuba-player is by no means the equal of his predecessor; Mr. Schroeder in his sixties hardly replaces Mr. Warnke in his prime. The three horns to be added to the orchestra should be of the finest obtainable quality. On the other hand, there is no doubting that the reorganization of the string choir and its reaction to the abilities of Mr. Fradkin as concert-master have bettered it. In particular, the second violins now escape the dryness, the suggestion of mechanism that were beginning to beset them in Dr. Muck's final year. They and the whole body of strings now play plasticity, losing nothing in essential precision yet sloughing away a tendency to a hard accuracy. Their tone gains in sensuous beauty, delicate euphonies, soft and glamorous shimmer. Yet, as in the climaxes of Franck's symphony, it lacked not a radiant power.

The oboes with Mr. Longy, the clarinets with Mr. Sand, the horns with Mr. Wendler keep familiar quality; while Mr. Monteux has mellowed the brass choir and tempered certain inclinations among the instruments of percussion to an excess of metallic zeal. As of old, the orchestra is master of adroit euphonies, as it proved time and again with Franck's music and the second division of Debussy's "Iberia"; throughout the afternoon, it phrased like such a singing woman as was Mme. Sembrich in her golden prime, while its graduations of long ascents and descents were as flawless. Its rythm in "Iberia" whipped the ear; in "The Peri," it often overlaid the body of Dukas's music with a very jewelry of harmonies and timbres. To listen to it from the first darkling measures of Franck's symphony to the final flash of Debussy's "Image" was to renew old, to discover new delights.

The Conductor

Unless it was in Mr. Monteux's own concerts, a few years ago in Paris, never before has he had so free a hand as at which the undeviating tradition of the Symphony Orchestra gives the conductor. Never before in America, and probably in Europe as well, has he had so responsive and rounded an instrument eager to his interpretative will. In a sense he had attuned and polished that instrument. Though he is to play upon it—the more regret!—through only four concerts in Boston and a bare eight elsewhere, he must have felt that, for the time, it was his very own, since he had made it. No wonder that he excelled the rhythmic fire, the delineative force of his "Pétrouchka" with the Russian Ballet; the lyric and romantic warmth, the adroit modulation, the astute shading and detailing, the abounding fineness of feeling in his "Fa" of last winter at the Metropolitan; the lightness of fancy, the glow of color, the lusciousness of tone that he showed in "The Golden Cockerel" of last spring in both New York and Boston. No doubt the whole occasion of yesterday stimulated him, simple, self-subordinating, all-together modest as he was before the orchestra and audience. He had brought, as is the way of such quiet, generous men, admirably in hand, but the nervous tension of the hour flashed occasionally out of his exact, incisive beat, the soft-pinging fall of his gesture. Hardly before in the United States has he seemed so resourceful, so masterful a conductor, alike in design, progress, achievement.

First of all, Mr. Monteux has the most sensitive ear possessed by any conductor of the Symphony Orchestra since Mr. Gericke. To him, no less than to themselves, the strings owe the soft lustres, the fine shimmer, the unfailing vibrancy of their present tone. Of him, in equal measure, are the new mellowness of the brass, the present clear, characteristic voice of the instruments of percussion, the melting euphonies of flutes, oboes, clarinets. The sheer loveliness of many a period, phrase, transition in Franck's symphony was the play of such an ear; it heard the visioning beauty of the final measures of the overture to "Manfred"; it heightened the sensuous beauty in which Debussy has drenched his pages of the throbbing Spanish night. At the other extreme, Mr. Monteux's ear—and the mind behind—measured as faultlessly the choral-like sonorities of Franck, the climaxes of the theatre in Dukas's "Poème Dansé." So to poise and proportion tonal power is only to be the finer master of it. Again, Mr. Monteux feels rhythm, imposes it upon the orchestra, transmits it penetratingly to his hearers. The rhythmic zest and pliancy that he infused into the first and the third divisions of "Iberia" bettered Debussy himself. Chabrier, hearing from Paradise, surely bounced about with envy. Again, how delicate, how artful was the conductor's hand with the light rhythms of the Allegretto that is Franck's Scherzo.

Not less keen and of Gallic clarity, precison, fineness is Mr. Monteux's sense of musical design and of revelation thereof to his hearers. Every frequenter of serious concerts knows nowadays the long unfolding and upbuilding of Franck's symphony out of abyss of darkness into summit of light. Yet that course is as various of ascent, descent, ascent again, as a long mountain trail. Mr. Monteux perfectly profiled it upon the ears, the imaginations of his hearers. Again in "The Peri" Dukas weaves his music in fine or large strands of polyphony and then jewels them with scintillant modulations; or else he splinters them into gleaming fragments—a star-dust of tones. Mr. Monteux understood, realized, transmitted. If penetrating perception and imparting skill could clarify that muddy, striving overture to "Manfred," he would have illuminated it.

To this insight, Mr. Monteux adds the musical intuition and experience that mould the phrase, shape the period, graduate the climax as with the composer's voice and ear. To all three he lends the imagination that discovers the just accent, that distributes and shades color, that vibrates to the subtle modulations of a Dukas or a Debussy. Best of all, he finds the pace that discloses the inherent voice, the characteristic qualities of the music in hand and, having found it, is sensitively plastic in the revelation. His pace with Franck's symphony—the quickest, the most elastic Bostonian ears have known—gave the music the vivid march, the various beauty, the changeful impulse, the emotional ardor inherent in the music. It captured, as more heavy handed performances do not, the luminosity, the spiritual, at moments the ethereal, quality of Franck inspired. He is so in nearly every measure of this master-symphony. Only here and there does he decline into his equally characteristic homeliness. Again, thanks to Mr. Monteux's choice and elasticity of pace, when has "Iberia" seemed such sensuous imagery in the rhythms, the colors, the whole implication of tones? The divine fire may not have touched the conductor—it touches so few mortals!—but a manifold ability, intelligence, imagination, devotion dwell in him. He possesses the true artist's mind and—what is equally essential—the true artist's conscience.

The Pieces

It was the day of the orchestra and the conductor, the concert of new beginnings; whereas Franck's symphony, Schumann's overture, Debussy's tone-picture are familiar items, in America at least, of the "standard repertory." There is no need now to recur to them; but, for the first time hereabouts was heard "The Peri: Danced Poem: the Legend and the Music by Paul Dukas," originally represented as such on two Parisian stages, since variously heard as a symphonic piece. The origins of the music, its subsequent fate at the hands of Mr. Diaghilev and Miss Trouhanowa have already been set down in this place. Here also the Persian tale has been told: how the Prince went forth to seek the Flower of Immortality; how he found it in the hand of a sleeping Peri; how looking upon her, he desired her beauty: how she danced for him and so won back the flower; how she vanished as in pale flame; how the Prince submitted to his end. A fable of wistful seeking, pensive longing, melancholy resignation, moving against a background of flower and flame, that dissolve into nothingness—legend old, remote, recalled only to be forgotten. Yet a fable to jewel with many lustres—of the beauty of the Peri, the glow of her flower, the flame-tints with which it changes. For, from the days of his music-drama of Ariana, Bluebeard and the cascading treasure of precious stones, Paul Abraham Dukas, with Jewish blood in his veins (as Paris gossips) has loved this process of tonal jewelling.

It is as jeweller and weaver of atmosphere that Dukas best succeeds with "The Peri." Of course, in a "dance-poem" no less than in his symphony, his opera, his miscellaneous pieces, he writes a closely knit, artfully advancing, self-expanding and self-propelled music. For no Parisain composer of our time, except Mr. d'Indy and Saint-Saëns before he fell into dotage, matches Dukas in formal resource, in constructive scholarship. Beyond all question, "The Peri" as symphonic piece is a well-made tone-poem. The music upsprings resourcefully from itself, yet in the grooves of the legend and at pace with them, elastic as they. On the other hand, there is reason to doubt at a single hearing whether the motives giving birth to the music disclose in themselves alert invention and warm imagination. With "The Peri," as with many another contemporary piece, the treatment is everything. Yet within it again Dukas sometimes flags. There are sudden commonplaces in the music; the dance of the Peri is no more than effective work for the choreographic theatre; at least one climax upswells—and is hollow.

Per contra, measure after measure, so fertile, rich and imaginative are the modulations, so poetizing the harmonies, so glamourous the instrumental colors, summons and sustains the very atmosphere of the legend, flashes its progress upon the fancy of the hearer, pierces him for the instant with its emotions. It is so, for example, when the Prince looks upon the beauty of the Peri and covets it; or when she vanishes into pale flame and the darkness of dissolution steals upon him. Rare and fine indeed are these sensations of tones. Again, those same means jewel the music till it is like the changeful glows of the Flower of Immortality or the sprays of light that dazzle Prince Iskender's longing eyes and heavy heart. Then is Dukas alchemist, magician.

H. T. P.

The Peri

The Ends of the Earth
Gold Mountains, Crimson Valleys, Silvery Trees

The Prince

As Dukas's "Dance-Poem" Was Set on the Parisian Stage

(The Sketches by Rene Piot)

HERALD OCTOBER 26,

SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT

Conspicuously Beautiful and Brilliant Under Baton of Monteux

WARM TRIBUTE PAID TO NEW CONDUCTOR

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the 38th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor; Schumann, Overture to "Manfred"; Dukas, "La Peri" (first time in Boston); Debussy, "Iberia."

The answer to the many erroneous, some of them malicious, statements published abroad concerning the present condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the concert of yesterday; a concert that was conspicuously beautiful and brilliant; a concert long to be remembered gratefully, one that aroused the large audience to enthusiastic approval.

While Mr. Monteux had ample time, as it would seem to some, for preparation, his task was not an easy one. He had never conducted the orchestra in former years; he was musically unacquainted with the older members; no matter how skilful the new players may be, the orchestra could not reasonably be expected to be at once a homogeneous, plastic body. The tribute paid Mr. Monteux yesterday by audience and orchestra must have recompensed him [illegible] a c[illegible]ss and poetic in[illegible] as an [illegible] of the modest and ingratiating personality of the man himself.

Mr. Monteux has an exquisite sense of tonal values, of tonal balance and proportion. He is an invoker of euphony. He has the respect for clarity and logical development that characterizes his nation in literature and art. Mr. Gericke had these qualities, the exercise of which gave the Boston Symphony orchestra international reputation; but Mr. Monteux has, in addition, warmth, imagination, emotional expressiveness, qualities that were foreign to Mr. Gericke's nature.

Led by Mr. Monteux and played by the admirable orchestra, Franck's symphony is more than ever music of noble outlines, music rich in beauty, music that beginning in doubt and questioning finds consolation even on earth, and at the end rejoices, as a mighty alleluia of the celestial hosts. The loving attention paid the wealth of detail did not check the continuity of the composer's thought, did not stay the imperious rush in the two allegros. Inner voices were heard, but were not unduly prominent; they were not brought out by the conductor with the exulting air of a discoverer. And in the symphony one noted at once a marked improvement in the strings. They sang melodic passages with musical sensuousness. Pizzicati measures for once had body and significance. So, too, the brass choir had more character than in former years. Its full force was impressive, never blatant. Here, as in the other choirs, there was delightful precision.

Some time ago Mr. Monteux said he saw no reason why the music of German masters, as Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, should not be performed in these troublous times. He chose for his first concert Schumann's overture to Byron's tragedy, an overture that has long been regarded as a classic, like unto a book [illegible] no gentleman's library is complete." The thunderbolts may fall on us for blasphemy, but the overture now seems to us singularly un-Byronic in thought and expression, and, save for the final measures, devoid of true poetic feeling. We find in it neither the gloomy Manfred nor the Witch of the Alps, nor the form and voice of the loved Astarte.

"La Peri" of Dukas was played here for the first time. Composed as a ballet for Miss Trouhanowa, it was reproached by some in Paris for being too "symphonic," fit for the concert hall rather than the stage. However this may be, the music is for the most part engrossing and not only by reason of exciting rhythms and gorgeous instrumentation. There are charming harmonic inventions; haunting modulations; delicate nuances—and Mr. Monteux is a master of nuances—melodic lines that are more noteworthy in measures for "stage business," or descriptive measures, than in those evidently designed for the solo dancer.

A brilliant performance of "Iberia" brought the end of a concert that held the attention of the hearers throughout.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, Friday and Saturday, is as follows: Orchestral pieces, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7; Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson"; Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 1, with chorus (first time here). Mme. Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company will sing "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and Lia's air from Debussy's "Prodigal Son."

POST, OCTOBER 27.

It is a very curious thing. Not only curious, but extraordinary. Not only extraordinary, but incredibly marvellous. It is all of that. Mr. Monteux, when he stepped from the train at the station of Back Bay, did not address the reporters in trumpet tones and proclaim to a waiting universe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was "the greatest orchestra in the world."

Instead of that he went to work, and he greatly astonished a majority of the members of that body by showing them clearly and unmistakably that they had very much to learn, or at least to reform, if they intended to satisfy the musical ideals of a conductor who did not come heralded as a personal associate of a foreign ruler, or an illegitimate son of a great musician (rumor unconfirmed), and did not constitute himself an autocrat of the baton, but merely put his head down and worked with as much energy as he could summon to put into practice the things which, as an exceptionally able French musician, Mr. Monteux knew.

Many of these things were simple, so simple that it seems almost childish that we had to wait to be shown certain elementary betterments of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been for several seasons in need. As a matter of fact, changes which brought to Boston Mr. Monteux were barely in time to prevent the Boston Symphony from becoming a tradition instead of a living, potent fact. We are on the right track again. The orchestra is not going to continue to lose ground, as in the past, but will improve in personnel, efficiency and artistic quality. Nor will either this city or this country ever again follow and accept the precepts of German musicians in the unquestioning manner of former years.

The change will be of enormous benefit to our musical development. Nor will it, by freeing the musical public of German traditions, merely superimpose another tradition of another nation in its place. First of all, that is not the spirit of France or of French art. Secondly, when a people as receptive as the people of America to new ideas once wake to an error of this kind, they do not repeat it, at least, in equal degree tain a music of our own, neither French nor German, nor even chauvinistically American, but a school of music which, gladly acknowledging its indebtedness to composers of all nations, nevertheless succeeds in evolving a new spirit and new idioms, unmistakably and vitally of the people.

But for the present French music will hold sway, particularly in concert halls, where it has not the rivalry of the Italian school which flourishes principally in the opera house. Here in Boston within a month are to be heard three noted French conductors of symphony music. Mr. Monteux will soon give place to his countryman, Henri Rabaud. These men will gradually work their will with an orchestra which has to learn new lessons than those of the past under their guidance, attain new sensibilities and fineness, gain anew the vitality which the spirit of the present and that of the past imparts. But next Wednesday evening in Symphony Hall we shall have the highly anticipated opportunity to hear an orchestra and a conductor, equally distinguished in the history of the musical art of France, performing as one man and one spirit in programme of their making.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Maintained, Refreshed, Rekindled

The Symphony Concerts Begin with a New Orchestra Worthy of the Old, an Engrossing Conductor, a Novel and Notable Piece

SINCE the very first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Oct. 22, 1881, none, probably, has marked so many new beginnings as that of yesterday, Oct. 25, 1918, at the outset of the thirty-eighth season. To the single proprietorship of Mr. Higginson had succeeded the more representative and democratic control of a board of nine trustees. Saved by them from the perils threatening its existence last spring, the Boston Symphony Orchestra Incorporated (as the programme-book labels it) now sat upon the stage, with one-quarter and more of the players new to its ranks. For the first time, since the passing visit of Mr. d' Indy, twelve years ago, a Parisian, Mr. Monteux, led the band, new, likewise, to Bostonian ears as conductor in symphonic music. Even the programme, divided between three French pieces and a single German classic, was conditioned by the obligations and the prejudices of wartime.

Details of the day likewise bore witness to a new and open-minded régime, less self-centred and remote, more responsive to the reasonable wishes of its public. From the ceiling nearly in line with the edge of the platform hung, for example, a large United States flag; on the rear rails of the balconies were a service flag and the pennant of a full subscription to the recent war-loan. For the first time within the memory of the oldest frequenter of the concerts, the lights in the auditorium were lowered during performance, while those above the stage threw orchestra and conductor into high relief—a salutary and grateful change, contributing not a little to the enjoyment of the music. At every turn, some minor departure from old routine caught the eye. The harps, for example, had receded from the front of the stage to the rear of the first violins; familiar faces in the orchestra sat in unfamiliar places; even the plush upon the rails of the balconies, the carpets upon the aisles were new. For the first time, finally, throughout a Symphony Concert, a conductor led without a score before him, Toscanini-wise. Unchanged only were the programme-book, familiar repository of learning made entertainment, and the audience. Doubtless a few chairs were empty, but the listeners at cursory glance seemed to fill the hall. In aspect, they might have been any audience, for ten years past, of a Friday afternoon.

Details of the Day

No incident diversified the preliminaries of the concert until, lingering long after the rest of the orchestra, old Mr. Schroeder, who has been recalled to the violoncellos, come conspicuously to his place, was immediately recognized and received a hearty round of applause. Much less conspicuously and by no means so warmly clapped, followed the conductor himself, Mr. Monteux. Almost before the audience had recognized him, he set to "The Star-Spangled Banner," in a version for full orchestra, prepared by Mr. Converse, here and there retouched by the conductor, and heard for the first time hereabouts. The composer has set down the hymn as played in the Army and the Navy, then harmonized it richly and distributed the instrumental voices sonorously, treating it less as a tune that might be sung by an audience than as an anthem to be eloquently intoned by the orchestra. Even his counterpoint moves in stately progress. The result was a nobler voice than usual for music that as such bears repetition none too well—a dignity and largeness accented by Mr. Monteux's pace, phrasing, emphasis. Somehow, as Mr. Messager will again demonstrate next Wednesday, these French conductors make much more of our national hymn than do most Americans. Perhaps they respect it more.

So far as applause may go, the audience made ample amends to Mr. Monteux at each pause in Franck's symphony, the first item of the programme, and at the end. By that time, it had discovered that the reorganied orchestra was in every respect the peer of the old; that in some particulars it excelled it; that the conductor himself had ear, intelligence, imagination, sensibility and force; that he and his men were perfectly responsive to each other. To them, indeed, Mr. Monteux would transfer the plaudits. He called them to their feet as soon as the clapping began; he turned to them before he turned to the audience. Not until, at the third acknowledgment, when the orchestra, with happy tact, obstinately kept its seat, would he take the applause for himself—a conductor as modest and generous as he is able and eloquent. So onward through the rest of the concert, though it was beyond expectation that so hackneyed a piece as Schumann's overture to "Manfred" would excite the plaudits that answered Franck's luminous symphony; while not all ears hear too gladly such ultra-modern Parisian pieces as Dukas's "danced poem" of "The Peri," or Debussy's more familiar "Iberia." So the end crowned the day. A single concert had dispelled doubts and fears. The new orchestra was no less the Boston Symphony Orchestra of old—unmatched in America, unexcelled in Europe. If no genius led it—such are few and far between—a conductor of signal ability and persuasive personality held it in the hollow of his hand. In programme, performance, personnel not a standard had abated. The Symphony Orchestra, the Symphony Concerts go on. A thrilled public heard and knew.

The Peri

The Ends of the Earth
Gold Mountains, Crimson Valleys, Silvery Trees

The Prince

As Dukas's "Dance-Poem" Was Set on the Parisian Stage

(The Sketches by Rene Piot)

The New Orchestra

Four-fold has been the good fortune of the band; first in the tireless pains and the relentless exaction with which Mr. Monteux and Mr. Fradkin, the concert-master, have tested and chosen many of the new recruits; second, in the month, instead of a fortnight, that the postponement of the concerts yielded for daily rehearsals; third, in the diligence, ambition and good will of the men themselves; fourth, above and beyond the rest, in the work of Mr. Monteux in the fusing of the orchestra into a sensitive and responsive body, in the schooling of it to plasticity, euphony and the whole gamut of symphonic eloquence. What Mr. Gericke or Dr. Muck, at his coming to the concerts, spreads over a season, Mr. Monteux, without haste, without waste, has largely accomplished in a month. Few conductors have done the Symphony Orchestra such signal service. Two weeks hence, Mr. Rabaud may well marvel at the instrument that awaits his hand. He has known none such in the Paris that has enclosed, hitherto, his whole working life.

To write so of the orchestra is not to imply that it is beyond betterment. A new flute player first flute than Mr. de Mailly would serve it well. The English horn, under the exactions of Dukas and Debussy, left something to be desired; the present tuba-player is by no means the equal of his predecessor; Mr. Schroeder in his sixties hardly replaces Mr. Warnke in his prime. The three horns to be added to the orchestra should be of the finest obtainable quality. On the other hand, there is no doubting that the reorganization of the string choir and its reaction to the abilities of Mr. Fradkin as concert-master have bettered it. In particular, the second violins now escape the dryness, the suggestion of mechanism that were beginning to beset them in Dr. Muck's final year. They and the whole body of strings now play with an exceeding sensibility and plasticity, losing nothing in essential precision yet sloughing away a tendency to a hard accuracy. Their tone gains in sensuous beauty, delicate euphonics, soft and glamorous shimmer. Yet, as in the climaxes of Franck's symphony, it lacked not a radiant power.

The oboes with Mr. Longy, the clarinets with Mr. Sand, the horns with Mr. Wendler keep familiar quality; while Mr. Monteux has mellowed the brass choir and tempered certain inclinations among the instruments of percussion to an excess of metallic zeal. As of old, the orchestra is master of adroit euphonics, as it proved time and again with Franck's music and the second division of Debussy's "Iberia"; throughout the afternoon, it phrased like such a singing woman as was Mme. Sembrich in her golden prime, while its graduations of long ascents and descents were as flawless. Its rythm in "Iberia" whipped the ear; in "The Peri," it often overlaid the body of Dukas's music with a very jewelry of harmonies and timbres. To listen to it from the first darkling measures of Franck's symphony to the final flash of Debussy's "Image" was to renew old, to discover new delights.

The Conductor

Unless it was in Mr. Monteux's own concerts, a few years ago in Paris, never before has he had so free a hand as at which the undeviating tradition of the Symphony Orchestra gives the conductor. Never before in America, and probably in Europe as well, has he had so responsive and rounded an instrument eager to do his interpretative will. In a sense he had attuned and polished that instrument. Though he is to play upon it—the more pity he regret!—through only four concerts in Boston and a bare eight elsewhere, he must have felt that, for the time, it was his very own, since he had made it. No wonder that he excelled the rhythmic fire, the delineative force of his "Pétrouchka" with the Russian Ballet; the lyric and romantic warmth, the adroit modulation, the astute shading and detailing, the winding fineness of feeling in his "Fairy" of last winter at the Metropolitan; the richness of fancy, the glow of color, the lusciousness of tone that he showed in "The Golden Cockerel" of last spring in both New York and Boston. No doubt the whole occasion of yesterday stimulated him, simple, self-subordinating altogether modest as he was before the orchestra and audience. He had finished, as is the way of such quiet, gentle men, admirably in hand, but the nervous tension of the hour flashed occasionally out of his exact, incisive beat, the soft-tinging fall of his gesture. Hardly before in the United States has he seemed so resourceful, so masterful a conductor, alike in design, progress, achievement.

First of all, Mr. Monteux has the most sensitive ear possessed by any conductor of the Symphony Orchestra since Mr. Gericke. To him, no less than to themselves, the strings owe the soft lustres, the fine shimmer, the unfailing vibrancy of their present tone. Of him, in equal measure, are the new mellowness of the brass, the present clear, characteristic voice of the instruments of percussion, the meltins euphonies of flutes, oboes, clarinets. The sheer loveliness of many a period, phrase, transition in Franck's symphony was the play of such an ear; it heard the visioning beauty of the final measures of the overture to "Manfred"; it heightened the sensuous beauty in which Debussy has drenched his pages of the throbbing Spanish night. At the other extreme, Mr. Monteux's ear—and the mind behind—measured as faultlessly the choral-like sonorities of Franck, the climaxes of the theatre in Dukas's "Poème Dansé." So to poise and proportion tonal power is only to be the finer master of it. Again, Mr. Monteux feels rhythm, imposes it upon the orchestra, transmits it penetratingly to his hearers. The rhythmic zest and pliancy that he infused into the first and the third divisions of "Iberia" bettered Debussy himself. Chabrier, hearing from Paradise, surely bounced about with envy. Again, how delicate, how artful was the conductor's hand with the light rhythms of the Allegretto that is Franck's Scherzo.

Not less keen and of Gallic clarity, precison, fineness is Mr. Monteux's sense of musical design and of revelation thereof to his hearers. Every frequenter of serious concerts knows nowadays the long unfolding and upbuilding of Franck's symphony out of abyss of darkness into summit of light. Yet that course is as various of ascent, descent, ascent again, as a long mountain trail. Mr. Monteux perfectly profiled it upon the ears, the imaginations of his hearers. Again in "The Peri" Dukas weaves his music in fine or large strands of polyphony and then jewels them with scintillant modulations; or else he splinters them into gleaming fragments—a star-dust of tones. Mr. Monteux understood, realized, transmitted. If penetrating perception and imparting skill could clarify that muddy, striving overture to "Manfred," he would have illuminated it.

To this insight, Mr. Monteux adds the musical intuition and experience that mould the phrase, shape the period, graduate the climax as with the composer's voice and ear. To all three he lends the imagination that discovers the just accent, that distributes and shades color, that vibrates to the subtle modulations of a Dukas or a Debussy. Best of all, he finds the pace that discloses the inherent voice, the characteristic qualities of the music in hand and, having found it, is sensitively plastic in the revelation. His pace with Franck's symphony—the quickest, the most elastic Bostonian ears have known—gave the music the vivid march, the various beauty, the changeful impulse, the emotional ardor inherent in the music. It captured, as more heavy handed performances do not, the luminosity, the spiritual, at moments the ethereal, quality of Franck inspired. He is so in nearly every measure of this master-symphony. Only here and there does he decline into his equally characteristic homeliness. Again, thanks to Mr. Monteux's choice and elasticity of pace, when has "Iberia" seemed such sensuous imagery in the rhythms, the colors, the whole implication of tones? The divine fire may not have touched the conductor—it touches so few mortals!—but a manifold ability, intelligence, imagination, devotion dwell in him. He possesses the true artist's mind and—what is equally essential—the true artist's conscience.

The Pieces

It was the day of the orchestra and the conductor, the concert of new beginnings; whereas Franck's symphony, Schumann's overture, Debussy's tone-picture are familiar items, in America at least, of the "standard repertory." There is no need now to recur to them; but, for the first time hereabouts was heard "The Peri: Danced Poem: the Legend and the Music by Paul Dukas," originally represented as such on two Parisian stages, since variously heard as a symphonic piece. The origins of the music, its subsequent fate at the hands of Mr. Diaghilev and Miss Trouhanowa have already been set down in this place. Here also the Persian tale has been told: how the Prince went forth to seek the Flower of Immortality; how he found it in the hand of a sleeping Peri; how looking upon her, he desired her beauty; how she danced for him and so won back the flower; how she vanished as in pale flame; how the Prince submitted to his end. A fable of wistful seeking, pensive longing, melancholy resignation, moving against a background of flower and flame, that dissolve into nothingness—legend old, remote, recalled only to be forgotten. Yet a fable to jewel with many lustres—of the beauty of the Peri, the glow of her flower, the flame-tints with which it changes. For, from the days of his music-drama of Ariana, Bluebeard and the cascading treasure of precious stones, Paul Abraham Dukas, with Jewish blood in his veins (as Paris gossips) has loved this process of tonal jewelling.

It is as jeweller and weaver of atmosphere that Dukas best succeeds with "The Peri." Of course, in a "dance-poem" no less than in his symphony, his opera, his miscellaneous pieces, he writes a closely knit, artfully advancing, self-expanding and self-propelled music. For no Parisain composer of our time, except Mr. d'Indy and Saint-Saëns before he fell into dotage, matches Dukas in formal resource, in constructive scholarship. Beyond all question, "The Peri" as symphonic piece is a well-made tone-poem. The music upsprings resourcefully from itself, yet in the grooves of the legend and at pace with them, elastic as they. On the other hand, there is reason to doubt at a single hearing whether the motives giving birth to the music disclose in themselves alert invention and warm imagination. With "The Peri," as with many another contemporary piece, the treatment is everything. Yet within it again Dukas sometimes flags. There are sudden commonplaces in the music; the dance of the Peri is no more than effective work for the choreographic theatre; at least one climax upswells—and is hollow.

Per contra, measure after measure, so fertile, rich and imaginative are the modulations, so poetizing the harmonies, so glamourous the instrumental colors, summons and sustains the very atmosphere of the legend, flashes its progress upon the fancy of the hearer, pierces him for the instant with its emotions. It is so, for example, when the Prince looks upon the beauty of the Peri and covets it; or when she vanishes into pale flame and the darkness of dissolution steals upon him. Rare and fine indeed are these sensations of tones. Again, those same means jewel the music till it is like the changeful glows of the Flower of Immortality or the sprays of light that dazzle Prince Iskender's longing eyes and heavy heart. Then is Dukas alchemist, magician.

H. T. P.

HERALD OCTOBER 26,

SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT

Conspicuously Beautiful and Brilliant Under Baton of Monteux

WARM TRIBUTE PAID TO NEW CONDUCTOR

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the 38th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor; Schumann, Overture to "Manfred"; Dukas, "La Peri" (first time in Boston); Debussy, "Iberia."

The answer to the many erroneous, some of them malicious, statements published abroad concerning the present condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the concert of yesterday; a concert that was conspicuously beautiful and brilliant; a concert long to be remembered gratefully, one that aroused the large audience to enthusiastic approval.

While Mr. Monteux had ample time, as it would seem to some, for preparation, his task was not an easy one. He had never conducted the orchestra in former years; he was musically unacquainted with the older members; no matter how skilful the new players may be, the orchestra could not reasonably be expected to be at once a homogeneous plastic body. The tribute paid Mr. Monteux yesterday by audience and orchestra must have recompensed him [illegible] as a c[illegible]ss and poetic in[illegible] as an [illegible] of the modest and ingratiating personality of the man himself.

Mr. Monteux has an exquisite sense of tonal values, of tonal balance and proportion. He is an invoker of euphony. He has the respect for clarity and logical development that characterizes his nation in literature and art. Mr. Gericke had these qualities, the exercise of which gave the Boston Symphony orchestra international reputation; but Mr. Monteux has, in addition, warmth, imagination, emotional expressiveness, qualities that were foreign to Mr. Gericke's nature.

Led by Mr. Monteux and played by the admirable orchestra, Franck's symphony is more than ever music of noble outlines, music rich in beauty, music that beginning in doubt and questioning finds consolation even on earth, and at the end rejoices, as a mighty alleluia of the celestial hosts. The loving attention paid the wealth of detail did not check the continuity of the composer's thought, did not stay the imperious rush in the two allegros. Inner voices were heard, but were not unduly prominent; they were not brought out by the conductor with the exulting air of a discoverer. And in the symphony one noted at once a marked improvement in the strings. They sang melodic passages with musical sensuousness. Pizzicati measures for once had body and significance. So, too, the brass choir had more character than in former years. Its full force was impresssive, never blatant. Here, as in the other choirs, there was delightful precision.

Some time ago Mr. Monteux said he saw no reason why the music of German masters, as Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, should not be performed in these troublous times. He chose for his first concert Schumann's overture to Byron's tragedy, an overture that has long been regarded as a classic, like unto a book [illegible] which no gentleman's library is complete." The thunderbolts may fall on us for blasphemy, but the overture now seems to us singularly un-Byronic in thought and expression, and, save for the final measures, devoid of true poetic feeling. We find in it neither the gloomy Manfred nor the Witch of the Alps, nor the form and voice of the loved Astarte.

"La Peri" of Dukas was played here for the first time. Composed as a ballet for Miss Trouhanowa, it was reproached by some in Paris for being too "symphonic," fit for the concert hall rather than the stage. However this may be, the music is for the most part engrossing and not only by reason of exciting rhythms and gorgeous instrumentation. There are charming harmonic inventions; haunting modulations; delicate nuances—and Mr. Monteux is a master of nuances—melodic lines that are more noteworthy in measures for "stage business," or descriptive measures, than in those evidently designed for the solo dancer.

A brilliant performance of "Iberia" brought the end of a concert that held the attention of the hearers throughout.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, Friday and Saturday, is as follows: Orchestral pieces, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7; Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson"; Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 1, with chorus (first time here). Mme. Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company will sing "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and Lia's air from Debussy's "Prodigal Son."

POST, OCTOBER 27.

It is a very curious thing. Not only curious, but extraordinary. Not only extraordinary, but incredibly marvellous. It is all of that. Mr. Monteux, when he stepped from the train at the station of Back Bay, did not address the reporters in trumpet tones and proclaim to a waiting universe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was "the greatest orchestra in the world."

Instead of that he went to work, and he greatly astonished a majority of the members of that body by showing them clearly and unmistakably that they had very much to learn, or at least to reform, if they intended to satisfy the musical ideals of a conductor who did not come heralded as a personal associate of a foreign ruler, or an illegitimate son of a great musician (rumor unconfirmed), and did not constitute himself an autocrat of the baton, but merely put his head down and worked with as much energy as he could summon to put into practice the things which, as an exceptionally able French musician, Mr. Monteux knew.

Many of these things were simple, so simple that it seems almost childish that we had to wait to be shown certain elementary betterments of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been for several seasons in need. As a matter of fact, changes which brought to Boston Mr. Monteux were barely in time to prevent the Boston Symphony from becoming a tradition instead of a living, potent fact. We are on the right track again. The orchestra is not going to continue to lose ground, as in the past, but will improve in personnel, efficiency and artistic quality. Nor will either this city or this country ever again follow and accept the precepts of German musicians in the unquestioning manner of former years.

The change will be of enormous benefit to our musical development. Nor will it, by freeing the musical public of German traditions, merely superimpose another tradition of another nation in its place. First of all, that is not the spirit of France or of French art. Secondly, when a people as receptive as the people of America to new ideas once wake to an error of this kind, they do not repeat it, at least, in equal degree tain a music of our own, neither French nor German, nor even chauvinistically American, but a school of music which, gladly acknowledging its indebtedness to composers of all nations, nevertheless succeeds in evolving a new spirit and new idioms, unmistakably and vitally of the people.

But for the present French music will hold sway, particularly in concert halls, where it has not the rivalry of the Italian school which flourishes principally in the opera house. Here in Boston within a month are to be heard three noted French conductors of symphony music. Mr. Monteux will soon give place to his countryman, Henri Rabaud. These men will gradually work their will with an orchestra which has to learn new lessons than those of the past under their guidance, attain new sensibilities and fineness, gain anew the vitality which the spirit of the present and that of the past imparts. But next Wednesday evening in Symphony Hall we shall have the highly anticipated opportunity to hear an orchestra and a conductor, equally distinguished in the history of the musical art of France, performing as one man and one spirit in programme of their n[illegible]

yers is ty is so nothing prehend

al success
e player ct that it
rful Vose
ation.

rs of fine
the Vose patented ble piano rovements,
exclusively nts, giving atures not er players.

Co.

rl Evans and ort the bill.

r Old Bill Hart," to odern next week—
ws him as soldier
ing German spies,
plot and incident-
ble telegraph oper-
from Mexican ban-
n. "Battling Jane,"
h "as a sort of Be-ting and winning prejudices of a pet-
Comic reels and
be unrolled.

gh Wednesday the
d Girl," with Mabel
ough it as village
the photo-drama,
Moon," giving Doris of contrasting sis-
through Saturday,
es and war-feeling,
uring Dorothy Dal-
edy, "The Mating," lie.

COOLER

Monday and Thurs-
xt Week

—Forecast for north-
States: Rain Mon-
ursday; cooler Mon-
ture after Wednes-

wn, neither French
n chauvinistically
ol of music which,
its indebtedness to tions, nevertheless
a new spirit and kably and vitally of

French music will
rly in concert halls,
rivalry of the Italourishes principally
. Here in Boston
to be heard three ctors of symphony
ux will soon give man, Henri Rabaud.
radually work their
estra which has to han those of the past
e, attain new sensi-
s, gain anew the vi-
spirit of the present
st imparts. But next g in Symphony Hall highly anticipated op-an orchestra and a distinguished in the
sical art of France,
man and one spirit in
ir making.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN OCTOBER 27 · TRANSCRIPT

Franco-German Program by Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM

D minor, Symphony.....Cesar Franck
Manfred Overture.....Schumann
"The Peri".....Dukas
"Iberia".....Debussy

IT'S an ill wind that blows nobody good. Our east wind may have blown in a little extra influenza, but that caused the postponement of all concerts and gave M. Monteux, the new conductor, a chance to become well acquainted with his orchestra, which in itself was about one-quarter new, and four weeks of steady rehearsals instead of two made the opening concert something really remarkable. We cannot recall a first concert which presented such excellent ensemble, such plasticity, such refinements of shading as the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

And it was well to begin the season with Franck's D minor symphony, which shows that there are great symphonies besides those "made in Germany." Nevertheless, art (and especially the musical art) unites all countries, and the trained auditor can observe that the three-noted figure from which most of the first movement is derived (D, C-sharp and F) was also used by Beethoven, Liszt and most powerfully by Wagner as his "Fate" or "Destiny" motive. We can compliment M. Monteux on the skill with which he displayed the many evolutions of this figure. He did not always thunder it out, but made it clear without exaggeration.

The canonic work, in which Franck excelled, was finely balanced, and the more extended figure (12 notes), which is afterwards interwoven with the shorter one, was finely shaded. There was some excellent work both on the English horn and the French horns in the second movement. This second movement, although labelled as a slow movement, contained a scherzo effect within itself, which gives the symphony the regular four-movement shape, although the careless auditor may perceive but three. This second movement M. Monteux read better than we have yet heard it in Boston.

The finale is a noble climax, reminding of the power of the last movement of Brahms' C-minor symphony, and in fact there is more than a passing resemblance in the style of Franck and Brahms. It is more in major than in minor, and the great chorale theme which forms its climax was gven forth as if Franck pictured triumph after struggle, and as if M. Monteux were portraying our present victories. If Gounod's "Gallia" pictured defeated France (in 1871) surely this work is a French exultation; and it takes on a new meaning in these present times.

The audience was exuberantly applausive. M. Monteux was welcomed with enormous enthusiasm, which repeated itself after the first movement and after the finale of the symphony. He modestly tried to share the honors with the orchestra, but the audience led him planly to understand that the ovation was intended for him personally. Mr. Schroeder also received a personal welcome as he came back to the violoncello desk. It was inspiring to find the audience about as large as usual, in spite of war times and the orchestra still the most prominent one of America.

Schumann ought to have made a good contrast to Franck. The brooding character of Byron's hero appealed deeply to the German composer, yet one may doubt whether he fully comprehended the English tragedy. Had he done so he never would have ended his cantata with a Catholic requiem (a good example of double cannon, which fits to Manfred about as well as it would to Bob Ingersoll.

The overture calls for magnificent contrasts all through. Of all composers Schumann was the most strikingly dual nature. We do not mean a "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" type but he could be powerfully masculine and most tenderly feminine with equal effect. He called these two sides of his nature "Florestan and Eusebius," and they are nobly exhibited in this work in the virile defiance of Manfred and the sweet yearning of Astarte.

Here M. Monteux was not as brilliant as he had been in the symphony. Spasmodic vehemence took the place of loftiness and breadth. The great passages for trumpets were not very impressive and Astarte was not sufficiently in the foreground. It is not given to many Frenchmen to comprehend Schumann. D'Indy belittles him and Debussy spoke slightingly of his compositions. Nevertheless, one should thank M. Monteux for placing Schumann on his first program and Beethoven on his second.

How many French, Russians and Norwegians seek their musical inspiration in Spain (Iberia)! And how few of them catch the true flavor of the garlic. Spite of a liberal garnishing the Spanish dance rhythms, some parts of this "Iberia" might as well be labelled "Siberia" or "Liberia" for all that they represent.

We do not know whether "Three Blind Mice" is Spanish in origin, and we were mystified to hear this old tune made prominent in the work. The final movement became a Spanish Fourth of July and was fully as American as exotic. But M. Monteux read the work excellently and brought out its shifting rhythms and its strong contrasts with excellent power. His beat is decisive, and he evidently knows what he wants and generally succeeds in getting it.

There was also a new work by Dukas upon the program, making this first program preponderantly French in character. Dukas labors under the handicap of having excelled himself once, in "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and all his other works suffer by comparison.

In spite of its very large score, "Le Peri" is but a high order of musical confectionery, highly-flavored tonal candy. It is quite a tinkle-feast, with its tambourine, triangle, xylophone, celesta, etc., and it deals heavily in percussion, as witness its three kettle-drums, bass-drum and snare-drum.

It has some seductive dance rhythms, as for example a swingy waltz, which becomes prominent once or twice. It deals heavily in chromatics, has a good climax and exhibits all the modern skill in orchestration, in which the French are becoming so adept. There was some commendable flute-playing in the work, but it was all excellently executed.

Summing up, one can say that the Franck symphony was the nub of the concert, and the especially excellent readings of the second movement here and of the finale of "Iberia" were points which show M. Monteux to possess poetry and originality; his excellence of routine was evident all through the performance.

GLOBE OCTOBER 26,

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RESUMES IN TRIUMPH

Monteux Gives Brilliant Opening Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon its 38th season and a new epoch in its career. For reasons the war has made clear, nearly a quarter of its personnel had been changed since last May, and before it stood a new conductor.

Pierre Monteux, known here through appearances with the Ballet Russe and the Metropolitan Opera Company, by whose direction he was loaned temporarily to the Boston trustees, conducted in concert for the first time in this city. The audience was much as in other years. It welcomed the new conductor, before and after "The Star Spangled Banner," and gave both Mr Monteux and his players a demonstration after the symphony.

It was expressly fitting that Mr Monteux should have chosen for the first work of the first Symphony concerts in this new epoch of the orchestra, a work of a Belgian by birth and a Frenchman by his later residence, affiliation, artistic style and sympathy. But beyond the point of occasion and timely tribute, the great symphony of Cesar Franck is music gloriously attuned to the hour.

Mr Monteux conducted this music without score—as he did throughout the afternoon—with ardor and sensibility; with the manner of a man who himself loved and revered it. For him, Cesar Franck is more than a mystic; there was the note of flaming rapture, of triumph of sweeping exaltation.

Awakened New Spirit

All reasonably have been solicitous as to what this reorganization of the orchestra would mean. The audience had no need to wait long in doubt yesterday. In the first movement of the symphony, Mr Monteux showed that he [illegible] of plastic unanimity and precision, but he had begun to find the soul of the orchestra.

Where before now some have been conscious of a fire smouldering under a repression which at times had its appropriate place and cast, yesterday more than once the flame of a great mood shot through, enkindling inspiriting, overpowering.

Mr Monteux is not a man of one school or style. He could share Schumann's romantic enthusiasm for the melodramatic pomposity and sentiment of his idol Byron in his more or less autobiographical "Manfred," but it was in Dukas' ballet of the Peri and her flower of immortality, played here for the first time, and in Debussy's "Iberia" that Mr Monteux particularly revealed his own finesse, taste and authority and the new virtuosity and understanding of the orchestra.

New Members Welcomed

The "Danced Poem" of Dukas is a piece of exquisite, often enchanting orchestration, embellishing graceful, yet not profoundly significant, ideas.

Debussy's beautiful series of pictures of Spain found Mr Monteux sympathetic and imaginative, with its rioting rhythms and colors, with the sensuous languor of its music of the night, as with a new and italicized vividity in the calls, songs and pungently awakening life of the festal day, flamingly realistic, filled with character, yet not crossing the bounds of impressionism. These graphic folk measures smelled of the soil, were exultantly garish or, upon occasion, made no pretense to blush for an idealized vulgarity.

Changes in the orchestra itself have been accompanied by those among its caretakers. Mr Ellis will be missed, but Mr Brennan, an executive of judgment, experience, sagacity and unfailing courtesy is his logical successor. Mr Monteux will conduct one more pair of concerts before Mr Rabaud takes his place for the remainder of the season.

GLOBE OCTOBER 29,

OLDER COMPOSERS GERMAN, NOT BOCHES

Symphony's New Leader Makes Distinction

By ARTHUR WILSON

NEW YORK, Oct 29—Henri Rabaud, for seven years at the Opera, Paris, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who after the concerts of this week will succeed Mr Monteux, talked at his hotel this morning with a Globe reporter. This afternoon with Manager Brennan he will leave for Boston.

Denoting by manner and conversation a quiet culture, sensibility, a conservative idealism, modest to the point of evasion about his own achievements, but ardent in his praise of his conferes, Mr Rabaud shows the spirit of the typical French artist.

While another might have hastened to speak with feeling as to those composers of German name to be barred from Symphony programs, Mr Rabaud declined to commit himself prior to conference with the Boston management as to just where the line should be drawn regarding, for example, Wagner, although, of course, assuming that the later Germans are to be discarded.

When asked if he, too, were agreeable to playing Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann—"But," quickly interrupted the conductor, "they are not Boches."

Asked what influence he felt the war would have upon French composition, Mr Rabaud said: "It is too soon yet to tell. We are too close still to the conflict, although I have no doubt it will be the source of inspiration."

The French conductor says there have been comparatively few losses at the front among the French musicians, although there has been much heavier loss among the men of letters, many of them having paid the supreme sacrifice. Albert Magnard, who was shot by Uhlans at his home near Paris early in the war, is to be represented at the Opera this [illegible] "Guercoeur." Florent Schmitt has fought ni the trenches but is now in Paris.

For the last four years Mr Rabaud has been devoting his time much to traveling as guest conductor among the Allied and neutral capitals, conducting concerts in Stockholm, Copenhagen, Berne and opera at the Scala, Milan. His compositions include two symphonies, a symphonic poem, "Nocturne Procession," chamber music and songs. His opera "Marouf," produced two seasons ago here at the Metropolitan Opera House was given in Milan the same Spring.

Speaking of the war's influence upon music in Paris, Mr Rabaud said three principal orchestras had continued their concerts—that of the Conservatoire under M Mesager, which will be heard in Boston for the first time tomorrow evening; that of the Combined Colonne and Lamoureaux Orchestras, of which Pierne and Chevillard are now the associate conductors, and of the Pasdeloup Concerts. A few women have taken the places of men in them as players.

When asked what he thought Debussy's influence would be on future French composition, the distinguished conductor replied: "Very profound and very serious and will continue long. He was ill a long, very long, time before his death, and certain works of which the world had expectation I believe were left unfinished."

MR. HOFMANN RETURNS

A FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE

At Last the Illustrious Pianist Rejoins the Boston Orchestra and Transfigures Chopin's Concerto in E Minor—Mr. Monteux's Beethoven, Excelling That of His Parisian Rivals—A Hall That Pointed the New Virtues of the Band

IT was the turn of Cambridge last evening to listen for the first time to Mr. Monteux and the new Symphony Orchestra; while to them for full measure was added Mr. Hofmann, the pianist, long unheard hereabouts either in recital of his own or in a symphony concert The faithful audience of many seasons filled Sanders Theatre nearly to the last seat, receiving the conductor cordially, but happily eschewing the curious parish custom, that steadily gains ground in Symphony Hall, of rising when this, that or the other celebrity appears first upon the stage. The applause redoubled when Mr. Monteux and the orchestra had finished Beethoven's seventh symphony, since their hearers could then measure with no less pleasure than justice the quality of orchstra and leader. The finer acoustics of the compact, circular, wooden-walled Sanders Theatre disclosed even better than did Symphony Hall, the suave beauty, the flowing progress, the bright sensibility of tone in violins and violas, the richness and smoothness of the horns, the ringing clarity of the trumpets, and the mellow sonorities of the deeper brass. Sanders Theatre was, moreover, ideal place to hear the euphonies, instrument to instrument, choir to choir, with which the adroit ears of Mr. Monteux and the men themselves seldom err. Those flawless acoustics likewise revealed the fineness of detail of which the new orchestra is capable and the subtleties of shading and of varied repetition in which the Parisian conductor has practised it. Often in the progress of Beethoven's symphony the band yielded a glowing mass of tone in rhythmed motion; as often, when the composer feathers his orchestra, as it were, the two or three chosen voices stood forth soft and clear. Mr. Monteux and the newcomers to the band has not only respected its standard that would blend perfection with power, but are also lifting it.

Heard for a second time in German music, the conductor achieved much more with Beethoven's symphony in A major than he had with Schumann's overture to "Manfred"; while if his material was much more fertile, so also was it the more exacting. Good to hear was Mr. Monteux's delicate phrasing of the introduction and the light suspense of his transition into the full and gladsome flow of the first movement. Embarked upon it, not once did he stay its fleet progress, yet for the passing instant the hearer felt each of the momentary holds, the thinning or the thickening of the tonal mass with which Beethoven dissipates monotony; while at once intuitive and expert were the conductor's modulations of a rhythm, in which apt variation is no less to be desired. Phrased like song, modulated like song, clothed steadily in warm richness of velvety tone, the allegretto shone anew, as conductor and orchestra turned facet upon facet to the ear. The alternate spring and suavity of the scherzo were astutely balanced; while the swirling pace, the light sure touch, the sheer tonal gayety of the flying finale were winged with the speed, certainty and shimmer that were accounted feats under the last preceding régime. Others, it now appears, may likewise accomplish them. Throughout, moreover, while Mr. Monteux never "fussed" with minutiæ, while he maintained in bright integrity the whole design and progress of a symphony that is music of dancing light and air, he let hardly a measure become the mere mechanism of getting forward. Now, it is possible, in the vernacular of one of the youth of Cambridge, to make the Beethoven of the Society of the Concerts of the Conservatory "sound like twenty-three cents" and by our own orchestra among our own people.

Absence has altered Mr. Hofmann as man only in the grizzling of his hair and a somewhat less forbidding manner toward his audience. As pianist it has deepened or refined the attributes that distinguish him even among his few peers. His concerto—Chopin's in E minor—is music of which he, like other finely tempered pianists, is continuously fond; but in which hearers have been known to take less pleasure. Years of devotion to the concerto—to discover its very voice, to find the true mould and color for its every phrase, the true pace and contour for its every progression—now make it sound as more than half Mr. Hofmann's own. Under his hand the familiar ennuis of the first movement vanish; Chopin no longer cramps himself through formal processes, seeks to give the music a body and stride alien to him. Instead, the listener hears the composer's manipulation of his melodies through the iridescent mantle of Mr. Hofmann's tone when his touch is sublety and surety themselves, when the half-tints of his palette seem inexhaustible, when each modulation seems as momentary divination. The largeness, the stateliness that Chopin sought in this "majestical" allegro, no pianist may wrap about it, but it is possible to robe it in the grace of line, the loveliness of color that Mr. Hofmann now lays upon it. So again with the instrumental song of the middle movement. Admittedly, it is of Chopin near to sentimentality: but, as Mr. Hofmann plays it, to sweetness the pianist adds light. The music undulates at his studious and intuitive hand as with impulses of musing fancy or shimmers with the color that imagination glimpses and Hofmannesque fingers bring to light, while, as always with the pianist in such music continence guides felicity. In the final rondo, Mr. Hofmann's tone was all lightness and brightness; his pace, his rhythm of air when it plays with fire. He drove the orchestra and the discerning and sympathetic Monteux as in silken reins with silken lash. [illegible] to new euphonies. . . . The public care[illegible] not a whit for the quarrel that long [illegible]ranged Mr. Hofmann and the Symphony [illegible]hestra. It cares much for a pianist [illegible] can so transfigure his music.

Items and Announcements

Mr. Hofmann's concert of piano-pieces, announced for Sunday afternoon, Nov. 24, has been set back a week to Sunday afternoon, Nov. 17, at Symphony Hall. He will play numbers from Händel, Scarlatti, Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt, Rubinstein and minor composers. As the comings and goings of eminent pianists run, it is long since Mr. Hofmann has been heard in Boston in a recital of his own.

MONITOR NOVEMBER 2

MR. RABAUD EAGER FOR NEW TASK

Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern Bureau

NEW YORK, N. Y.—Henri Rabaud, director designate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reached Broadway on Monday and left for Boston on Tuesday. At his hotel he obliged a representative of The Christian Science Monitor with an informal talk.

In appearance, Mr. Rabaud is the antithesis of the conductor who has taken the direction of the concerts of the orchestra pending his arrival, Mr. Monteux. He is tall and thin. His eyes are kindly and his voice is low. His face suggests the scholar more than the martinet. It is bearded, like that of many Frenchmen; and his mouth is overhung by a moustache which, like the beard, is iron gray. He reminds one in a mild and gentle way of that once popular monarch, Henri of Navarre, whom Dumas glorified.

If first impressions can be trusted, he will rather guide and inspire his orchestra than dictate to it. He has taken up his task in a spirit of unbounded modesty. But those who have known him by his work in Paris, vouch for both his ability and authority.

"I have been much honored," he explained, "by my appointment as director of a great orchestra in one of the greatest cities of a most friendly nation. It is my duty and desire to show my gratitude. I am looking forward with delight to seeing Boston. For, as I know, it is a seat of learning, and above all a home of art.

"I have had no time as yet to map out plans; and my friend, Monteux, has doubtless paved the way for me. Before shaping things and making concert programs, I must get in touch not only with the directors and musicians of the orchestra, but also with my future public. As a stranger and a guest, I shall endeavor to conform my course to the customs and traditions of Bostonians. And before I venture very far, I must know my environment—or, as we say in France, I must pendre l'air de la cour."

As far as could be gathered, the new conductor is very eclectic in his tastes. He would not admit that he had special tendencies or preferences in music. In his own words, "There is good music everywhere." It will plainly be his wish and aim to avoid stirring up artistic quarrels.

For seven years, Mr. Rabaud has been chef d'orchestre of the Paris Opera House. Now and then, he has directed performances of his own works at the Opéra Comique.

"But much of my time," said he, "has been devoted to directing concerts. I have conducted at the Salle Gavéau, at the Châtelet and other places. And as you know, I have composed two symphonies, besides tone poems. I have also written a lyric tragedy, 'La Folle de Roland,' which is a setting of the patriotic play of Henri de Bornier, and 'Marouf,' which was performed here at the Metropolitan. Much of my concert work has been Wagnerian."

Mr. Rabaud took a glance out of his window.

"It is all very strange and wonderful," said he, as he saw the Broadway towers and roofs. "I was impressed today by the huge buildings in the Wall Street district. Your architecture is of course inspired by the great need of saving ground space. But I was vastly more impressed by the immensity and beauty of the bay, of which I got a glimpse when the sun was pouring down on the statue of Liberty.

"I have not yet seen your New York concert halls. I am sorry that I have as yet had only infrequent opportunities of making acquaintance with American music. That omission I shall hope to correct, though, when I reach Boston."

Upon being asked about conditions in Paris, he replied: "Paris is still Paris, not greatly changed or damaged by the war. Her art activities have been checked and hampered, but not destroyed. Artists are still busy. Musicians are still composing. I am myself at work on—"

He pulled up short and would say no more as to the nature of his new effort. He thought it better not to talk about himself. He was more interested in Dukas and Claude Debussy, "that great light of musical France," and in his own successor at the Paris Opera House, Mr. Chevillard.

"Yes," he remarked, "my responsibilities have fallen largely on the shoulders of Mr. Chevillard. But he can still find time to direct his ad[illegible] concerts. And he has the assistance of Mr. Ruhlman. During my stay at the Paris Opera House I have conducted nearly everything in the repertory. I had charge of the first performance of 'Bacchus,' which was Massenet's final work. But I have always been more particularly interested in concert work than in opera."

BOSTON MUSIC

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

Boston Symphony Orchestra, second concert of thirty-eighth season, Boston, Mass., afternoon of Nov. 1, 1918, Pierre Monteux conducting, Mme. Florence Easton, soloist. The program: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92; Mozart, Recitative, "E Susanna non vien'" ("How Susanna Delays!"), and Aria, "Dove Sono" ("Flown Forever"), from "Le Nozze di Figaro" (act III, scene 8); Loeffler, Poem: "La Bonne Chanson"; Debussy, Recitative, "L'année en vain" ("The Years Roll By"), and Aria of Lia, "Azaël! Azaël!" from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Franck, Symphonic poem: "Les Eolides" ("The Æolidæ"); Ravel, "Daphnis et Chloé"—ballet in one act—orchestral fragments, first series: "Nocturne," "Interlude," "Danse Guerrière" (first time in Boston).

BOSTON, Mass.—The second concert of the Boston Symphony season was notable for three chief reasons: the remarkable conducting of Mr. Monteux, the no less remarkable playing of the orchestra, and the program presented. Mr. Monteux led with far more spontaneity and authority than at his first appearance, and these qualities were reflected in the playing of the men under him and in the singing of the soloist. He also established for himself among Boston hearers a high position as a conductor of Beethoven by his reading of the Seventh Symphony, in particular the fourth movement, which, with its breathless pace and the conductor's abandon to the rhythm, roused the audience to vigorous applause. It was perhaps unfortunate that Mr. Loeffler's composition should be on the same program with a so similar piece by César Franck, for, being so, it was somewhat overshadowed. Appreciation of the spirit of Verlaine's poem, a measure of clever invention, and the pleasantly but not aggressively modern orchestration made Mr. Loeffler's work an agreeable tone poem to hear. Whether continued hearings would make as agreeable an impression it is hard to say. The high point in the afternoon was indisputably the Ravel ballet and a large part of the success of this piece was due to the effective singing of the off-stage chorus directed by Stephen Townsend. The authority of Mr. Monteux was especially in evidence in this number, and by reason of this the sheer beauty of the music, that fleeting beauty of musical expression which is characteristic of Ravel, struck many of the audience for the first time.

GLOBE NOVEMBER 2,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Monteux' Last Matinee—Mme Easton Soloist

Mr Monteux yesterday took leave of the Friday afternoon Symphony audience, which in the fortnight of his sojourn here has brought him into high favor for his modest, gentlemanly bearing as for his musicianship. Yesterday it received him warmly throughout the concert and called him out again at its close.

Mme Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, appeared as soloist for the first time at these concerts. The program was as follows:

Beethoven, 7th symphony; Mozart, Recit and Aria "Dove Sono," from "Marriage of Figaro," Mme Easton; Loeffler, poem "La Bonne Chanson," Debussy, Recit and Aria of Lia from "The Prodigal Son"; Franck, "Les Eolides"; Ravel, orchestral fragments, first series, "Nocturne," "Interlude," "Danse Guerriere," from ballet in one act, "Daphnis and Chloe," first performance in Boston.

A long program, ordinarily too long, but holding so much of beauty that one might well pause before making an elimination—even of Cesar Franck's poem, with its curious foreshadowing of thoughts in his symphony.

Mr Monteux' Beethoven had clearness and spirit. He finds here a ruddy, folk joyousness; makes the allegretto much less weighty than it has been, the fugue crisp and lucid, and the finale music for a chorus of dervishes in the whirlwind of the dance. No wonder the pictorial character of these pages has invited the visions of analysts. Whatever Mr Monteux' tendency to drive the orchestra in passages where an accelerando hardly is intended, he saves from the ponderous or tragic music which is more often naive.

Mr Loeffler's revised poem to Verlaine's imaginative verse has lain in seclusion too long. Composer and poet are well matched in their instinctive sense of color, line, rare and significant expression. The music appropriately touches the note of the idyl upon the one side and of impassioned rhapsody inspired by love within consonant nature upon the other. Both overtake beauty, the harmonically enriched morning song of the strings over their insistent pedal point, no less than the sonorous tribute to the sun and the poet's beloved. The composer twice bowed his acknowledgments to the applauding audience.

Mme Easton gave pleasure by her pure, expressive voice, finding herself and her audience more particularly in Debussy's aria of his Massenet period. Although hurried by Mr Monteux a trifle in the climax, she made her points, and that in music which asks preferably a deeper timbred voice.

Ravel's suite, more recondite and challenging in its impressionism than its fellow, pleasurably remembered from last year, is probably the more dependent upon stage pantomime, lights and pictures. But the daring in harmony, color and instrumentation is not that of the mere fantasist. There is suggestion of Daphnis in supplication and the pirates are fine fellows. Mr Townsend's chorus, singing well the difficult music, defined their two moods. Had the voices sounded from a greater distance they might have been [illegible]

yers is ty is so nothing prehend

al success se player ct that it
rful Vose
ation.

rs of fine
the Vose patented able piano rovements,
exclusively ents, giving eatures not er players.

Co.

rl Evans and ort the bill.

r Old Bill Hart," to odern next week—
ws him as soldier
ring German spies,
plot and incident-
able telegraph oper-
from Mexican ban-
m. "Battling Jane,"
h "as a sort of Be-ting and winning
prejudices of a pet-
Comic reels and
be unrolled.

gh Wednesday the
d Girl," with Mabel
ough it as village
the photo-drama,
Moon," giving Doris
t of contrasting sis-
through Saturday,
es and war-feeling,
uring Dorothy Dal-
edy, "The Mating," lie.

COOLER

Monday and Thurs-
xt Week

—Forecast for north-
c States: Rain Mon-
ursday; cooler Mon-ature after Wednes-

wn, neither French
n chauvinistically
ol of music which,
its indebtedness to tions, nevertheless
a new spirit and kably and vitally of

French music will
rly in concert halls,
rivalry of the Italourishes principally
. Here in Boston
to be heard three ctors of symphony
ux will soon give man, Henri Rabaud.
radually work their
estra which has to han those of the past
e, attain new sensi-
s, gain anew the vi-
spirit of the present
t imparts. But next in Symphony Hall
ighly anticipated op-
an orchestra and a distinguished in the
sical art of France,
man and one spirit in
ir making.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN OCTOBER 27

Franco-German Program by Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM

D minor, Symphony.....Cesar Franck
Manfred Overture.....Schumann
"The Peri".....Dukas
"Iberia" .....Debussy

IT'S an ill wind that blows nobody good. Our east wind may have blown in a little extra influenza, but that caused the postponement of all concerts and gave M. Monteux, the new conductor, a chance to become well acquainted with his orchestra, which in itself was about one-quarter new, and four weeks of steady rehearsals instead of two made the opening concert something really remarkable. We cannot recall a first concert which presented such excellent ensemble, such plasticity, such refinements of shading as the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

And it was well to begin the season with Franck's D minor symphony, which shows that there are great symphonies besides those "made in Germany." Nevertheless, art (and especially the musical art) unites all countries, and the trained auditor can observe that the three-noted figure from which most of the first movement is derived (D, C-sharp and F) was also used by Beethoven, Liszt and most powerfully by Wagner as his "Fate" or "Destiny" motive. We can compliment M. Monteux on the skill with which he displayed the many evolutions of this figure. He did not always thunder it out, but made it clear without exaggeration.

The canonic work, in which Franck excelled, was finely balanced, and the more extended figure (12 notes), which is afterwards interwoven with the shorter one, was finely shaded. There was some excellent work both on the English horn and the French horns in the second movement. This second movement, although labelled as a slow movement, contained a scherzo effect within itself, which gives the symphony the regular four-movement shape, although the careless auditor may perceive but three. This second movement M. Monteux read better than we have yet heard it in Boston.

The finale is a noble climax, reminding of the power of the last movement of Brahms' C-minor symphony, and in fact there is more than a passing resemblance in the style of Franck and Brahms. It is more in major than in minor, and the great chorale theme which forms its climax was gven forth as if Franck pictured triumph after struggle, and as if M. Monteux were portraying our present victories. If Gounod's "Gallia" pictured defeated France (in 1871) surely this work is a French exultation; and it takes on a new meaning in these present times.

The audience was exuberantly applausive. M. Monteux was welcomed with enormous enthusiasm, which repeated itself after the first movement and after the finale of the symphony. He modestly tried to share the honors with the orchestra, but the audience led him planly to understand that the ovation was intended for him personally. Mr. Schroeder also received a personal welcome as he came back to the violoncello desk. It was inspiring to find the audience about as large as usual, in spite of war times and the orchestra still the most prominent one of America.

Schumann ought to have made a good contrast to Franck. The brooding character of Byron's hero appealed deeply to the German composer, yet one may doubt whether he fully comprehended the English tragedy. Had he done so he never would have ended his cantata with a Catholic requiem (a good example of double cannon, which fits to Manfred about as well as it would to Bob Ingersoll.

The overture calls for magnificent contrasts all through. Of all composers Schumann was the most strikingly dual nature. We do not mean a "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" type but he could be powerfully masculine and most tenderly feminine with equal effect. He called these two sides of his nature "Florestan and Eusebius," and they are nobly exhibited in this work in the virile defiance of Manfred and the sweet yearning of Astarte.

Here M. Monteux was not as brilliant as he had been in the symphony. Spasmodic vehemence took the place of loftiness and breadth. The great passages for trumpets were not very impressive and Astarte was not sufficiently in the foreground. It is no given to many Frenchmen to comprehend Schumann. D'Indy belittled him and Debussy spoke slightingly of his compositions. Nevertheless, one should thank M. Monteux for placing Schumann on his first program and Beethoven on his second.

How many French, Russians and Norwegians seek their musical inspiration in Spain (Iberia)! And how few of them catch the true flavor of the garlic. Spite of a liberal garnishing of the Spanish dance rhythms, some parts of this "Iberia" might as well be labelled "Siberia" or "Liberia" for all that they represent.

We do not know whether "Three Blind Mice" is Spanish in origin, and we were mystified to hear this old tune made prominent in the work. The final movement became a Spanish Fourth of July and was fully as American as exotic. But M. Monteux read the work excellently and brought out its shifting rhythms and its strong contrasts with excellent power. His beat is decisive, and he evidently knows what he wants and generally succeeds in getting it.

There was also a new work by Dukas upon the program, making this first program preponderantly French in character. Dukas labors under the handicap of having excelled himself once, in "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and all his other works suffer by comparison.

In spite of its very large score, "Le Peri" is but a high order of musical confectionery, highly-flavored tonal candy. It is quite a tinkle-feast, with its tambourine, triangle, xylophone, celesta, etc., and it deals heavily in percussion, as witness its three kettle-drums, bass-drum and snare-drum.

It has some seductive dance rhythms, as for example a swingy waltz, which becomes prominent once or twice. It deals heavily in chromatics, has a good climax and exhibits all the modern skill in orchestration, in which the French are becoming so adept. There was some commendable flute-playing in the work, but it was all excellently executed.

Summing up, one can say that the Franck symphony was the nub of the concert, and the especially excellent readings of the second movement here and of the finale of "Iberia" were points which show M. Monteux to possess poetry and originality; his excellence of routine was evident all through the performance.

GLOBE OCTOBER 26.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RESUMES IN TRIUMPH

Monteux Gives Brilliant Opening Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon its 38th season and a new epoch in its career. For reasons the war has made clear, nearly a quarter of its personnel had been changed since last May, and before it stood a new conductor.

Pierre Monteux, known here through appearances with the Ballet Russe and the Metropolitan Opera Company, by whose direction he was loaned temporarily to the Boston trustees, conducted in concert for the first time in this city. The audience was much as in other years. It welcomed the new conductor, before and after "The Star Spangled Banner," and gave both Mr Monteux and his players a demonstration after the symphony.

It was expressly fitting that Mr Monteux should have chosen for the first work of the first Symphony concerts in this new epoch of the orchestra, a work of a Belgian by birth and a Frenchman by his later residence, affiliation, artistic style and sympathy. But beyond the point of occasion and timely tribute, the great symphony of Cesar Franck is music gloriously attuned to the hour.

Mr Monteux conducted this music without score—as he did throughout the afternoon—with ardor and sensibility; with the manner of a man who himself loved and revered it. For him, Cesar Franck is more than a mystic; there was the note of flaming rapture, of triumph of sweeping exaltation.

Awakened New Spirit

All reasonably have been solicitous as to what this reorganization of the orchestra would mean. The audience had no need to wait long in doubt yesterday. In the first movement of the symphony, Mr Monteux showed that he [illegible] of plastic unanimity and precision, but he had begun to find the soul of the orchestra.

Where before now some have been conscious of a fire smouldering under a repression which at times had its appropriate place and cast, yesterday more than once the flame of a great mood shot through, enkindling inspiriting, overpowering.

Mr Monteux is not a man of one school or style. He could share Schumann's romantic enthusiasm for the melodramatic pomposity and sentiment of his idol Byron in his more or less autobiographical "Manfred," but it was in Dukas' ballet of the Peri and her flower of immortality, played here for the first time, and in Debussy's "Iberia" that Mr Monteux particularly revealed his own finesse, taste and authority and the new virtuosity and understanding of the orchestra.

New Members Welcomed

The "Danced Poem" of Dukas is a piece of exquisite, often enchanting orchestration, embellishing graceful, yet not profoundly significant, ideas.

Debussy's beautiful series of pictures of Spain found Mr Monteux sympathetic and imaginative, with its rioting rhythms and colors, with the sensuous languor of its music of the night, as with a new and italicized vividity in the calls, songs and pungently awakening life of the festal day, flamingly realistic, filled with character, yet not crossing the bounds of impressionism. These graphic folk measures smelled of the soil, were exultantly garish or, upon occasion, made no pretense to polish for an idealized vulgarity.

Changes in the orchestra itself have been accompanied by those among its caretakers. Mr Ellis will be missed, but Mr Brennan, an executive of judgment, experience, sagacity and unfailing courtesy is his logical successor. Mr Monteux will conduct one more pair of concerts before Mr Rabaud takes his place for the remainder of the season.

GLOBE OCTOBER 29.

OLDER COMPOSERS GERMAN, NOT BOCHES

Symphony's New Leader Makes Distinction

By ARTHUR WILSON

NEW YORK, Oct 29—Henri Rabaud, for seven years at the Opera, Paris, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who after the concerts of this week will succeed Mr Monteux, talked at his hotel this morning with a Globe reporter. This afternoon with Manager Brennan he will leave for Boston.

Denoting by manner and conversation a quiet culture, sensibility, a conservative idealism, modest to the point of evasion about his own achievements, but ardent in his praise of his conferes, Mr Rabaud shows the spirit of the typical French artist.

While another might have hastened to speak with feeling as to those composers of German name to be barred from Symphony programs, Mr Rabaud declined to commit himself prior to conference with the Boston management as to just where the line should be drawn regarding, for example, Wagner, although, of course, assuming that the later Germans are to be discarded.

When asked if he, too, were agreeable to playing Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann—"But," quickly interrupted the conductor, "they are not Boches."

Asked what influence he felt the war would have upon French composition, Mr Rabaud said: "It is too soon yet to tell. We are too close still to the conflict, although I have no doubt it will be the source of inspiration."

The French conductor says there have been comparatively few losses at the front among the French musicians, although there has been much heavier loss among the men of letters, many of them having paid the supreme sacrifice. Albert Magnard, who was shot by Uhlans at his home near Paris early in the war, is to be represented at the Opera this year by his new [illegible] "Guercoeur." Florent Schmitt has fought ni the trenches but is now in Paris.

For the last four years Mr Rabaud has been devoting his time much to traveling as guest conductor among the Allied and neutral capitals, conducting concerts in Stockholm, Copenhagen, Berne and opera at the Scala, Milan. His compositions include two symphonies, a symphonic poem, "Nocturne Procession," chamber music and songs. His opera "Marouf," produced two seasons ago here at the Metropolitan Opera House was given in Milan the same Spring.

Speaking of the war's influence upon music in Paris, Mr Rabaud said three principal orchestras had continued their concerts—that of the Conservatoire under M Mesager, which will be heard in Boston for the first time tomorrow evening; that of the Combined Colonne and Lamoureaux Orchestras, of which Pierne and Chevillard are now the associate conductors, and of the Pasdeloup Concerts. A few women have taken the places of men in them as players.

When asked what he thought Debussy's influence would be on future French composition, the distinguished conductor replied: "Very profound and very serious and will continue long. He was ill a long, very long, time before his death, and certain works of which the world had expectation I believe were left unfinished."

MR. HOFMANN RETURNS

A FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE

At Last the Illustrious Pianist Rejoins the Boston Orchestra and Transfigures Chopin's Concerto in E Minor—Mr. Monteux's Beethoven, Excelling That of His Parisian Rivals—A Hall That Pointed the New Virtues of the Band

IT was the turn of Cambridge last evening to listen for the first time to Mr. Monteux and the new Symphony Orchestra; while to them for full measure was added Mr. Hofmann, the pianist, long unheard hereabouts either in recital of his own or in a symphony concert. The faithful audience of many seasons filled Sanders Theatre nearly to the last seat, receiving the conductor cordially, but happily eschewing the curious parish custom, that steadily gains ground in Symphony Hall, of rising when this, that or the other celebrity appears first upon the stage. The applause redoubled when Mr. Monteux and the orchestra had finished Beethoven's seventh symphony, since their hearers could then measure with no less pleasure than justice the quality of orchstra and leader. The finer acoustics of the compact, circular, wooden-walled Sanders Theatre disclosed even better than did Symphony Hall, the suave beauty, the flowing progress, the bright sensibility of tone in violins and violas, the richness and smoothness of the horns, the ringing clarity of the trumpets, and the mellow sonorities of the deeper brass. Sanders Theatre was, moreover, ideal place to hear the euphonics, instrument to instrument, choir to choir, with which the adroit ears of Mr. Monteux and the men themselves seldom err. Those flawless acoustics likewise revealed the fineness of detail of which the new orchestra is capable and the subtleties of shading and of varied repetition in which the Parisian conductor has practised it. Often in the progress of Beethoven's symphony the band yielded a glowing mass of tone in rhythmed motion; as often, when the composer feathers his orchestra, as it were, the two or three chosen voices stood forth soft and clear. Mr. Monteux and the newcomers to the band has not only respected its standard that would blend perfection with power, but are also lifting it.

Heard for a second time in German music, the conductor achieved much more with Beethoven's symphony in A major than he had with Schumann's overture to "Manfred"; while if his material was much more fertile, so also was it the more exacting. Good to hear was Mr. Monteux's delicate phrasing of the introduction and the light suspense of his transition into the full and gladsome flow of the first movement. Embarked upon it, not once did he stay its fleet progress, yet for the passing instant the hearer felt each of the momentary holds, the thinning or the thickening of the tonal mass with which Beethoven dissipates monotony; while at once intuitive and expert were the conductor's modulations of a rhythm, in which apt variation is no less to be desired. Phrased like song, modulated like song, clothed steadily in warm richness of velvety tone, the allegretto shone anew, as conductor and orchestra turned facet upon facet to the ear. The alternate spring and suavity of the scherzo were astutely balanced; while the swirling pace, the light sure touch, the sheer tonal gayety of the flying finale were winged with the speed, certainty and shimmer that were accounted feats under the last preceding régime. Others, it now appears, may likewise accomplish them. Throughout, moreover, while Mr. Monteux never "fussed" with minutiæ, while he maintained in bright integrity the whole design and progress of a symphony that is music of dancing light and air, he let hardly a measure become the mere mechanism of getting forward. Now, it is possible, in the vernacular of one of the youth of Cambridge, to make the Beethoven of the Society of the Concerts of the Conservatory "sound like twenty-three cents" and by our own orchestra among our own people.

Absence has altered Mr. Hofmann as man only in the grizzling of his hair and a somewhat less forbidding manner toward his audience. As pianist it has deepened or refined the attributes that distinguish him even among his few peers. His concerto—Chopin's in E minor—is music of which he, like other finely tempered pianists, is continuously fond; but in which hearers have been known to take less pleasure. Years of devotion to the concerto—to discover its very voice, to find the true mould and color for its every phrase, the true pace and contour for its every progression—now make it sound as more than half Mr. Hofmann's own. Under his hand the familiar ennuis of the first movement vanish; Chopin no longer cramps himself through formal processes, seeks to give the music a body and stride alien to him. Instead, the listener hears the composer's manipulation of his melodies through the iridescent mantle of Mr. Hofmann's tone when his touch is sublety and surety themselves, when the half-tints of his palette seem inexhaustible, when each modulation seems as momentary divination. The largeness, the stateliness that Chopin sought in this "majestical" allegro, no pianist may wrap about it, but it is possible to robe it in the grace of line, the loveliness of color that Mr. Hofmann now lays upon it. So again with the instrumental song of the middle movement. Admittedly, it is of Chopin near to sentimentality; but, as Mr. Hofmann plays it, to sweetness the pianist adds light. The music undulates at his studious and intuitive hand as with impulses of musing fancy or shimmers with the color that imagination glimpses and Hofmannesque fingers bring to light, while, as always with the pianist in such music continence guides felicity. In the final rondo, Mr. Hofmann's tone was all lightness and brightness; his pace, his rhythm of air when it plays with fire. He drove the orchestra and the discerning and sympathetic Monteux as in silken reins with silken lash. Their twin [illegible] to melt the music into new euphonies. . . . The public care not a whit for the quarrel that long [illegible] ranged Mr. Hofmann and the Symphony [illegible] chestra. It cares much for a pianist [illegible] can so transfigure his music.

Items and Announcements

Mr. Hofmann's concert of piano-pieces, announced for Sunday afternoon, Nov. 24, has been set back a week to Sunday afternoon, Nov. 17, at Symphony Hall. He will play numbers from Händel, Scarlatti, Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt, Rubinstein and minor composers. As the comings and goings of eminent pianists run, it is long since Mr. Hofmann has been heard in Boston in a recital of his own.

MONITOR NOVEMBER 2

MR. RABAUD EAGER FOR NEW TASK

Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern Bureau

NEW YORK, N. Y.—Henri Rabaud, director designate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reached Broadway on Monday and left for Boston on Tuesday. At his hotel he obliged a representative of The Christian Science Monitor with an informal talk.

In appearance, Mr. Rabaud is the antithesis of the conductor who has taken the direction of the concerts of the orchestra pending his arrival, Mr. Monteux. He is tall and thin. His eyes are kindly and his voice is low. His face suggests the scholar more than the martinet. It is bearded, like that of many Frenchmen; and his mouth is overhung by a moustache which, like the beard, is iron gray. He reminds one in a mild and gentle way of that once popular monarch, Henri of Navarre, whom Dumas glorified.

If first impressions can be trusted, he will rather guide and inspire his orchestra than dictate to it. He has taken up his task in a spirit of unbounded modesty. But those who have known him by his work in Paris, vouch for both his ability and authority.

"I have been much honored," he explained, "by my appointment as director of a great orchestra in one of the greatest cities of a most friendly nation. It is my duty and desire to show my gratitude. I am looking forward with delight to seeing Boston. For, as I know, it is a seat of learning, and above all a home of art.

"I have had no time as yet to map out plans; and my friend, Monteux, has doubtless paved the way for me. Before shaping things and making concert programs, I must get in touch not only with the directors and musicians of the orchestra, but also with my future public. As a stranger and a guest, I shall endeavor to conform my course to the customs and traditions of Bostonians. And before I venture very far, I must know my environment—or, as we say in France, I must pendre l'air de la cour."

As far as could be gathered, the new conductor is very eclectic in his tastes. He would not admit that he had special tendencies or preferences in music. In his own words, "There is good music everywhere." It will plainly be his wish and aim to avoid stirring up artistic quarrels.

For seven years, Mr. Rabaud has been chef d'orchestre of the Paris Opera House. Now and then, he has directed performances of his own works at the Opéra Comique.

"But much of my time," said he, "has been devoted to directing concerts. I have conducted at the Salle Gaveau, at the Châtelet and other places. And as you know, I have composed two symphonies, besides tone poems. I have also written a lyric tragedy, 'La Folle de Roland,' which is a setting of the patriotic play of Henri de Bornier, and 'Marouf,' which was performed here at the Metropolitan. Much of my concert work has been Wagnerian."

Mr. Rabaud took a glance out of his window.

"It is all very strange and wonderful," said he, as he saw the Broadway towers and roofs. "I was impressed today by the huge buildings in the Wall Street district. Your architecture is of course inspired by the great need of saving ground space. But I was vastly more impressed by the immensity and beauty of the bay, of which I got a glimpse when the sun was pouring down on the statue of Liberty.

"I have not yet seen your New York concert halls. I am sorry that I have as yet had only infrequent opportunities of making acquaintance with American music. That omission I shall hope to correct, though, when I reach Boston."

Upon being asked about conditions in Paris, he replied: "Paris is still Paris, not greatly changed or damaged by the war. Her art activities have been checked and hampered, but not destroyed. Artists are still busy. Musicians are still composing. I am myself at work on—"

He pulled up short and would say no more as to the nature of his new effort. He thought it better not to talk about himself. He was more interested in Dukas and Claude Debussy, "that great light of musical France," and in his own successor at the Paris Opera House, Mr. Chevillard.

"Yes," he remarked, "my responsibilities have fallen largely on the shoulders of Mr. Chevillard. But he can still find time to direct his ad- [illegible] concerts. And he has the assistance of Mr. Ruhlman. During my stay at the Paris Opera House I have conducted nearly everything in the repertory. I had charge of the first performance of 'Bacchus,' which was Massenet's final work. But I have always been more particularly interested in concert work than in opera."

BOSTON MUSIC

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

Boston Symphony Orchestra, second concert of thirty-eighth season, Boston, Mass., afternoon of Nov. 1, 1918, Pierre Monteux conducting, Mme. Florence Easton, soloist. The program: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92; Mozart, Recitative, "E Susanna non vien'" ("How Susanna Delays!"), and Aria, "Dove Sono" ("Flown Forever"), from "Le Nozze di Figaro" (act III, scene 8); Loeffler, Poem: "La Bonne Chanson"; Debussy, Recitative, "L'année en vain" ("The Years Roll By"), and Aria of Lia, "Azaël! Azaël!" from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Franck, Symphonic poem: "Les Eolides" ("The Æolidæ"); Ravel, "Daphnis et Chloé"—ballet in one act—orchestral fragments, first series: "Nocturne," "Interlude," "Danse Guerrière" (first time in Boston).

BOSTON, Mass.—The second concert of the Boston Symphony season was notable for three chief reasons: the remarkable conducting of Mr. Monteux, the no less remarkable playing of the orchestra, and the program presented. Mr. Monteux led with far more spontaneity and authority than at his first appearance, and these qualities were reflected in the playing of the men under him and in the singing of the soloist. He also established for himself among Boston hearers a high position as a conductor of Beethoven by his reading of the Seventh Symphony, in particular the fourth movement, which, with its breathless pace and the conductor's abandon to the rhythm, roused the audience to vigorous applause. It was perhaps unfortunate that Mr. Loeffler's composition should be on the same program with a so similar piece by César Franck, for, being so, it was somewhat overshadowed. Appreciation of the spirit of Verlaine's poem, a measure of clever invention, and the pleasantly but not aggressively modern orchestration made Mr. Loeffler's work an agreeable tone poem to hear. Whether continued hearings would make as agreeable an impression it is hard to say. The high point in the afternoon was indisputably the Ravel ballet and a large part of the success of this piece was due to the effective singing of the off-stage chorus directed by Stephen Townsend. The authority of Mr. Monteux was especially in evidence in this number, and by reason of this the sheer beauty of the music, that fleeting beauty of musical expression which is characteristic of Ravel, struck many of the audience for the first time.

LOBE NOVEMBER 2.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Monteux' Last Matinee—Mme Easton Soloist

Mr Monteux yesterday took leave of the Friday afternoon Symphony audience, which in the fortnight of his sojourn here has brought him into high favor for his modest, gentlemanly bearing as for his musicianship. Yesterday it received him warmly throughout the concert and called him out again at its close.

Mme Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, appeared as soloist for the first time at these concerts. The program was as follows:

Beethoven, 7th symphony; Mozart, Recit and Aria "Dove Sono," from "Marriage of Figaro," Mme Easton; Loeffler, poem "La Bonne Chanson," Debussy, Recit and Aria of Lia from "The Prodigal Son"; Franck, "Les Eolides"; Ravel, orchestral fragments, first series, "Nocturne," "Interlude," "Danse Guerriere," from ballet in one act, "Daphnis and Chloe," first performance in Boston.

A long program, ordinarily too long, but holding so much of beauty that one might well pause before making an elimination—even of Cesar Franck's poem, with its curious foreshadowing of thoughts in his symphony.

Mr Monteux' Beethoven had clearness and spirit. He finds here a ruddy, folk joyousness; makes the allegretto much less weighty than it has been, the fugue crisp and lucid, and the finale music for a chorus of dervishes in the whirlwind of the dance. No wonder the pictorial character of these pages has invited the visions of analysts. Whatever Mr Monteux' tendency to drive the orchestra in passages where an accelerando hardly is intended, he saves from the ponderous or tragic music which is more often naive.

Mr Loeffler's revised poem to Verlaine's imaginative verse has lain in seclusion too long. Composer and poet are well matched in their instinctive sense of color, line, rare and significant expression. The music appropriately touches the note of the idyl upon the one side and of impassioned rhapsody inspired by love within consonant nature upon the other. Both overtake beauty, the harmonically enriched morning song of the strings over their insistent pedal point, no less than the sonorous tribute to the sun and the poet's beloved. The composer twice bowed his acknowledgments to the applauding audience.

Mme Easton gave pleasure by her pure, expressive voice, finding herself and her audience more particularly in Debussy's aria of his Massenet period. Although hurried by Mr Monteux a trifle in the climax, she made her points, and that in music which asks preferably a deeper timbred voice.

Ravel's suite, more recondite and challenging in its impressionism than its fellow, pleasurably remembered from last year, is probably the more dependent upon stage pantomime, lights and pictures. But the daring in harmony, color and instrumentation is not that of the mere fantasist. There is suggestion of Daphnis in supplication and the pirates are fine fellows. Mr Townsend's chorus, singing well the difficult music, defined their two moods. Had the voices sounded from a greater distance they might have been [illegible]

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRANSCRIPT OCTOBER 30

UPCOMING NEW MUSIC

A WEEK THAT BRINGS NOTABLE "NOVELTIES"

An Early Tone-Poem by Mr. Loeffler, Revised and Rewritten as "La Bonne Chanson"—A Graphic and Poetic Suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe" — Mr. Laparra's Unusual Cycle of Spanish Songs, Dances and Piano-Pieces

ORIGINALLY written in 1901, played at the Symphony Concerts in April of 1902 and in January of 1903, first entitled "Avant que Tu ne t'en Ailles" and now named "La Bonne Chanson," Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem to be heard at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday, is in surface and color a new piece. That is to say, while the composer has not altered the design of the tone-poem or invented fresh motives to generate the music, he has newly harmonized and newly scored it, presumably in the imagination and experience of the seventeen years passed since he last set hand to it. As of old, the verses, "La Bonne Chanson," that Verlaine judged his "most natural" poetry, "so sincere, so amiably, sweetly, purely thought, so simply written," stand as key to the poetic content of the music. In French, the poem runs:

Avant que tu ne t'en ailles,
Pale étoile du matin,
—Mille cailles
Chantent, chantent dans le thym.—

Tourne devers le poète,
Dont les yeux sont pleins d'amour,
—L'alouette
Monte au ciel avec le jour.—

Tourne ton regard que nole L'aurore dans son azur;
—Quelle joie
Parmi les champs de blé mur!—

Puis fais luire ma pensée
Là-bas,—bien loin, oh, bien loin!
—La rosée
Gaîment brille sur le foin.—

Dans le doux rêve où s'agite
Ma mie endormie encor . . .
—Vite, vite,
Car voici le soleil d'or.—

In English prose, the programme-book of 1902 translated the verses:

Before you fade and disappear, pale morning star—a thousand quails call in the thyme—

Turn toward the poet, whose eyes brim with love—the lark mounts skyward with the day—

Turn your face drowned by the dawn in its blue—O the joy among ripe wheatfields!—

Make my thought shine yonder—far off, O so far!—the dew glistens on the hay—

In the sweet dream wherein my love still sleeping stirs—hasten, hasten; for, lo, the golden sun.

"As the poem of Verlaine is a theme with interruptions, so the musical paraphrase may be described as variants of a theme, with corresponding interruptions. The first verse is treated as a prelude. There are suggestions of the fading star. An allegro follows the announcement of the chief theme. With 'Quelle joie' there is return to the idyllic mood. As the longing of the poet is more impatient, so the theme becomes more and more agitated, and in the painting of the daily miracle a full modern orchestra is employed."

Ravel's Ballet-Suite

The first "Suite for Orchestra" that Ravel drew for the concert-hall from his ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe," to be played this week by Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra for the first times in Boston, needs little introduction, since it is sufficiently heralded by vivid memories of the second suite, heard at two pairs of Symphony Concerts last winter. A fragment from The London Times may serve to recall the scheme and course of the ballet—the more interestingly because it recalls also the piquant dispute between the composer and Mr. Diaghilev, the director of the Russian Dancers, about the omission in performance at Drury Lane of certain choral passages hummed by an invisible choir. These measures happen, moreover, to appear in the suite of Friday and Saturday when thirty-two singers from Mr. Townsend's Boston Symphony Chorus will undertake them. Said The Times:

> But the important event of the evening was the first performance in England of Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," conducted by M. Monteux. None of the qualities which lay such violent siege to the senses in "Thamar" and in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Schéhérazade" are essential factors in the new French ballet. It is an idyll in which the stage pictures of Chloe carried away by robbers, of her rescue by the intervention of Pan at the prayer of Daphnis, and of their miming together the story of the loves of Pan and Syrinx have served to stimulate the composer's imagination, and now act primarily as the link which puts the imagination of the hearers into contact with the spirit of the music. This does not mean that the action is unimportant, but that the beauty of the scenes, the poses of the groups of Grecian figures, the dances alike of the individuals, the masses of youths and maidens, and of the pirates seem to take their places in the scheme primarily as illustrations of the symphonic poem played by the orchestra.
>
> Since the music is of such first-rate importance, Mr. Ravel's complaint, which he made in his letter to The Times, must carry weight, whatever may be the practical objections to his demands. He may well object to the omission of the chorus, since the ballet is represented in a theatre possessing for the time being one of the finest possible stage choirs. The loss of choral color is most felt in the passage linking the first scene in the grove of Pan with the second in the camp of the pirates to which Chloe has been carried. Daphnis has fallen asleep; three nymphs have appeared to him to assure him of divine protection for Chloe, and when the stage is in darkness Ravel introduced originally a "mystic chorus" without accompaniment and without words. Presently short phrases for muted trumpets strike across the tones of the voices suggesting the turmoil of the pirates' camp, but when the chorus has been played, as it was last evening, on the wind instruments of the orchestra, the effect of the muted trumpets is far less striking because of the similarity of

Spanish Semblance for Spanish Songs

Helen Stanley

Raoul Laparra

(The Sketches by Caro-Delvaille)

are nearer. . . . The scene changes to the pirates' camp on a rocky shore, with the sea in the distance. Their ship is seen at one side. Cypress trees add decoration to the red cliffs with great stretches of sky between. The pirates run to and fro carrying booty, and disport themselves in a long and taxing dance. At the end they fall prone, drunken, dishevelled."

Rare Spanish Music

For the cycle of Spanish songs and piano-pieces in which Mr. Laparra, the Parisian composer, who wrote it, and Mme. Helen Stanley, his chosen singer, will be heard at Symphony Hall next Saturday afternoon, there is sufficient prelude, even for so novel an occasion, in the article that H. K. M. wrote in this place when the music was first heard in New York last spring: "Mr. Laparra's opera, 'La Habanera,' will be remembered by all who heard it at the Boston Opera House in the season of 1913-14 as a compact and extraordinarily vivid work, tingling with Spanish color, melody and folklore. One does not readily forget the skill with which the composer used simple dissonance for the utmost of dramatic and emotional effect. The opera, though it contained no authentic melody of the people, was seldom far removed from their type of musical feeling. The sophisticated skill of the composer never obtruded. Yet, thanks to Mr. Laparra's canny manipulations, the melodies so crossed, the modulations so bit, that the result was a 'modern' piece verging on the 'daring.'

"The same method Mr. Laparra has used with these new, delightful songs and dances which he has grouped under the general title of 'A Musical Journey through Spain'—songs and piano-pieces which he develops from the snatches of folk-song he had himself collected among the peasants of the peninsula. As they stand, each of the pieces is an extended and carefully modelled piece of conscious composition. Yet, analyzed, it reduces to a few shreds of melody, which were invented and sung by the shepherds of the Basque region or the ploughman of Murcia decades ago. The effect is one of considerable elaboration. There are the bold modulations, the stinging dissonances which we associate with modern music, and they enter so inevitably, as it seems, that they appear to have been so schemed from the start. Yet when one seeks to analyze, one finds nothing which was not somehow implied in the original tunes. Indeed, when one inspects them in the constructive frame of mind of the composer, one is surprised to find how little was 'done to them.'

"This skill in the manipulation of folk-tunes in their own idiom is not often the lot of composers, but Mr. Laparra has it in rare degree. From Andalusia, Catalonia, Aragon, the Basque region and Old Castile he has collected his tunes, each preserving the sectional characteristics of the place of birth. His skill has enabled him to develop them without losing peculiar features. The Basque tunes, for example, have something of the suavity of the French folk-song. In the lovely sentimental song, 'Dead Light' (which is Basque for moon) he adorns the simple melody with weaving runs and trills which suggest the singing of mysterious birds. The Jota from Aragon he develops from two mere fragments of a tune, supported by a simple device in the accompaniment which is common to Spanish guitar-players; but out of these he has wrought a furious dance-song to make the blood run hot in the hearer's veins. Again Andalusian is [illegible] ballad, the song of a blind man who haunts the back streets bewailing the sorrow of the world and exclaiming that if even the strings of his guitar weep with pain, how much greater is his own since he has not even the eyes to weep with. With expert skill the composer has made the song sob with his own cadences.

"In the dances Mr. Laparra lets his fancy play freely. The 'Seguidilla à la Gitana' takes for foundation an Andalusian gypsy figure, a series of descending triplets, which serves as the bass beneath which a doleful melody winds its way down the chromatic scale. Here a definite artistic atmosphere is sought in tones, suggesting the moist dusk of waning autumn, and is attained with notable sureness. Finest of all, perhaps, is 'El Murcia,' in which the Murcian plowman is crying to high heavens in an effort to stir his beasts to greater efforts. This song is a model of elaborate development from simple germs. The accompaniment, which shrieks with vigorous dissonance and glitters with many a picturesque device, is wholly derived from the two lines of the tune which Mr. Laparra heard from the Murcian peasant's own lips.

"The listener is surprised not alone by the skill, but also by the variety shown in these songs. They belie altogether the somewhat brittle effect of the Spanish music imitated in 'Carmen' and Rimsky Korsakov's 'Caprice Espagnole.' They summon an intensity of emotion sometimes plaintive, sometimes tragic, sometimes boisterous, and occasionally religious, which is not often to be found in northern lands, and can be discovered to no such degree in the songs of Italy. Mr. Laparra had the instinct and the musical skill to divine and utilize the potentialities of this Spanish music. He has done an unusually imaginative and engrossing piece of work."

NEWS OF MUSICIANS

Mr. Rabaud and Pieces from Wagner—A New Part for Mr. Caruso—Mr. McCormack Brings Back His Violinist—Items and Opinions

UPON his arrival in Boston, last evening, Mr. Rabaud, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for the current season, had little to say that he had not said elsewhere since he disembarked in New York. In one of his sayings, however, he is quite mistaken. According to the morning newspapers, he told the receiving reporters that "in the Allied countries there is a tacit agreement that the music of Wagner and Strauss shall not be heard." On the contrary, Wagner's operas of "Tristan" and of "Die Walküre" have not only been represented but also well received in London during the course of the war; while the English conductors, Sir Thomas Beecham and Sir Henry Wood, regularly include Wagner's music in their programmes. A fortnight or more ago, indeed, on the same evening, there happened to be "Wagner Concerts" in both London and Manchester—the two British capitals of music. Moreover, Mr. Toscanini played fragments of Wagner's music dramas in his orchestral concerts in Italy, while here in Boston only last summer, under another Italian conductor, Mr. Macchia, overtures and other pieces by Wagner were eagerly heard and lustily applauded at "The Pops." Mr. Rabaud is well within his rights as conductor of the Symphony Concerts to exclude from them whatever music he wills. But it is desirable also, in any given case, to admit the demonstrable facts. . . . The new conductor will begin work with the orchestra on Monday, Nov. 11, after it returns from its first journey to New York and the other cities southward that it visits regularly. He will lead it for the first times in public at Cambridge on Thursday, Nov. 14; at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, Nov. 15 and 16.

om RECORD
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te
A PERSON OF IMPORTANCE

HENRI RABAUD
The new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

om POST
dress: Washington, D. C.
te

EVENING SUN
ess: New York City

SUN
: New York City.

rom SUN
ddress: New York City
Date

After weeks of delay, due principally to conditions brought about by the war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to make announcement of its plans for the series of concerts to be given in this city during the coming winter. As is generally known, Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra, and through all its life maintained it, retired last spring from all active participation in its affairs, and the maintenance and government was taken over by a board of nine trustees composed of prominent men in Boston, who, in turn, represented a large number of other men, and thus assured the orchestra its continuance under the old conditions.

Many changes have been made in the personnel, but those who have heard the orchestra in rehearsal think it is stronger than ever. The presence in America of the famous French military band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members. Frederic Fradkin, the American violinist, is now concertmaster. The cello section is headed by Joseph Malkin. The viola section has as its leader Mr. Barrier, who is now on his way from Paris; and the second violin section has as its leader Edward Tak, who for a number of years has been one of the strongest members of the first violin section. A number of changes have been made in the wood wind sections, but the brass remains substantially the same as in the past.

As already announced, the permanent conductor will be Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who for the past seven years has been the principal conductor for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mr. Rabaud will be late in arriving, therefore the early concerts of the orchestra, including the first concert in Washington, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose services have been made available to the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza.

Music

First Boston Symphony Program.

The first pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9. Through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza of the Metropolitan Opera Company these concerts will have as conductor Mr. Pierre Monteux. Mr. Raboud, the new conductor, does not take charge of the orchestra until the following Monday.

The programme for the Thursday night concert comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Perie" and Debussy's "Iberia.'

For Saturday afternoon the programme comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, Charles Martin Loeffler's poem "La Bonne Chanson," Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations "Istar," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major.

AMERICAN
New York City.
OCT 28 1918

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS.

AFTER two weeks' delay, due to the influenza, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, largely reconstructed and reorganized, opened its thirty-eighth season with its first pair of concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday night. Pierre Monteux conducted. Both concerts were happy events. The playing of the orchestra revealed the same perfection of technique that has char-

The first pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9. Through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza of the Metropolitan Opera Company these concerts will have as conductor Pierre Monteux. Mr. Rabud, the new conductor, does not take charge of the orchestra until the following Monday. The programme for the Thursday night concert comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in B minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Perie" and Debussy's "Iberia." For Saturday afternoon the programme comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, Charles Martin Loeffler's poem, "La Bonne Chanson," Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations "Istar" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major.

n MORNING TELEGRAPH
ress: New York City
e

Boston Symphony Next Week.

The first pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9. Through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza of the Metropolitan Opera Company these concerts will have as conductor Mr. Pierre Monteux. Mr. Rabaud, the new conductor, does not take charge of the orchestra until the following Monday.

The program for the Thursday night concert comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Perie" and Debussy's "Iberia."

For Saturday afternoon the program comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, Charles Martin Loeffler's poeme, "La Bonne Chanson"; Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major.

TRIUMPH WON BY MONTEUX.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens New Season Successfully.

Special Despatch to THE SUN.

BOSTON, Oct. 26.—After two weeks delay, due to the influenza, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, largely reconstructed and reorganized, opened its thirty-eighth season with its first pair of concerts yesterday afternoon and tonight. Pierre Monteux conducted. The playing of the orchestra revealed the same perfection of technic that has characterized it in the past. Newspaper comment is enthusiastic about the beauty, brilliancy and warmth of tone. Particularly was the unusual plasticity of the string choir praised. The concerts were a personal triumph for Mr. Monteux, who in the four weeks of rehearsal, in the opinion of Philip Hale of the Boston Herald, has restored the clarity and euphony given to the orchestra by Gericke, and to this has added warmth, imagination, emotion and expressiveness, qualities foreign to Mr. Gericke's nature. The programme comprised Franck's D minor symphony, Schumann's Manfred overture, Dukas Lapar and Debussy's "Iberia."

HERALD NOVEMBER 2,

SECOND CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Conductor Monteux Gives Noble Performance of Beethoven Work

ORCHESTRA TO GO ON TOUR NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7; Mozart, recitative, "E Susanna non vien?" and aria "Dove Sono," from "Le Nozze di Figaro"; Loeffler, poem, "La Bonne Chanson"; Debussy, recitative, "L'Annee en vain" and aria "Azael! Azael!" from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Franck, symphonic poem, "Les Eolides"; Ravel, First Suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe." Mme. Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera company was the singer.

There was an engrossing performance of the symphony, a musical and poetic performance that should have disabused any person laboring under the delusion that only a German can fitly interpret the music of Beethoven. It was a singularly clear and well balanced performance, rhythmically exciting, but without extravagance; the imposing climaxes were admirably prepared; the wonderful Allegretto, one of the fullest manifestations of Beethoven's genius, was played in the requisite spirit of simplicity, nobly, without a suspicion of sentimentalism, while the Finale, in which Beethoven shouts and throws his hat in the air, was a revelation of Dionysiac fury.

Mr. Loeffler's "Bonne Chanson" was first performed under another title at a Symphony concert in 1902. When it was then heard, it appealed to all by its lyric flight and its unsophisticated beauty. The composition, suggested by a poem in Paul Verlaine's cycle "La Bonne Chanson," has been thoroughly revised and re-orchestrated. In many instances in music as in literature revision has enfeebled the original. The sandpapering and the polishing have brought tameness; the pursuit of perfection has resulted in finicalness. It has not been so with this composition, which must now be ranked for its spontaneity, its warmth, its poetic feeling with the finest and most mature of Mr. Loeffler's works. There is no over-elaboration, no anxious search after the unusual, no apparently deliberate avoidance of frankly melodic expression. There is no suggestion of Flaubertian toil and agony in shunning what might be considered conventional and obvious. Richly scored, this "poem" has substance in thought as well as gorgeousness in expression. Surely Mr. Loeffler will now be willing to allow the publication of it.

The eloquent performance of "La Bonne Chanson" was followed by a delightful reading of Franck's "Eolides" with its exquisite treatment of the short chromatic phrase, with its infinite harmonic variety.

The fragments from Ravel's ballet are not so interesting in a concert hall as those contained in the Suite played last season. They are more in need of scenery and pantomime. The Nocturne has some charming bits of color; the Interlude has curious vocal effects off-stage, difficult intervals for the singers who had been well trained by Mr. Stephen Townsend; the warlike dance of the pirates has a ferocity that is not displeasing, but as a whole the music, as absolute music, disappointed expectation. By some unaccountable negligence Daphnis was referred to in the program book as a woman.

Mme. Easton did not do herself full justice yesterday. We have heard her sing here in opera with freer voice. Yesterday her upper tones were sometimes pinched and without body. The middle and lower tones were rich and beautiful. She phrased as an accomplished musician. Lia's recitative and aria were sung dramatically. In the aria of Mozart she was less successful, but the singers of Mozart's perfect melodic line are few.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concert next week, for the orchestra will go on its first trip this season. Mr. Rabaud will conduct the concerts of Nov. 15, 16. The program has not yet been determined.

The public owes Mr. Monteux a heavy debt of gratitude. By his skill, patience and unfailing courtesy as a disciplinarian he has already brought the new orchestra to a high stage of efficiency. Mr. Rabaud has a sonorous, euphonious, plastic orchestra at his command. As an interpreter Mr. Monteux has given memorable performances of works known and unfamiliar, performances that have been sane as well as brilliant and imaginative. As a man he has in a short time endeared himself to orchestra and public. And he with orchestra and public now bids his friend Mr. Rabaud welcome and wishes him all success.

POST NOVEMBER 2,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

The second programme of the Boston Symphony season, which Pierre Monteux interpreted yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as interesting as the first of a week ago, and as brilliantly presented. Beethoven's seventh symphony, the tone poeme, "La Bonne Chanson," of Loeffler; Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and music from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Cloe," performed for the first time in Boston, were the orchestral compositions. The soloist was Miss Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who sang the recitative and the aria, "Dove sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and aria, "Azae; Azael," from Debussy's early cantata, "L'Enfant Prodigue."

ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Some had wondered if Mr. Monteux as interpreter of classic masterpieces would be equal to Mr. Monteux as the interpreter of modern music. The doubts of those who heard the performance of Beethoven's symphony were quickly dispelled. The sense of form, the appreciation of the boldness and virility of Beethoven's symphonic architecture, were as apparent as was Mr. Monteux's appreciation of the arch-impressionistic music of Ravel which came later on the programme.

Again the glory of the orchestral tone was a thing to wonder at, as was the enthusiasm and conviction which permeated a reverent and classical conception of the composer's thought. This was another triumph, and not the least notable, of Mr. Monteux's brief season in Boston.

Mr. Loeffler's Tone Poem

Mr. Loeffler's work, inspired by Verlaine's incredibly beautiful poem to the sunrise, was first performed in 1902 at these concerts. Since that time it has been reorchestrated. Rarely has the composer painted in such beautiful tone colors. Neither has he forgotten "line"—that is, melody. There is noble polyphony almost throughout. Developments of "line" and "color" go hand in hand, and are ordered with masterly art. Perhaps there is overluxuriance in the development of the theme, which seems first to hesitate as it steps from an exquisitely tinted instrumental background, then gathers strength, power, rythmical life, as it rushes forward to a climax in which the orchestra fairly blazes in its sonority. Perhaps a short cut in the first half of the work would have made it more concise. Nor is the melodic speech of the composer as radically individual as it is in later works. Some would say it was more direct, as it is of more obvious appeal.

However these things may be, the audience greeted with marked enthusiasm the simplicity, the directness, the nature-mood of this music, and applauded until the composer, in the audience, rose to his feet.

Chorus of 32 Voices

What can compare with the simplicity of Franck? His music is of the winds which whisper and caress the earth. A short, Tristan-like phrase is the thematic basis of the work, which evokes a mood as delicately and fancifully seusuous as could possibly be. The unconsciousness, the absolute lack of artifice, with which the miracle is wrought, is a miracle of genius.

A chorus of 32 voices, trained by Stephen Townsend and singing behind the scenes, assisted in the performance of the strange, Pagan music of Ravel. Today this music seems the extreme of impressionism. The ear cannot analyze the laws of its harmony, yet these harmonies seem to sit as squarely as any chord in the work of a classic master. The composer has formulated a whole new speech of his own in one of the most original and astonishing scores, in the writer's opinion, in modern French music. The chorus performed admirably in very difficult passages. Mr. Monteux, who again conducted everything from memory, gave a superb performance.

Miss Easton's Singing

Miss Easton sang music, which in the hands of too many performers is merely decorative, with sincerity and emotion. She has a fresh and beautiful voice, peculiarly rich and dark in its lower registers. Her earnestness and talent impressed the audience and she was recalled with marked enthusiasm.

At the last the audience was loth to let Mr. Monteux depart. The recent epidemic deprived the symphony audience of three more programmes interpreted by a conductor of the most exceptional talents, to be numbered as one of the most gifted leaders who have stood at the head of this orchestra.

AMERICAN NOVEMBER 2,

SYMPHONY TO HAVE LONGER PROGRAM

By FRED J. McISAAC.

It begins to look as though Boston Symphony audiences were going to get more for their money under the French regime than when the Germans ruled the roost out in Huntington avenue.

Pierre Monteux's first program was two hours long, while the concert yesterday afternoon lasted two and a quarter hours. Having been accustomed to programs of no more than an hour and a half's duration Boston audiences are likely to get musical indigestion before the season goes much further if Henri Rabaud resembles Monteux who now yields the baton.

Beginning with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a work which is so bright and joyous that it will never become an antique, through a tone poem by Charles Martin Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson," and Cesar Franck's Les Eolides," a symphonic poem, so-called, it included two vocal numbers by Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera, and concluded with a Ballet by Raval from "Daphnis et Chloe."

Florence Gertrude Easton was first heard by Boston audiences in Henry Savage's opera in English troupe back in 1905. She was then but eighteen. A few seasons later she went to Berlin with her husband, Francis Maclennan, also an opera singer, and they enjoyed great fame in the land of the Germans for eight or nine years. Returning she joined the Chicago Opera two seasons ago and last year achieved the Metropolitan, presumably her goal.

She sang the recitative and aria from The Marriage of Figaro "Dove Sono" and Lia's aria from Debussy's youthful cantata, "L'Enfant Prodigue," a work which was done in the days of the Boston Opera in dramatic form.

Miss Easton's voice is a lyric soprano of great warmth and beauty. The Debussy air was exactly suited to her tones and method, and she sang it with splendid effect. The sopranos who can distinguish themselves singing Mozart are not numerous, and Miss Easton can hardly be counted among them, judging by her work in the Marriage of Figaro number. She sang it with little expression and an uneven quality of tone.

TRAVELER NOVEMBER

OTHER CITIES TO HEAR SYMPHONY

There will be no Symphony concerts the coming week, as the orchestra will be away on its first southern trip. The usual schedule of concerts will be given —Monday night in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday night in Baltimore, Thursday night in New York, Friday night in Brooklyn and Saturday afternoon in New York. All these concerts will have Mr. Monteux as conductor and then this distinguished Frenchman will end his connection with the orchestra next Saturday, after the matinee concert in New York. He will then resume his work at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he will have charge of the French opera during the coming season. When it became evident that Mr. Rabaud could not reach America in time properly to prepare for these southern concerts, Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan opera company, courteously released Mr. Monteux from his work in New York in order that he might stay with the orchestra another week.

In all the cities except New York the soloist will be Florence Easton. With two exceptions, the programs will be made entirely of works which Mr. Monteux has performed in Boston. These two exceptions are the D major Concerto Grosso of Handel for strings alone, which will be played in Washington, Baltimore and at the afternoon concert in New York, and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations, which will be played in Brooklyn. At all the concerts except the matinee concert in New York the symphony will be Franck's in D minor, and at this concert in New York Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be played. Mr. Rabaud will have his first meeting with his men at the rehearsal called for 10 o'clock Monday morning, Nov. 11.

TRAVELER. NOVEMBER 2,

MONTEUX SAYS FAREWELL TODAY

The fact it was the last afternon concert of the Symphony orchestra Pierre Monteux will lead here this season imparted special interest to the concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Monteux's leading of the orchestra has been of such high order one and all wish we could have more of him.

The afternoon's program was Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7; Mozart, recitative, "E Susanna non vien?" and aria, "Dove Sono," from "Le Nozze di Figaro"; Loeffler, poem, "La Bonne Chanson"; Debussy, recitative, "L'Annee en vain," and aria "Azael! Azael!" from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Franck, symphonic poem, "Les Eolides"; Ravel, First Suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe." Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera company, was the singer.

From the symphony to the final number little was left to be desired. Mr. Monteux was particularly happy in the symphony, the Franck selection and Loeffler's revised poem. The Ravel number, even with chorus, failed to come up to expectations, not, however, from lack of interpretation. It's for the stage with its accompaniments rather than the concert hall. Mme. Easton has been heard to better advantage.

The orchestra makes its first trip of the season next week. The concerts of Nov. 15 and 16 will be led by the new conductor, Mr. Rabaud.

RECORD NOVEMBER 2,

MONTEUX SAYS AU REVOIR AT SYMPHONY HALL

Ravel Work for First Time —Mme. Easton Appears As Soloist

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Second concert of the season, Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, Pierre Monteux, conductor; Mme. Florence Easton (Mrs. Francis Maclennan), soloist. The program:—

Beethoven, Symphony in A minor, No. 7, Op 92.
Mozart, aria, "Marriage de Fiagro."
Loeffler, poem, "La Bonne Chanson."
Debussy, aria, "L'Enfaut Prodigue."
Franck, "Les Eolides."
Ravel, ballet, "Daphnis et Ohloe."

This was Mr. Monteux's au revoir performance. Boston regrets his departure, for he has made a happy impression. In this, his last concert, he shone as a conductor of Beethoven. The "Apotheosis of the dance" symphony was a lovely thing under his baton—a work of perfect proprotion and exquisitely precise rythm.

Mr. Loeffler's poem, reorchestrated since heard here in 1901, was played by Mr. Monteux in admiration of Mr. Loeffler, for whom he hold a high regard. The performance of the musical paraphrase of Verlaine's poem was excellent. Both Mr. Monteux and Mr. Loeffler, who heard the work, were applauded.

The Ravel work was the feature of the program. When it was first produced in Paris, Alfred Bruneau, writing in the Matin, found that the "score had strength, rhythm, brilliance. The liberty of form and of writing surpass anything that can be imagined. Harmonic and polyphonic anarchy reign supreme." Many of the audience found the same state of affairs yesterday. They were stunned. Yet, possibly if they heard this work again, they would find wonderfully beautiful pages, passages like that for the trumpet off stage that are of piercing beauty. Fortunate those who have heard the work in rehearsal, for it is one to hear and know before admiring wholly, before getting in the composer's exact state of mind.

Mr. Monteux called Mr. Townsend, who trained the off-stage chorus, which takes part in the work, to the stage to share applause.

Mme. Easton fared much better with Debussy than with Mozart. She sang the familiar "Fiagro" aria with various degrees of excellence. Lia's lament was given with considerable authority and beauty of sustained tone.

The next Symphony concerts will be given Nov. 15-16. Henri Rabaud will then make his debut as conductor. The program will be announced later.

From _____ Union
Address _____ Springfield, Mass.
Date _____ OCT 27 1918

A "Revamped" Boston Symphony.

The Sunday Union's recent comment on new features of the Boston Symphony personnel, aroused much interest, even in Boston. Here are more facts, just as authoritative, from an inside source which cannot be doubted. A new face in the first violin section, in fact, next seat to the concertmeister, will be that of Ferdinand Thillois, an instrumentalist of extraordinary brilliance and erudition considering his 28 years. He was taught by the same masters as Fradkin. Let us hope that either Fradkin or Thillois will be the soloist when the great band, later this season, visits Springfield. Georges Mager, a new man in the viola section, came expressly from Paris and the French Band, which came here last season for this post. Josef Malkin, known in Springfield, leads the cello section and with him the first desk will be the famous Alwin Schroeder, celebrated in quartet annals. Since the death of Wulf Fries, Schroeder has been the dean of cellists in this country. Another veteran, this one best known in France, is the cellist Georges Miquelle, first prize winner of the Paris Conservatoire, and one of the Colonne's principal cellists in many Paris seasons.

The oboe section is graced by Louis Speyer, the most promising of the Conservatoire's graduates, also a member of the French Band. The orchestra has acquired the services of the principal contra-bass soloist of the Coln Theater in Buenos Aires, South America—M. Villano, an Italian of extraordinary attainments. He is a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma, and began his career in La Scala orchestra. When Paul Mimart was called last spring to military duty in France his place in the clarinet section was left unfilled until Leo Croes could be secured. This part of the band will possess particular interest from the fact that side by side will sit two solo instrumentalists who received severe wounds in the famous battle of the Yser November, 1914, M. Croes and Emile Stievenard. The former is a pensioner of the "Eighth Territorial Infantry," a prize winner of the conservatoire of Lille, and well known to those who have attended the concerts of the Theatre des Champs Elysees. M. Stievenard, the new bass clarinetist, was for some time professor in the Vincent d'Indy "Scola Cantorum," and has had much experience with the audiences of the Opera Comique and the Concerts Lamoureaux. There are many other new personalities of more than common interest in the new Boston Symphony, and the war has been responsible for much of this interest. The best judges assert that the predominance of the French in the new organization will not only be a pleasing change but a decidedly improving factor—adding much to the crispness and vivid brilliance of its interpretations. The Springfield playing of the Boston Symphony, thus renovated, with its French conductor, Henri Rabaud, and with a soloist of the rank of the young violinist Fradkin (born in Troy just 26 years ago, but a Frenchman through and through) will considerably compensate us for the disappointment of the past week in not hearing the French Conservatoire orchestra.

ERNEST NEWTON BAGG.

EVENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.

OCT 31 1918

MAY PLAY GERMAN MUSIC

Muck's Successor Asks Why It Should Be Barred.

New York, Oct. 30. —"Such questions are never asked in Paris," said Henri Rabaud, who succeeds Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he was asked yesterday whether he intends to include music by German composers in the concerts this season. "Why should we not play beautiful music like Beethoven's C Minor Symphony?" But he said he would confer with the trustees of the orchestra before adopting a definite policy in the matter.

This is M. Rabaud's first visit to America. He did not even come over for the first performance of his opera, "Marouf," which was given at the Metropolitan last winter.

M. Rabaud recently has been devoting his time to charity concerts. Before the war he was one of the conductors at the National Opera House in Paris. He is a pupil of the Conservatoire and won the Prix de Rome in 1894.

HERALD
ress: New York City
e _____

The first pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9. Through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza of the Metropolitan Opera Company these concerts will have as conductor Pierre Monteux. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor, does not take charge of the orchestra until the following Monday. The programme for the Thursday night concert comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." For Saturday afternoon the programme comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, Charles Martin Loeffler's poeme, "La Bonne Chanson"; Vincent D'Indy's symphonic vralations "Istar" and [illegible]

TRIBUNE
New York City
OCT 27 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9. Through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, these concerts will have as conductor Mr. Pierre Monteux. [illegible] Thursday night concert will be César Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Perie" and Debussy's "Iberia."

Saturday afternoon the programme will be Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, Charles Martin Loeffler's Poeme "La Bonne Chanson," Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations "Istar" and Beethoven's No. 7 in A major.

HERALD NOVEMBER 2,

SECOND CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Conductor Monteux Gives Noble Performance of Beethoven Work

ORCHESTRA TO GO ON TOUR NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7; Mozart, recitative, "E Susanna non vien?" and aria "Dove Sono," from "Le Nozze di Figaro"; Loeffler, poem, "La Bonne Chanson"; Debussy, recitative, "L'Annee en vain" and aria "Azael! Azael!" from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Franck, symphonic poem, "Les Eolides"; Ravel, First Suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe." Mme. Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera company was the singer.

There was an engrossing performance of the symphony, a musical and poetic performance that should have disabused any person laboring under the delusion that only a German can fitly interpret the music of Beethoven. It was a singularly clear and well balanced performance, rhythmically exciting, but without extravagance; the imposing climaxes were admirably prepared; the wonderful Allegretto, one of the fullest manifestations of Beethoven's genius, was played in the requisite spirit of simplicity, nobly, without a suspicion of sentimentalism, while the Finale, in which Beethoven shouts and throws his hat in the air, was a revelation of Dionysiac fury.

Mr. Loeffler's "Bonne Chanson" was first performed under another title at a Symphony concert in 1902. When it was then heard, it appealed to all by its lyric flight and its unsophisticated beauty. The composition, suggested by a poem in Paul Verlaine's cycle "La Bonne Chanson," has been thoroughly revised and re-orchestrated. In many instances in music as in literature revision has enfeebled the original. The sandpapering and the polishing have brought tameness; the pursuit of perfection has resulted in finicalness. It has not been so with this composition, which must now be ranked for its spontaneity, its warmth, its poetic feeling with the finest and most mature of Mr. Loeffler's works. There is no over-elaboration, no anxious search after the unusual, no apparently deliberate avoidance of frankly melodic expression. There is no suggestion of Flaubertian toil and agony in shunning what might be considered conventional and obvious. Richly scored, this "poem" has substance in thought as well as gorgeousness in expression. Surely Mr. Loeffler will now be willing to allow the publication of it.

The eloquent performance of "La Bonne Chanson" was followed by a delightful reading of Franck's "Eolides" with its exquisite treatment of the short chromatic phrase, with its infinite harmonic variety.

The fragments from Ravel's ballet are not so interesting in a concert hall as those contained in the Suite played last season. They are more in need of scenery and pantomime. The Nocturne has some charming bits of color; the Interlude has curious vocal effects off-stage, difficult intervals for the singers who had been well trained by Mr. Stephen Townsend; the warlike dance of the pirates has a ferocity that is not displeasing, but as a whole the music, as absolute music, disappointed expectation. By some unaccountable negligence Daphnis was referred to in the program book as a woman.

Mme. Easton did not do herself full justice yesterday. We have heard her sing here in opera with freer voice. Yesterday her upper tones were sometimes pinched and without body. The middle and lower tones were rich and beautiful. She phrased as an accomplished musician. Lia's recitative and aria were sung dramatically. In the aria of Mozart she was less successful, but the singers of Mozart's perfect melodic line are few.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concert next week, for the orchestra will go on its first trip this season. Mr. Rabaud will conduct the concerts of Nov. 15, 16. The program has not yet been determined.

The public owes Mr. Monteux a heavy debt of gratitude. By his skill, patience and unfailing courtesy as a disciplinarian he has already brought the new orchestra to a high stage of efficiency. Mr. Rabaud has a sonorous, euphonious, plastic orchestra at his command. As an interpreter Mr. Monteux has given memorable performances of works known and unfamiliar, performances that have been sane as well as brilliant and imaginative. As a man he has in a short time endeared himself to orchestra and public. And he with orchestra and public now bids his friend Mr. Rabaud welcome and wishes him all success.

POST NOVEMBER 2,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

The second programme of the Boston Symphony season, which Pierre Monteux interpreted yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as interesting as the first of a week ago, and as brilliantly presented. Beethoven's seventh symphony, the tone poeme, "La Bonne Chanson," of Loeffler; Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and music from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Cloe," performed for the first time in Boston, were the orchestral compositions. The soloist was Miss Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who sang the recitative and the aria, "Dove sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and aria, "Azae; Azael," from Debussy's early cantata, "L'Enfant Prodigue."

ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Some had wondered if Mr. Monteux as interpreter of classic masterpieces would be equal to Mr. Monteux as the interpreter of modern music. The doubts of those who heard the performance of Beethoven's symphony were quickly dispelled. The sense of form, the appreciation of the boldness and virility of Beethoven's symphonic architecture, were as apparent as was Mr. Monteux's appreciation of the arch-impressionistic music of Ravel which came later on the programme.

Again the glory of the orchestral tone was a thing to wonder at, as was the enthusiasm and conviction which permeated a reverent and classical conception of the composer's thought. This was another triumph, and not the least notable, of Mr. Monteux's brief season in Boston.

Mr. Loeffler's Tone Poem

Mr. Loeffler's work, inspired by Verlaine's incredibly beautiful poem to the sunrise, was first performed in 1902 at these concerts. Since that time it has been reorchestrated. Rarely has the composer painted in such beautiful tone colors. Neither has he forgotten "line"—that is, melody. There is noble polyphony almost throughout. Developments of "line" and "color" go hand in hand, and are ordered with masterly art. Perhaps there is overluxuriance in the development of the theme, which seems first to hesitate as it steps from an exquisitely tinted instrumental background, then gathers strength, power, rythmical life, as it rushes forward to a climax in which the orchestra fairly blazes in its sonority. Perhaps a short cut in the first half of the work would have made it more concise. Nor is the melodic speech of the composer as radically individual as it is in later works. Some would say it was more direct, as it is of more obvious appeal.

However these things may be, the audience greeted with marked enthusiasm the simplicity, the directness, the nature-mood of this music, and applauded until the composer, in the audience, rose to his feet.

Chorus of 32 Voices

What can compare with the simplicity of Franck? His music is of the winds which whisper and caress the earth. A short, Tristan-like phrase is the thematic basis of the work, which evokes a mood as delicately and fancifully seusuous as could possibly be. The unconsciousness, the absolute lack of artifice, with which the miracle is wrought, is a miracle of genius.

A chorus of 32 voices, trained by Stephen Townsend and singing behind the scenes, assisted in the performance of the strange, Pagan music of Ravel. Today this music seems the extreme of impressionism. The ear cannot analyze the laws of its harmony, yet these harmonies seem to sit as squarely as any chord in the work of a classic master. The composer has formulated a whole new speech of his own in one of the most original and astonishing scores, in the writer's opinion, in modern French music. The chorus performed admirably in very difficult passages. Mr. Monteux, who again conducted everything from memory, gave a superb performance.

Miss Easton's Singing

Miss Easton sang music, which in the hands of too many performers is merely decorative, with sincerity and emotion. She has a fresh and beautiful voice, peculiarly rich and dark in its lower registers. Her earnestness and talent impressed the audience and she was recalled with marked enthusiasm.

At the last the audience was loth to let Mr. Monteux depart. The recent epidemic deprived the symphony audience of three more programmes interpreted by a conductor of the most exceptional talents, to be numbered as one of the most gifted leaders who have stood at the head of this orchestra.

AMERICAN NOVEMBER 2,

SYMPHONY TO HAVE LONGER PROGRAM

By FRED J. McISAAC.

It begins to look as though Boston Symphony audiences were going to get more for their money under the French regime than when the Germans ruled the roost out in Huntington avenue.

Pierre Monteux's first program was two hours long, while the concert yesterday afternoon lasted two and a quarter hours. Having been accustomed to programs of no more than an hour and a half's duration Boston audiences are likely to get musical indigestion before the season goes much further if Henri Rabaud resembles Monteux who now yields the baton.

Beginning with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a work which is so bright and joyous that it will never become an antique, through a tone poem by Charles Martin Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson," and Cesar Franck's Les Eolides," a symphonic poem, so-called, it included two vocal numbers by Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera, and concluded with a Ballet by Raval from "Daphnis et Chloe."

Florence Gertrude Easton was first heard by Boston audiences in Henry Savage's opera in English troupe back in 1905. She was then but eighteen. A few seasons later she went to Berlin with her husband, Francis Maclennan, also an opera singer, and they enjoyed great fame in the land of the Germans for eight or nine years. Returning she joined the Chicago Opera two seasons ago and last year achieved the Metropolitan, presumably her goal.

She sang the recitative and aria from The Marriage of Figaro "Dove Sono" and Lia's aria from Debussy's youthful cantata, "L'Enfant Prodigue," a work which was done in the days of the Boston Opera in dramatic form.

Miss Easton's voice is a lyric soprano of great warmth and beauty. The Debussy air was exactly suited to her tones and method, and she sang it with splendid effect. The sopranos who can distinguish themselves singing Mozart are not numerous, and Miss Easton can hardly be counted among them, judging by her work in the Marriage of Figaro number. She sang it with little expression and an uneven quality of tone.

TRAVELER NOVEMBER

OTHER CITIES TO HEAR SYMPHONY

There will be no Symphony concerts the coming week, as the orchestra will be away on its first southern trip. The usual schedule of concerts will be given —Monday night in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday night in Baltimore, Thursday night in New York, Friday night in Brooklyn and Saturday afternoon in New York. All these concerts will have Mr. Monteux as conductor and then this distinguished Frenchman will end his connection with the orchestra next Saturday, after the matinee concert in New York. He will then resume his work at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he will have charge of the French opera during the coming season. When it became evident that Mr. Rabaud could not reach America in time properly to prepare for these southern concerts, Mr. Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan opera company, courteously released Mr. Monteux from his work in New York in order that he might stay with the orchestra another week.

In all the cities except New York the soloist will be Florence Easton. With two exceptions, the programs will be made entirely of works which Mr. Monteux has performed in Boston. These two exceptions are the D major Concerto Grosso of Handel for strings alone, which will be played in Washington, Baltimore and at the afternoon concert in New York, and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations, which will be played in Brooklyn. At all the concerts except the matinee concert in New York the symphony will be Franck's in D minor, and at this concert in New York Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be played. Mr. Rabaud will have his first meeting with his men at the rehearsal called for 10 o'clock Monday morning, Nov. 11.

TRAVELER NOVEMBER 2,

MONTEUX SAYS FAREWELL TODAY

The fact it was the last afternon concert of the Symphony orchestra Pierre Monteux will lead here this season imparted special interest to the concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Monteux's leading of the orchestra has been of such high order one and all wish we could have more of him.

The afternoon's program was Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7; Mozart, recitative, "E Susanna non vien?" and aria, "Dove Sono," from "Le Nozze di Figaro"; Loeffler, poem, "La Bonne Chanson"; Debussy, recitative, "L'Annee en vain," and aria "Azael! Azael!" from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Franck, symphonic poem, "Les Eolides"; Ravel, First Suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe." Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera company, was the singer.

From the symphony to the final number little was left to be desired. Mr. Monteux was particularly happy in the symphony, the Franck selection and Loeffler's revised poem. The Ravel number, even with chorus, failed to come up to expectations, not, however, from lack of interpretation. It's for the stage with its accompaniments rather than the concert hall. Mme. Easton has been heard to better advantage.

The orchestra makes its first trip of the season next week. The concerts of Nov. 15 and 16 will be led by the new conductor, Mr. Rabaud.

RECORD NOVEMBER 2,

MONTEUX SAYS AU REVOIR AT SYMPHONY HALL

Ravel Work for First Time —Mme. Easton Appears As Soloist

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Second concert of the season, Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, Pierre Monteux, conductor; Mme. Florence Easton (Mrs. Francis Maclennan), soloist. The program:—

Beethoven, Symphony in A minor, No. 7, Op 92.
Mozart, aria, "Marriage de Fiagro."
Loeffler, poem, "La Bonne Chanson."
Debussy, aria, "L'Enfaut Prodigue."
Franck, "Les Eolides."
Ravel, ballet, "Daphnis et Ohloe."

This was Mr. Monteux's au revoir performance. Boston regrets his departure, for he has made a happy impression. In this, his last concert, he shone as a conductor of Beethoven. The "Apotheosis of the dance" symphony was a lovely thing under his baton—a work of perfect proprotion and exquisitely precise rythm.

Mr. Loeffler's poem, reorchestrated since heard here in 1901, was played by Mr. Monteux in admiration of Mr. Loeffler, for whom he hold a high regard. The performance of the musical paraphrase of Verlaine's poem was excellent. Both Mr. Monteux and Mr. Loeffler, who heard the work, were applauded.

The Ravel work was the feature of the program. When it was first produced in Paris, Alfred Bruneau, writing in the Matin, found that the "score had strength, rhythm, brilliance. The liberty of form and of writing surpass anything that can be imagined. Harmonic and polyphonic anarchy reign supreme." Many of the audience found the same state of affairs yesterday. They were stunned. Yet, possibly if they heard this work again, they would find wonderfully beautiful pages, passages like that for the trumpet off stage that are of piercing beauty. Fortunate those who have heard the work in rehearsal, for it is one to hear and know before admiring wholly, before getting in the composer's exact state of mind.

Mr. Monteux called Mr. Townsend, who trained the off-stage chorus, which takes part in the work, to the stage to share applause.

Mme. Easton fared much better with Debussy than with Mozart. She sang the familiar "Fiagro" aria with various degrees of excellence. Lia's lament was given with considerable authority and beauty of sustained tone.

The next Symphony concerts will be given Nov. 15-16. Henri Rabaud will then make his debut as conductor. The program will be announced later.

From UNION Springfield, Mass.

Address 3n.

Date OCT 27 1918

A "Revamped" Boston Symphony.

The Sunday Union's recent comment on new features of the Boston Symphony personnel, aroused much interest, even in Boston. Here are more facts, just as authoritative, from an inside source which cannot be doubted. A new face in the first violin section, in fact, next seat to the concertmeister, will be that of Ferdinand Thillois, an instrumentalist of extraordinary brilliance and erudition considering his 28 years. He was taught by the same masters as Fradkin. Let us hope that either Fradkin or Thillois will be the soloist when the great band, later this season, visits Springfield. Georges Mager, a new man in the viola section, came expressly from Paris and the French Band, which came here last season for this post. Josef Malkin, known in Springfield, leads the cello section and with him the first desk will be the famous Alwin Schroeder, celebrated in quartet annals. Since the death of Wulf Fries, Schroeder has been the dean of cellists in this country. Another veteran, this one best known in France, is the cellist Georges Miquelle, first prize winner of the Paris Conservatoire, and one of the Colonne's principal cellists in many Paris seasons.

The oboe section is graced by Louis Speyer, the most promising of the Conservatoire's graduates, also a member of the French Band. The orchestra has acquired the services of the principal contra-bass soloist of the Coln Theater in Buenos Aires, South America—M. Villano, an Italian of extraordinary attainments. He is a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma, and began his career in La Scala orchestra. When Paul Mimart was called last spring to military duty in France his place in the clarinet section was left unfilled until Leo Croes could be secured. This part of the band will possess particular interest from the fact that side by side will sit two solo instrumentalists who received severe wounds in the famous battle of the Yser November, 1914, M. Croes and Emile Stievenard. The former is a pensioner of the "Eighth Territorial Infantry," a prize winner of the conservatoire of Lille, and well known to those who have attended the concerts of the Theatre des Champs Elysees. M. Stievenard, the new bass clarinetist, was for some time professor in the Vincent d'Indy "Scola Cantorum," and has had much experience with the audiences of the Opera Comique and the Concerts Lamoureaux. There are many other new personalities of more than common interest in the new Boston Symphony, and the war has been responsible for much of this interest. The best judges assert that the predominance of the French in the new organization will not only be a pleasing change but a decidedly improving factor—adding much to the crispness and vivid brilliance of its interpretations. The Springfield playing of the Boston Symphony, thus renovated, with its French conductor, Henri Rabaud, and with a soloist of the rank of the young violinist Fradkin (born in Troy just 26 years ago, but a Frenchman through and through) will considerably compensate us for the disappointment of the past week in not hearing the French Conservatoire orchestra.

ERNEST NEWTON BAGG.

EVENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.

OCT 31 1918

MAY PLAY GERMAN MUSIC

Muck's Successor Asks Why It Should Be Barred.

New York, Oct. 30. "Such questions are never asked in Paris," said Henri Rabaud, who succeeds Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he was asked yesterday whether he intends to include music by German composers in the concerts this season. "Why should we not play beautiful music like Beethoven's C Minor Symphony?" But he said he would confer with the trustees of the orchestral before adopting a definite policy in the matter.

This is M. Rabaud's first visit to America. He did not even come over for the first performance of his opera, "Mareuf," which was given at the Metropolitan last winter.

M. Rabaud's entire time has been devoting his time to orchestral concerts. Before the war he was one of the conductors at the National Opera House in Paris. He is a pupil of the Conservatoire and won the Prix de Rome in 1901.

HERALD
New York City

The first pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9. Through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza of the Metropolitan Opera Company these concerts will have as conductor Pierre Monteux. Henri Rabaud, the new conductor, does not take charge of the orchestra until the following Monday. The programme for the Thursday night concert comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." For Saturday afternoon the programme comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, Charles Martin Loeffler's poeme, "La Bonne Chanson"; Vincent D'Indy's symphonic vralations "Istar" and [illegible] No. 7 in A

TRIBUNE
New York City

OCT 2 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9. Through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, these concerts will have as conductor Mr. Pierre Monteux. [illegible] Thursday night concert will be César Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Perie" and Debussy's "Iberia."

Saturday afternoon the programme will be Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, Charles Martin Loeffler's Poeme "La Bonne Chanson," Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations "Istar" and Beethoven's No. 7 in A major.

TRANSCRIPT NOVEMBER 2

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE COMPOSERS' DAY MORE THAN THE CONDUCTOR'S

A Novel Piece from Mr. Lœffler in His Earlier Manner—More Fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe", with Many a Characteristic Stroke—Franck Again in the Middle Way of a Tone-Poem—Beethoven, Orchestra and Leader in Triple Worth—Miss Easton Sings

WITH a novel piece by Mr. Loeffler and another by Ravel to grace the programme, interest shifted at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon from the quality of the orchestra and the conductor, Mr. Monteux, to the quality of the music in hand. The keener was this interest because Mr. Loeffler is the most individual of present American composers, while Ravel stands in like place among the Parisian. Yet, as the outcome was, Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem seemed rather of the composer who fashioned "The Death of Tintagiles" in 1897 than of the composer who wrote the symphony of 1916. It was early Loeffler, so to say, reproduced at a time when a later Loeffler prompted the anticipating ear. Perhaps, however, this impression was inevitable from a piece revived for reproduction seventeen years after it had been first written. As "Poem for Orchestra: 'Avant que Tu ne t'en Ailles,'" the music heard yesterday was set to paper in 1901 and played at Symphony Concerts of 1902 and 1903. As "La Bonne Chanson," it had been rescored and otherwise altered by Mr. Loeffler for performance yesterday. The subject-matter of the earlier and the later draft is the same, Verlaine's verses, likewise "La Bonne Chanson"—verses that salute the paling star of morning with the images of an unspecked dawn and that underlay the apostrophe with pulsing affection for her who, waking, stirs beside the poet. The form as well as the substance of the poem may readily stir so imaginative and yet so reflective a spirit as the composer's since the summoned images of nature—the call of the quail, the ascent of the lark, the glint of the dew, the final glowing of the sun—are like to festoons about the poet's apostrophe. So may the chief motive and the main body of the music bear the impulse of Verlaine's song, while around it variants of the motive may weave garlands of imagery like to his. Needless, almost, to say that the resulting tone-poem thus keeps pace and mood with the suggesting verses, and also develops itself in sustained and unfolding integrity. Once more, as their abominable way is to the truly orthodox, these so-called "impressionists" are unrelaxing logicians of music, formulating their design, pursuing it, at once pliant and unflinching, to the end.

Now, in the new version of "Avant que Tu ne t' en Ailles," Mr. Loeffler adheres to his original scheme, maintains his developed and dominant motive and little filters the festooning variants he deduces from it. On the other hand, he has entirely rescored the piece, distributing anew harmonies and timbres, modulations and progressions; but by a curious concentration of will and mind, he has effected this spring in the early manner of "The Death of Tintagiles" rather than in the later manner of the symphony. That is to say, the listener hears the Loeffler of harmonies, piercing progressions, glowing modulations and iridescent instrumental color only in the preluding to "La Bonne Chanson" and here and there in tonal imagery of the variants to the motive with hint of sensations from his own. In some ears yesterday, those victory measures surpassed in imagination and illusion all the rest of the tone-poem. In contrast, the rest of the tone-poem is the opulent and passionate development of a manifestly melodious motive. It is upborne to a climax of ardent apostrophe; it is lifted again to what the composer designs as the splendors of sunrise. At every turn it is enriched harmonically, amplified instrumentally, deepened by modulation, broadened by progression—yet, as it seemed yesterday, with curious lack of Mr. Loeffler's wonted individuality. His motive sings full and strong to his hearers; he uses at will every one of these semi-conventional processes of opulent music-making. His climax, his sunrise follow the best models, but they are of the Loeffler, making his way with the rest of the young composers sixteen years ago rather than of the Loeffler of 1918, matured and isolated master. Perhaps thereby he preserves the consistency of this new version of an early piece.

Nor, as the luck of the day went, did Ravel's novel piece altogether fulfil expectation. It was the first and the shorter of the two suites that he drew for the concert-hall from his celebrated ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe," announced more than once, but never yet mimed and danced in the American theatre—the suite beginning with the miracle of the sculptured nymphs called to life to comfort the shepherd bereft of his mistress, continuing with the mysterious voices, perhaps merely of the quivering night, perhaps also of Pan's distinct train and ending with one of the furious dances of the abducting pirates. The music is all matter drawn from the earlier scenes of the ballet, whereas the second suite, heard at the Symphony Concerts last winter assembles and coördinates excerpts from the later episodes. This second suite had, moreover, symphonic continuity, roundness of impression, integral musical being apart from the mimed action and the scenic backgrounds it illuminated, the dances that it bore.

The first suite, on the other hand, seems, rather, a more or less arbitrary assemblage of detached fragments, yields no unity of impression, bids the mind recall the pale flames that flickered above the heads of the circling nymphs or the red cliffs of Bakst amongst which the red-clad pirates lurched and plunged. Time and again the hearer finds himself summoning his memories of the Rusian Ballet rather than listening to Ravel's music as music. Yet there are moments in it of beauty that melts the heart, of illusion that wraps the imagination, of rhymthic power and flare of tonal color flung full-fisted upon stage and orchestra. The music at the beginning—of the tremors of the night-wind, of the stirrings of the pitying nymphs, of the pale flicker of the flame that crowns them, lambent in the darkness—achieves both intrinsic beauty and penetrating illusion, and by novel means. The much-debated, the much-scorned polyharmonic chords of the "uiche dest" Parisian composer make tremulous, titillating underbody and background, against which dart in pale lines measures for various solo-instruments. As Ravel thereby perfectly achieves his end of beauty and illusion, is he not altogether justified of the means his imagination and resource fashioned and used? Again, the remote, wandering voices of the night invoke the mystery, the vague tremors of the moment in the ballet when a god condescends to comfort the woes of his servants. What then, does it matter, if the intervals seem as though Ravel had splotched them upon his music-paper, if they taxed to the utmost, yesterday, Mr. Townsend's expert choir, gaining none the less the illusion the composer sought. And when faint and far, a single trumpet sounds pale and clear against this murmur, the stroke is of genius itself. Quickly rhythm mounts from power to frenzy in the pirates' dishevelled dance; drunken, yet always in Ravel's masterful hands, the orchestra reels, spits, plunges, suffusing light, the quiver of earth and air and watching human spirit, when night ebbs and day poises as for spring upon a trembling world. At once fanciful and dexterous is the later suggestion by similar and quickly passing means of other sensations of the kindling shimmers of day.

In contrast, the rest of the tone-poem is the opulent and passionate development of a manifestly melodious motive. It is upborne to a climax of ardent apostrophe; it is lifted again to what the composer designs as the splendors of sunrise. At every turn it is enriched harmonically, amplified instrumentally, deepened by modulation, broadened by progression—yet, as it seemed yesterday, with curious lack of Mr. Loeffler's wonted individuality. His motive sings full and strong to his hearers; he uses at will every one of these semi-conventional processes of opulent music-making. His climax, his sunrise follow the best models, but they are of the Loeffler, making his way with the rest of the young composers sixteen years ago rather than of the Loeffler of 1918, matured and isolated master. Perhaps thereby he preserves the consistency of this new version of an early piece.

Nor, as the luck of the day went, did Ravel's novel piece altogether fulfil expectation. It was the first and the shorter of the two suites that he drew for the concert-hall from his celebrated ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe," announced more than once, but never yet mimed and danced in the American theatre—the suite beginning with the miracle of the sculptured nymphs called to life to comfort the shepherd bereft of his mistress, continuing with the mysterious voices, perhaps merely of the quivering night, perhaps also of Pan's distinct train and ending with one of the furious dances of the abducting pirates. The music is all matter drawn from the earlier scenes of the ballet, whereas the second suite, heard at the Symphony Concerts last winter assembles and coördinates excerpts from the later episodes. This second suite had, moreover, symphonic continuity, roundness of impression, integral musical being apart from the mimed action and the scenic backgrounds it illuminated, the dances that it bore.

The first suite, on the other hand, seems, rather, a more or less arbitrary assemblage of detached fragments, yields no unity of impression, bids the mind recall the pale flames that flickered above the heads of the circling nymphs or the red cliffs of Bakst amongst which the red-clad pirates lurched and plunged. Time and again the hearer finds himself summoning his memories of the Rusian Ballet rather than listening to Ravel's music as music. Yet there are moments in it of beauty that melts the heart, of illusion that wraps the imagination, of rhymthic power and flare of tonal color flung full-fisted upon stage and orchestra. The music at the beginning—of the tremors of the night-wind, of the stirrings of the pitying nymphs, of the pale flicker of the flame that crowns them, lambent in the darkness—achieves both intrinsic beauty and penetrating illusion, and by novel means. The much-debated, the much-scorned polyharmonic chords of the "uiche dest" Parisian composer make tremulous, titillating underbody and background, against which dart in pale lines measures for various solo-instruments. As Ravel thereby perfectly achieves his end of beauty and illusion, is he not altogether justified of the means his imagination and resource fashioned and used? Again, the remote, wandering voices of the night invoke the mystery, the vague tremors of the moment in the ballet when a god condescends to comfort the woes of his servants. What then, does it matter, if the intervals seem as though Ravel had splotched them upon his music-paper, if they taxed to the utmost, yesterday, Mr. Townsend's expert choir, gaining none the less the illusion the composer sought. And when faint and far, a single trumpet sounds pale and clear against this murmur, the stroke is of genius itself. Quickly rhythm mounts from power to frenzy in the pirates' dishevelled dance; drunken, yet always in Ravel's masterful hands, the orchestra reels, spits, plunges, flares. So also genius writes and spares not.

The rest of the programme made an agreeable miscellany in which Beethoven's seventh symphony, strangely long unheard "at these concerts"; Franck's tone-poem, "The Daughters of Æolus," at relatively long intervals restored to them; and two operatic airs sung by Miss Easton of the Metropolitan Company were the chief items. Appearing in her own fresh, comely, youthful person, which is not at all that of Chinese maiden of Italian music-drama as Boston knew her last spring, the singer quickly won the eye as she soon pleased the ear of her new audience. Heard in the waiting Countess's soliloquy "Dove Sono i Bei Momenti" from Mozart's lyric comedy of "Figaro's Wedding" and in the musing monologue of the mother from Debussy's cantata of "The Prodigal Son," her voice quickly disclosed a crystalline quality, likening it in measure to that of Mme. Eames in her prime. There is like limpidity, like measured radiance of tone, like hint of cool control, but Miss Easton's voice is at present the warmer, the more susceptible to play of characterizing color. On the other hand, the younger singer's tones thin perceptibly in the higher ranges and "skips" that Mozart exacts, hinting at the metallic hardness that is pitfall to thees crystalline transparent voices. In both airs, Miss Easton proved herself accomplished singer, with sense of the music as music and also as speech of an operatic personage and token of an operatic moment.

Debussy set the easier task, since this "Air of Leah" in the manner of that connoisseur of women, the late Monsieur Massenet, runs in smooth, fluent, songful measures, prettily dappled with tender sentiment. Miss Easton's song was as purling as Debussy's; the neat lights and shades of the music played also in her tones. The listener heard as he might taste the "Floating Island" of domestic desserts. On the other hand, her singing of Mozart's more exacting recitative ("E Susanna non Vien") and air was hardly so successful. The declamation she achieved uncommonly well. The hearer felt the thrill of suspense and scene that dwells in those seemingly simple measures; orchestra and singer sprang into them as at the impulse of a quick-coming emotion. Yet Mr. Monteux and Miss Easton beautifully rounded each phrase. Passing to the air, the singer seemed too straightforward, too literal, thereby missing the light undulation of contour and contents in many a measure. Agreed, moreover, that the piece ends rather ornately, yet even there the melancholy of the Countess, pursuing with many a haunting memory the intrigues of her careless husband, colors the music. There and elsewhere it did not color Miss Easton's tones.

In turn, "The Daughters of Æolus" completed the progress of Bostonian ears, in the short space of a week, through all the degrees of Father Franck—the inspired Franck of the symphony of last week, the commonplace, mediocre Franck of the fragment from "The Redemption" and the Franck betwixt and between, who is doing a good job in his own way as in this tone-poem of the winds. There are chromatic, melodic phrases in the music that float upon the air with the ethereal quality, alike in gossamer substance and in attendant harmonies, that is Franck's unique possession. In tonal substance they are the purest alabaster; in illusion they summon the breezes that were daughters to the wind-god, "the nymphs of winged feet," "the dove-like virgins" about whom in Leconte de Lisle's suggesting poem they play. There are exquisite measures in which these breezes seem to move and murmur from choir to choir of the orchestra in a perfect Franckian speech. Then, the composer, being a conscientious man, and at the time in which he wrote the tone-poem, a man also with his way to make, bethinks himself of the necessities of the concert-room and the music upswells as though Æolus, rather than his daughters, were blowing resounding blast. To hear Debussy's sea-pieces is to resent the occasional boisterousness of the music, true to the ocean bye and large, but not to his particular, personally conducted and colored waves. So with the winds of Franck's tone-poem. They illude most when they whisper in his ears and skim his imagination.

In Beethoven's symphony, as in all the pieces of the day, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, renewed, intensified, amplified the virtues and distinctions already and with one accord, repeated of them in print and by word of mouth. The conductor, surer, after the performance in Cambridge on Thursday, of both his forces and himself, set a yet more flying pace, darting rhythm and exuberant voice for the finale; the orchestra answered like thoroughbreds to the flick of a whip. Yet as the music flashed and tumbled by, there was not a blur upon its outline, a jolt in its progress. Hearty and full-bodied, yet withal in lightness of mood, went the scherzo in the true and characteristic voice of Beethoven in these difficult movements, while as truly sounded the deeper and contrasting hymn of the horn-filled trio. Mr. Monteux's sense of instrumental melody, his ear for shaded and sublimated orchestral song has not stood clearer than in the simple, sincere loveliness, free from every hint of abstruse or wilful manipulation, with which conductor and orchestra clothed the slow movement. From linked measure through linked measure the poetic beauty of the music glowed out of the sensuous beauty of the tone of stringed and wind choirs. As at Cambridge, the evening before, the introduction quivered into the first allegro and playful stars might have danced to its rhythms, half-halted and began anew at its "holds" and transitions. Without an outward qualm sat those in the audience who were sure last spring that only a conductor from "Mittel-Europa" could "really" read a symphonic score. Perhaps, as it surely became them to do, they blushed within. Once and for all, in this symphony of Beethoven, as in all the other pieces of his concerts, hereabouts, Mr. Monteux has answered them. Conductors of distinction are bred in Paris as well as in Berlin or Vienna. They can also fashion orchestras in their own image.

H. T. P.

EVENING SUN

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 25 1919

HERALD NOVEMBER

New Symphony Conductor Is Composer of "Marouf"

Henri Rabaud.

Henri Rabaud, the French conductor and composer, who will wield the baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season (in place of its former leader, Dr. Karl Muck, now interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga.), comes direct from where he was born 53 years ago. He is the son of a professor of the Conservatoire, from which he also was graduated.

Composer of "Marouf"

He comes now from the position of director of the Opera, Paris. At that theatre his lyric opera "Marouf," with text by Lucien Nepoty as based on a tale of the Arabian Nights, was produced in the spring of 1914 and then straightway proved to be one of the most popular novelties of years heard in Paris. Rabaud's "Marouf" was produced with success in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House last season, and his Second Symphony (second at that time at least) was played in the same city at two of the New York Symphony concerts.

M. Rabaud was a leading conductor for seven years at the Grand Opera of Paris, and during the direction at that house of Andre Messager, who is the conductor of the famous French orchestra, the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, which is now visiting this country on a concert tour in behalf of the French American Association for Musical Art.

Style Entirely Modern

As composer Rabaud has further written an opera, "La Fille de Roland," and brought out several years ago at the Opera Comique a string quartet, and various smaller works. He composes in a style entirely modern. In his "Marouf," as W. J. Henderson wrote at the time of its New York premiere, "Oriental color is laid on not merely with a brush but with a pallette knife," while his Second Symphony the same critic pronounced as being "delightful."

TO CONDUCT CONCERT BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX

The popular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, of New York, who is to be "guest" conductor at the November concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sale of subscription seats for the local concerts of this famous organization opens next Monday.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York City

Date

French Conductor Nears Boston.

Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French musician who becomes conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now on the ocean and is expected to arrive during the coming week. He will go at once to Boston, but his activities with the orchestra will not begin until November 11, when he holds his first rehearsal. Owing to the uncertainty of his arrival, arrangements were made with Gatti-Casazza whereby Pierre Monteux could stay with the orchestra through its first Southern trip, and he will therefore conduct the first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on November 7 and 9. The management of the orchestra has been more than gratified with the response to the notice of renewals sent out a fortnight ago to the orchestra's subscribers. To-day the renewals are practically complete. It is evident that Boston's orchestra is in no danger of losing the place it has so long held in the esteem of the New York public. As for the orchestra itself, those who have heard the rehearsals that have been in progress under Monteux say that its tonal quality has never been more beautiful nor its discipline and technical skill more complete. The opening of its season in Boston has been postponed for two weeks, but Mr. Monteux has held rehearsals daily with excellent results. Despite the fact that 25 per cent. of the personnel is new, the orchestra is to-day playing with the same assurance that it has had in past years when changes in the personnel from season to season were insignificant.

n RECORD

ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

e

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert in Philadelphia, on Monday evening, November 4, at the Academy of Music, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, of New York. Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the Orchestra, is now in America, but will not begin his public work until November 11, when the Orchestra returns from its first tour. Monteux has been having distinguished success in Boston.

The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, soprano, who made so profound an impression on the musical public of Philadelphia last spring when she was one of the principal singers at the brief season of opera in the Academy of Music. She will sing the canzona "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and air of Lia, from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor will be played. The other works on the list are Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's variations, entitled "Istar," and Debussy's "Iberia."

TRANSCRIPT NOVEMBER 2

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE COMPOSERS' DAY MORE THAN THE CONDUCTOR'S

A Novel Piece from Mr. Lœffler in His Earlier Manner—More Fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe", with Many a Characteristic Stroke—Franck Again in the Middle Way of a Tone-Poem—Beethoven, Orchestra and Leader in Triple Worth—Miss Easton Sings

WITH a novel piece by Mr. Loeffler and another by Ravel to grace the programme, interest shifted at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon from the quality of the orchestra and the conductor, Mr. Monteux, to the quality of the music in hand. The keener was this interest because Mr. Loeffler is the most individual of present American composers, while Ravel stands in like place among the Parisian. Yet, as the outcome was, Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem seemed rather of the composer who fashioned "The Death of Tintagiles" in 1897 than of the composer who wrote the symphony of 1916. It was early Loeffler, so to say, reproduced at a time when a later Loeffler prompted the anticipating ear. Perhaps, however, this impression was inevitable from a piece revived for reproduction seventeen years after it had been first written. As "Poem for Orchestra: 'Avant que Tu ne t'en Ailles,'" the music heard yesterday was set to paper in 1901 and played at Symphony Concerts of 1902 and 1903. As "La Bonne Chanson," it had been rescored and otherwise altered by Mr. Loeffler for performance yesterday. The subject-matter of the earlier and the later draft is the same, Verlaine's verses, likewise "La Bonne Chanson"—verses that salute the paling star of morning with the images of an unspecked dawn and that underlay the apostrophe with pulsing affection for her who, waking, stirs beside the poet. The form as well as the substance of the poem may readily stir so imaginative and yet so reflective a spirit as the composer's since the summoned images of nature—the call of the quail, the ascent of the lark, the glint of the dew, the final glowing of the sun—are like to festoons about the poet's apostrophe. So may the chief motive and the main body of the music bear the impulse of Verlaine's song, while around it variants of the motive may weave garlands of imagery like to his. Needless, almost, to say that the resulting tone-poem thus keeps pace and mood with the suggesting verses, and also develops itself in sustained and unfolding integrity. Once more, as their abominable way is to the truly orthodox, these so-called "impressionists" are unrelaxing logicians of music, formulating their design, pursuing it, at once pliant and unflinching, to the end.

Now, in the new version of "Avant que Tu ne t' en Ailles," Mr. Loeffler adheres to his original scheme, maintains his developed and dominant motive and little alters the festooning variants he deduces from it. On the other hand, he has entirely rescored the piece, distributing anew harmonies and timbres, modulations and progressions; but by a curious concentration of will and mind, he has effected this bring in the early manner of "The Death of Tintagiles" rather than in the manner of the symphony. That is to, the listener hears the Loeffler of harmonies, piercing progressions, ing modulations and iridescent instrumental color only in the preluding to Bonne Chanson" and here and there tonal imagery of the variants to the motive with hint of sensations from wn. In some ears yesterday, those victory measures surpassed in imagi- and illusion all the rest of the tone- suffusing light, the quiver of earth and air and watching human spirit, when night ebbs and day poises as for spring upon a trembling world. At once fanciful and dexterous is the later suggestion by similar and quickly passing means of other sensations of the kindling shimmers of day.

In contrast, the rest of the tone-poem is the opulent and passionate development of a manifestly melodious motive. It is upborne to a climax of ardent apostrophe; it is lifted again to what the composer designs as the splendors of sunrise. At every turn it is enriched harmonically, amplified instrumentally, deepened by modulation, broadened by progression—yet, as it seemed yesterday, with curious lack of Mr. Loeffler's wonted individuality. His motive sings full and strong to his hearers; he uses at will every one of these semi-conventional processes of opulent music-making. His climax, his sunrise follow the best models, but they are of the Loeffler, making his way with the rest of the young composers sixteen years ago rather than of the Loeffler of 1918, matured and isolated master. Perhaps thereby he preserves the consistency of this new version of an early piece.

Nor, as the luck of the day went, did Ravel's novel piece altogether fulfil expectation. It was the first and the shorter of the two suites that he drew for the concert-hall from his celebrated ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe," announced more than once, but never yet mimed and danced in the American theatre—the suite beginning with the miracle of the sculptured nymphs called to life to comfort the shepherd bereft of his mistress, continuing with the mysterious voices, perhaps merely of the quivering night, perhaps also of Pan's distinct train and ending with one of the furious dances of the abducting pirates. The music is all matter drawn from the earlier scenes of the ballet, whereas the second suite, heard at the Symphony Concerts last winter assembles and coördinates excerpts from the later episodes. This second suite had, moreover, symphonic continuity, roundness of impression, integral musical being apart from the mimed action and the scenic backgrounds it illuminated, the dances that it bore.

The first suite, on the other hand, seems, rather, a more or less arbitrary assemblage of detached fragments, yields no unity of impression, bids the mind recall the pale flames that flickered above the heads of the circling nymphs or the red cliffs of Bakst amongst which the red-clad pirates lurched and plunged. Time and again the hearer finds himself summoning his memories of the Rusian Ballet rather than listening to Ravel's music as music. Yet there are moments in it of beauty that melts the heart, of illusion that wraps the imagination, of rhymthic power and flare of tonal color flung full-fisted upon stage and orchestra. The music at the beginning—of the tremors of the night-wind, of the stirrings of the pitying nymphs, of the pale flicker of the flame that crowns them, lambent in the darkness—achieves both intrinsic beauty and penetrating illusion, and by novel means. The much-debated, the much-scorned polyharmonic chords of the "uiche dest" Parisian composer make tremulous, titillating underbody and background, against which dart in pale lines measures for various solo-instruments. As Ravel thereby perfectly achieves his end of beauty and illusion, is he not altogether justified of the means his imagination and resource fashioned and used? Again, the remote, wandering voices of the night invoke the mystery, the vague tremors of the moment in the ballet when a god condescends to comfort the woes of his servants. What then, does it matter, if the intervals seem as though Ravel had splotched them upon his music-paper, if they taxed to the utmost, yesterday, Mr. Townsend's expert choir, gaining none the less the illusion the composer sought. And when faint and far, a single trumpet sounds pale and clear against this murmur, the stroke is of genius itself. Quickly rhythm mounts from power to frenzy in the pirates' dishevelled dance; drunken, yet always in Ravel's masterful hands, the orchestra reels, spits, plunges, flares. So also genius writes and spares not.

The rest of the programme made an agreeable miscellany in which Beethoven's seventh symphony, strangely long unheard "at these concerts"; Franck's tone-poem, "The Daughters of Æolus," at relatively long intervals restored to them; and two operatic airs sung by Miss Easton of the Metropolitan Company were the chief items. Appearing in her own fresh, comely, youthful person, which is not at all that of Chinese maiden of Italian music-drama as Boston knew her last spring, the singer quickly won the eye as she soon pleased the ear of her new audience. Heard in the waiting Countess's soliloquy "Dove Sono i Bei Momenti" from Mozart's lyric comedy of "Figaro's Wedding" and in the musing monologue of the mother from Debussy's cantata of "The Prodigal Son," her voice quickly disclosed a crystalline quality, likening it in measure to that of Mme. Eames in her prime. There is like limpidity, like measured radiance of tone, like hint of cool control, but Miss Easton's voice is at present the warmer, the more susceptible to play of characterizing color. On the other hand, the younger singer's tones thin perceptibly in the higher ranges and "skips" that Mozart exacts, hinting at the metallic hardness that is pitfall to thees crystalline transparent voices. In both airs, Miss Easton proved herself accomplished singer, with sense of the music as music and also as speech of an operatic personage and token of an operatic moment.

Debussy set the easier task, since this "Air of Leah" in the manner of that connoisseur of women, the late Monsieur Massenet, runs in smooth, fluent, songful measures, prettily dappled with tender sentiment. Miss Easton's song was as purling as Debussy's; the neat lights and shades of the music played also in her tones. The listener heard as he might taste the "Floating Island" of domestic desserts. On the other hand, her singing of Mozart's more exacting recitative ("E Susanna non Vien") and air was hardly so successful. The declamation she achieved uncommonly well. The hearer felt the thrill of suspense and scene that dwells in those seemingly simple measures; orchestra and singer sprang into them as at the impulse of a quick-coming emotion. Yet Mr. Monteux and Miss Easton beautifully rounded each phrase. Passing to the air, the singer seemed too straightforward, too literal, thereby missing the light undulation of contour and contents in many a measure. Agreed, moreover, that the piece ends rather ornately, yet even there the melancholy of the Countess, pursuing with many a haunting memory the intrigues of her careless husband, colors the music. There and elsewhere it did not color Miss Easton's tones.

In turn, "The Daughters of Æolus" completed the progress of Bostonian ears, in the short space of a week, through all the degrees of Father Franck—the inspired Franck of the symphony of last week, the commonplace, mediocre Franck of the fragment from "The Redemption" and the Franck betwixt and between, who is doing a good job in his own way as in this tone-poem of the winds. There are chromatic, melodic phrases in the music that float upon the air with the ethereal quality, alike in gossamer substance and in attendant harmonies, that is Franck's unique possession. In tonal substance they are the purest alabaster; in illusion they summon the breezes that were daughters to the wind-god, "the nymphs of winged feet," "the dove-like virgins" about whom in Leconte de Lisle's suggesting poem they play. There are exquisite measures in which these breezes seem to move and murmur from choir to choir of the orchestra in a perfect Franckian speech. Then, the composer, being a conscientious man, and at the time in which he wrote the tone-poem, a man also with his way to make, bethinks himself of the necessities of the concert-room and the music upswells as though Æolus, rather than his daughters, were blowing resounding blast. To hear Debussy's sea-pieces is to resent the occasional boisterousness of the music, true to the ocean bye and large, but not to his particular, personally conducted and colored waves. So with the winds of Franck's tone-poem. They illude most when they whisper in his ears and skim his imagination.

In Beethoven's symphony, as in all the pieces of the day, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, renewed, intensified, amplified the virtues and distinctions already and with one accord, repeated of them in print and by word of mouth. The conductor, surer, after the performance in Cambridge on Thursday, of both his forces and himself, set a yet more flying pace, darting rhythm and exuberant voice for the finale; the orchestra answered like thoroughbreds to the flick of a whip. Yet as the music flashed and tumbled by, there was not a blur upon its outline, a jolt in its progress. Hearty and full-bodied, yet withal in lightness of mood, went the scherzo in the true and characteristic voice of Beethoven in these difficult movements, while as truly sounded the deeper and contrasting hymn of the horn-filled trio. Mr. Monteux's sense of instrumental melody, his ear for shaded and sublimated orchestral song has not stood clearer than in the simple, sincere loveliness, free from every hint of abstruse or wilful manipulation, with which conductor and orchestra clothed the slow movement. From linked measure through linked measure the poetic beauty of the music glowed out of the sensuous beauty of the tone of stringed and wind choirs. As at Cambridge, the evening before, the introduction quivered into the first allegro and playful stars might have danced to its rhythms, half-halted and began anew at its "holds" and transitions. Without an outward qualm sat those in the audience who were sure last spring that only a conductor from "Mittel-Europa" could "really" read a symphonic score. Perhaps, as it surely became them to do, they blushed within. Once and for all, in this symphony of Beethoven, as in all the other pieces of his concerts, hereabouts, Mr. Monteux has answered them. Conductors of distinction are bred in Paris as well as in Berlin or Vienna. They can also fashion orchestras in their own image.

H. T. P.

HERALD NOVEMBER

New Symphony Conductor Is Composer of "Marouf"

Henri Rabaud.

Henri Rabaud, the French conductor and composer, who will wield the baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season (in place of its former leader, Dr. Karl Muck, now interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga.), comes direct from where he was born 53 years ago. He is the son of a professor of the Conservatoire, from which he also was graduated.

Composer of "Marouf"

He comes now from the position of director of the Opera, Paris. At that theatre his lyric opera "Marouf," with text by Lucien Nepoty as based on a tale of the Arabian Nights, was produced in the spring of 1914 and then straightway proved to be one of the most popular novelties of years heard in Paris. Rabaud's "Marouf" was produced with success in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House last season, and his Second Symphony (second at that time at least) was played in the same city at two of the New York Symphony concerts.

M. Rabaud was a leading conductor for seven years at the Grand Opera of Paris, and during the direction at that house of Andre Messager, who is the conductor of the famous French orchestra, the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, which is now visiting this country on a concert tour in behalf of the French American Association for Musical Art.

Style Entirely Modern

As composer Rabaud has further written an opera, "La Fille de Roland," and brought out several years ago at the Opera Comique a string quartet, and various smaller works. He composes in a style entirely modern. In his "Marouf," as W. J. Henderson wrote at the time of its New York premiere, "Oriental color is laid on not merely with a brush but with a pallette knife," while his Second Symphony the same critic pronounced as being "delightful."

EVENING SUN

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 25 1919

TO CONDUCT CONCERT BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX

The popular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, of New York, who is to be "guest" conductor at the November concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sale of subscription seats for the local concerts of this famous organization opens next Monday.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York City

Date

French Conductor Nears Boston.

Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French musician who becomes conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now on the ocean and is expected to arrive during the coming week. He will go at once to Boston, but his activities with the orchestra will not begin until November 11, when he holds his first rehearsal. Owing to the uncertainty of his arrival, arrangements were made with Gatti-Casazza whereby Pierre Monteux could stay with the orchestra through its first Southern trip, and he will therefore conduct the first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on November 7 and 9. The management of the orchestra has been more than gratified with the response to the notice of renewals sent out a fortnight ago to the orchestra's subscribers. To-day the renewals are practically complete. It is evident that Boston's orchestra is in no danger of losing the place it has so long held in the esteem of the New York public. As for the orchestra itself, those who have heard the rehearsals that have been in progress under Monteux say that its tonal quality has never been more beautiful nor its discipline and technical skill more complete. The opening of its season in Boston has been postponed for two weeks, but Mr. Monteux has held rehearsals daily with excellent results. Despite the fact that 25 per cent. of the personnel is new, the orchestra is to-day playing with the same assurance that it has had in past years when changes in the personnel from season to season were insignificant.

n RECORD

dress: Philadelphia, Pa.

e

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert in Philadelphia, on Monday evening, November 4, at the Academy of Music, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, of New York. Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the Orchestra, is now in America, but will not begin his public work until November 11, when the Orchestra returns from its first tour. Monteux has been having distinguished success in Boston.

The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, soprano, who made so profound an impression on the musical public of Philadelphia last spring when she was one of the principal singers at the brief season of opera in the Academy of Music. She will sing the canzona "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and air of Lia, from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor will be played. The other works on the list are Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's variations, entitled "Istar," and Debussy's "Iberia."

34

SUN

ss: Baltimore, Md.

OCT 29 1918

THE THREE ARTS

MUSIC DRAMA PAINTING

WHEN the Boston Symphony plays here for the first time this season, Wednesday evening, November 6, the newly organized orchestra will be directed by Pierre Monteux, a "guest" conductor. He is an interesting figure in the musical world. Born in Paris in 1875 he eventually became a student at the Conservatoire, where he studied solfeggio and harmony with Lavignac, counterpoint with Lenepveu and violin with Berthelier. Originally he intended to become a concert violinist and as such he made his public debut in Paris in 1894 with a string quartet. But he had become so fascinated by the many interesting features of conducting that he soon decided to make conducting his life work. His first experience as an interpreter of important works was gained with the Concerts Colonne, the famous French organization with which he was associated until 1911. In that year he was engaged as the conductor of the Ballet Russe, with which he made four tours of the European capitals. Meanwhile he gave a series of concerts in the Paris Casino, where he presented programs that consisted almost entirely of the most ultra-modern compositions.

It is not alone in the concert hall and as conductor of ballets that M. Monteux developed intellectually and musically. During the season of 1913-1914 he was conductor at the Paris Opera and also at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the Chatelet and the Odeon, at Covent Garden and the Drury Lane, in London, and at the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest. He made his American debut as a conductor with the Ballet Russe during that organization's second season in this country and when the Metropolitan Opera decided a year ago to extend its French repertory Monteux was engaged as the principal French conductor, a post which he held with distinction during the season of 1917-1918. He it was who conducted two of the most remarkable successes of that year—Rabaud's "Marouf" and the Rimsky-Korsakoff surprise opera, "Le Coq d'Or."

During the summer of 1917, when a number of enthusiasts made possible a series of concerts at the St. Nicholas Rink, in New York, the orchestra was placed under the leadership of M. Monteux.

Having a decided preference for modern and what are spoken of as "ultra-modern" works, his name is associated with the productions of the Stravinsky ballets, "Petrouchka," and "Le Sacre de Printempts"; the same composer's "Le Rossignol"; Debussy's "Jeux" and "Gigues"; Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," and "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and "Le Joli Jeu du Foret" of Roger-Ducasse, all tremendously discussed works that are practically unknown, except through literary channels, in Baltimore.

Pierre Monteux is said to be the most quiet and unassuming person imaginable, an artist who heartily dislikes to talk of his work or of his own career. He insists that his private life does not concern the public. He married Germaine Benedictus in Paris, in 1910. The pair spent the past summer near Stamford, Conn.

Later I shall have something to tell you of Henri Rabaud, the "regular" conductor of the Boston Orchestra, who is also a distinguished Parisian musician and who assumes the baton at the second concert of the season, which will take place at the Lyric in December.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa.

ess

There seems to be no question now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be able to give its first concert in Philadelphia on the date scheduled—a week from tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 4. It will be given as usual in the Academy of Music. Despite the prevailing epidemic, the renewal of subscriptions and the sale of season tickets to new subscribers, which have been in progress for the last three weeks, have been most gratifying. The orchestra comes from Boston for this first concert under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, of New York. Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, is now in America, but will not take hold of his work until November 11, when the orchestra returns from its first tour. Mr. Monteux has been having distinguished success in Boston and the orchestra is considered to be even of finer quality than it has ever been in the past.

The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, the English soprano who made so profound an impression on the musical public of Philadelphia last spring when she was one of the principal singers at the brief season of grand opera given in the Academy of Music. Madame Easton is a most valuable addition to the musical life in this country, and as she is the wife of an American she can be counted a permanent resident of the United States. She will sign twice. Her first number will be the canzona "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

Mr. Monteux has arranged a most interesting list of works for the orchestra. Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, one of the noblest contributions of contemporary music, will be the first and longest number. The other works to be played will be Schumann's "Man-ctor ouf"

ling conductor rand Opera of rection at that r, who is the French orcheserts du Conser-iting this coun-behalf of the ation for Musi-

Modern
as further writ-de Roland," and ars ago at the quartet and va-e composes in a n his "Marouf," e at the time of Oriental color
ith a brush but hile his Second c pronounced as

RECORD

s Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 20 1918

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HAS FIVE CONCERTS

Seat Sale for Series That Will Present List of Notable Soloists.

HEIFETZ WITH DAMROSCH

New York Symphony's Season. Philadelphia Orchestra's Further Delayed Opening.

—The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming season will open tomorrow at Heppe's, No. 1119 Chestnut street. The concerts will be given as usual in the Academy of Music, and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening.

Philadelphia, since 1886, has been one of the most loyal supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There has been an extensive reorganization since last spring and about 25 per cent. of the personnel is new. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians. Rehearsals have been in progress now in Boston for three weeks. Influenza compelled the postponement of the Boston season for two weeks, but rehearsals were held daily under the direction of Pierre Monteux. That distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company will conduct the November concert, as the arrival of Rabaud, the new French conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare the program for this trip. Rabaud is expected to arrive in America the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts.

Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropoli tan Opera Company; Melba, Frederic Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Miss Easton is already a favorite in this city through her appearance here i various opera companies, including th Metropolitan. Frederic Fradkin is th new concertmaster of the Orchestra. A native of Troy, New York, a first priz of the Paris Conservatoire, he returne to this country after experience abroa as concertmaster of the orchestra o ganized to travel with the Ballet Russ All accounts have it that he is a vi linist of unusual qualities, the possess of a tone of singular beauty, of technique that is complete in every r spect, and of refinement and elegance style. Rubinstein, the Russian piani as a youth of 19 made a short tour this country in 1905-1906. Most of h time has been spent in France, En and and Spain, where he is acount one of the giants of his art. For t past summer he has been playing South America.

FLORENCE EASTON.

SUN

New York City.

OCT 20 1918

Henri Rabaud, the distinguished Frenc musician, who becomes conductor of th Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now o the ocean and is expected to arrive dur ing the coming week. He will go at onc to Boston, but his activities with th orchestra will not begin until November 11, when he holds his first rehearsal. Owing to the uncertainty of his arrival, arrangements were made with Mr. Gatti-Casazza whereby Pierre Monteux could stay with the orchestra through its first Southern trip, and he will therefore conduct the first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on November 7 and 9.

m RECORD

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

te

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives every year in Boston a series of Sunday concerts that are the delight of crowds who cannot attend these given on week-days. Important soloists like Hofmann, Galli-Curci, Heifetz, etc., have been engaged for the coming season. ew York, 1884

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 20 1918

Prominent Boston Symphony Soloists

MADAME MELBA

FLORENCE EASTON

Of the four soloists to be heard here this Winter, two of them are well-known sopranos, Miss Florence Easton and Mme. Nellie Melba.

The general public sales of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming season will open tomorrow morning, October 21, at George T. Haly's ticket office, 1119 Chestnut Street. The concerts will be given as usual in the Academy of Music, and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

Philadelphia, since 1886, has been one of the most loyal supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it will be good news to those who have been going to the concerts for so many years to know that the orchestra will return here in better condition than it has ever been. There has been an extensive reorganization since last Spring and about 25 per cent. of the personnel is new. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians, and rehearsals, which have been in progress now in Boston for three weeks, show that the tonal quality of orchestra has never been more beautiful in the past than it is now, and that its discipline and technical skill have never been higher. The prevailing influenza compelled the postponement of the Boston season for two weeks, but rehearsals were held daily under the direction of Pierre Monteux, and vast progress has been made.

As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert, as the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare the program for this trip. Mr. Rabaud is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts.

Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Frederic Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is already a favorite in this city through her appearances here in various opera companies, including the Metropolitan. Madame Melba was announced to appear last season at the December concert, but owing to the ruling regarding enemy aliens this concert had to be abandoned, and it was impossible for her to appear in any of the remaining three. Therefore the management, wishing to keep faith with its Philadelphia subscribers, will have her appear this year.

The two other artists, like Madame Easton, are practically newcomers so far as concert work is concerned. Fredric Fradkin is the new concertmaster of the orchestra. A native of Troy, New York, a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, he returned to this country after experience abroad, as concertmaster of the orchestra organized to travel with the Ballet Russe.

Much interest is attached to the coming of Arthur Rubinstein, the Russian pianist. As a youth of nineteen, Mr. Rubinstein made a short tour in this country, this being in the Winter of 1905-06. He made an impression then; since that time, however, he has grown greatly. Most of his time has been spent in France, England and Spain, where he is accounted one of the giants of his art. For the past Summer he has been playing with extraordinary success in South America.

Renewal of subscriptions, which has been in progress for the last fortnight, has been most gratifying from every point of view.

• • •

The Board of Health has advised the Philadelphia Orchestra Association that its regular concert season, which was postponed from October 18-19 to October 25-26, cannot begin until November 1-2. Patrons who hold season tickets for the orchestral concerts should use their several tickets on the dates for which they are issued. The tickets for the first and second pairs will be good for other dates, which will be announced in due time. Announcement concerning the program and soloist for the concerts on November 1-2 will be made in the Sunday papers preceding.

GLOBE NOVEMBER 3

Monteux Conducts on Tour

There will be no Symphony concerts the coming week, as the orchestra will be away on its first Southern trip. The usual schedule of concerts will be given, Monday night in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday night in Baltimore, Thursday night in New York, Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon in New York. At all of these concerts Mr Monteux will conduct. He will end his connection with the orchestra next Saturday after the matinee concert in New York, and will then resume his work at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he will have charge of the French opera during the coming season.

In all the cities except New York the soloist will be Florence Easton, who will sing the same numbers that she has just sung at our own Symphony concerts here. The program will be made of works which Mr Monteux has performed in Boston, except the D major Concerto Grosso of Handel for strings alone, which will be played in Washington, Baltimore and at the afternoon concert in New York, and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations, which will be played in Brooklyn. At all the concerts except the matinee concert in New York the symphony will be Franck's in D minor, and at this concert in New York Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be played. Mr Rabaud, who is to remain in Boston while the orchestra is away, will have his first meeting with his men at the rehearsal called for 10 o'clock Monday morning, Nov 11.

From

Address New York City

Date

OCT 19 1918

Music

A French Conductor for Boston

WHEN Major Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1881, he decided to spare no expense in making it as good as possible. Most of the violinists were secured in Vienna, while for his players of wood-wind instruments he went to France, which had long been famed for its flutists, clarinetists, oboeists, and bassoonists. The successive conductors—Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler, and Muck—came from Germany and Austria-Hungary. In view of the fact that these two countries have produced more first-class orchestral compositions than all other lands put together, it cannot, perhaps, be said that German music was unduly favored on the programmes of this organization. Most of the conductors named were fairly in sympathy with the spirit of French music, too. Nevertheless, one could not but wonder what the result would be if, in place of a Teuton or a Magyar, the Boston Orchestra had, in addition to its wood-winds, a chef d'orchestre from Paris.

This curiosity is to be gratified during the present season. Two Frenchmen have been engaged, Pierre Monteux for October and Henri Rabaud for the remaining concerts, not only in Boston, but for those given on tour in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, which last-named city is now again open to this organization. The orchestra has been unionized, and of the new members as many as possible were recruited in France. Judges who have attended rehearsals think the ensemble will soon be as good as ever.

Except in Boston, Pierre Monteux will not be heard at the head of the Boston Orchestra. His duties as conductor of the French operas at the Metropolitan Opera House prevent his acceptance of the post in Boston for more than a month. Nor is the conductorship of M. Rabaud to last longer than a year, for it is reported from Boston that Arturo Toscanini is to succeed him next year. He had promised to conduct "Nero," the posthumous opera of the late Arrigo Boïto, in Rome, which prevents him from coming to Boston now. In Italy this temperamental wielder of the baton is esteemed equally in concert hall and opera house. On this side of the Atlantic he still has to win his spurs as a purely orchestral conductor.

It by no means follows that because Boston's two new conductors are patriotic Frenchmen they will eschew all German music. M. Monteux has announced that he will have none of Richard Strauss or even of Richard Wagner, because of his foolish farce on the subject of the capitulation of Paris in 1871. But the older masters are not to be boycotted. M. Rabaud's intentions are not yet made known at this writing, but it is a safe surmise that he will not punish such innocent masters as Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven for the crimes of the present day. At the same time one cannot but hope that he will give certain overworked Teutonic symphonies and overtures a well-earned rest, substituting for them neglected masterworks of France and other countries. There are plenty of these, and it will be a delight to hear those that come from Paris interpreted in the true Gallic fashion. It is one of the paradoxes of music that only a Frenchman can quite reproduce the exact spirit and esprit of French music, whereas the best interpreters of German orchestral and operatic music have usually been Hungarians.

Between Bizet, Gounod, Berlioz, Debussy, Dukas, and Ravel there is a wide divergence of styles which will test the versatility of M. Rabaud. While he is best known as an operatic composer, he is far from being without experience as a conductor. It is almost superfluous to say that he is a product of the Paris Conservatoire, and, like nearly all prominent French composers, a winner of the Prix de Rome. Among his teachers was Massenet, from whom he acquired the knack of scoring an opera fluently. Of his three best-known operas, "La fille de Roland" (1904), "Le premier Glaive" (1908), and "Marouf" (1914), only the last is known in this country. It was produced at the Metropolitan with considerable success. For several years he has served as one of the conductors of the Paris Grand Opera. In appearance as well as in his music he is thoroughly French, and in the present temper of the public is sure of a cordial welcome.

HENRY T. FINCK

SUN
ss: Baltimore, Md. NOV 10 1918

THE THREE ARTS

MUSIC DRAMA PAINTING

WHEN the Boston Symphony plays here for the first time this season, Wednesday evening, November 6, the newly organized orchestra will be directed by Pierre Monteux, a "guest" conductor. He is an interesting figure in the musical world. Born in Paris in 1875 he eventually became a student at the Conservatoire, where he studied solfeggio and harmony with Lavignac, counterpoint with Lenepveu and violin with Berthelier. Originally he intended to become a concert violinist and as such he made his public debut in Paris in 1894 with a string quartet. But he had become so fascinated by the many interesting features of conducting that he soon decided to make conducting his life work. His first experience as an interpreter of important works was gained with the Concerts Colonne, the famous French organization with which he was associated until 1911. In that year he was engaged as the conductor of the Ballet Russe, with which he made four tours of the European capitals. Meanwhile he gave a series of concerts in the Paris Casino, where he presented programs that consisted almost entirely of the most ultra-modern compositions.

It is not alone in the concert hall and as conductor of ballets that M. Monteux developed intellectually and musically. During the season of 1913-1914 he was conductor at the Paris Opera and also at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the Chatelet and the Odeon, at Covent Garden and the Drury Lane, in London, and at the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest. He made his American debut as a conductor with the Ballet Russe during that organization's second season in this country and when the Metropolitan Opera decided a year ago to extend its French repertory Monteux was engaged as the principal French conductor, a post which he held with distinction during the season of 1917-1918. He it was who conducted two of the most remarkable successes of that year—Rabaud's "Marouf" and the Rimsky-Korsakoff surprise opera, "Le Coq d'Or."

During the summer of 1917, when a number of enthusiasts made possible a series of concerts at the St. Nicholas Rink, in New York, the orchestra was placed under the leadership of M. Monteux.

Having a decided preference for modern and what are spoken of as "ultra-modern" works, his name is associated with the productions of the Stravinsky ballets, "Petrouchka," and "Le Sacre de Printempts"; the same composer's "Le Rossignol"; Debussy's "Jeux" and "Gigues"; Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," and "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales" and "Le Joli Jeu du Foret" of Roger-Ducasse, all tremendously discussed works that are practically unknown, except through literary channels, in Baltimore.

Pierre Monteux is said to be the most quiet and unassuming person imaginable, an artist who heartily dislikes to talk of his work or of his own career. He insists that his private life does not concern the public. He married Germaine Benedictus in Paris, in 1910. The pair spent the past summer near Stamford, Conn.

Later I shall have something to tell you of Henri Rabaud, the "regular" conductor of the Boston Orchestra, who is also a distinguished Parisian musician and who assumes the baton at the second concert of the season, which will take place at the Lyric in December.

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

There seems to be no question now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be able to give its first concert in Philadelphia on the date scheduled—a week from tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 4. It will be given as usual in the Academy of Music. Despite the prevailing epidemic, the renewal of subscriptions and the sale of season tickets to new subscribers, which have been in progress for the last three weeks, have been most gratifying. The orchestra comes from Boston for this first concert under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, of New York. Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, is now in America, but will not take hold of his work until November 11, when the orchestra returns from its first tour. Mr. Monteux has been having distinguished success in Boston and the orchestra is considered to be even of finer quality than it has ever been in the past.

The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, the English soprano who made so profound an impression on the musical public of Philadelphia last spring when she was one of the principal singers at the brief season of grand opera given in the Academy of Music. Madame Easton is a most valuable addition to the musical life in this country, and as she is the wife of an American she can be counted a permanent resident of the United States. She will sign twice. Her first number will be the canzona "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

Mr. Monteux has arranged a most interesting list of works for the orchestra. Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, one of the noblest contributions of contemporary music, will be the first and longest number. The other works to be played will be Schumann's "Man-

RECORD
s Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 20 1918

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HAS FIVE CONCERTS

Seat Sale for Series That Will Present List of Notable Soloists.

HEIFETZ WITH DAMROSCH

New York Symphony's Season. Philadelphia Orchestra's Further Delayed Opening.

—The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming season will open tomorrow at Heppe's, No. 1119 Chestnut street. The concerts will be given as usual in the Academy of Music, and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening.

Philadelphia, since 1886, has been one of the most loyal supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There has been an extensive reorganization since last spring and about 25 per cent. of the personnel is new. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians. Rehearsals have been in progress now in Boston for three weeks. Influenza compelled the postponement of the Boston season for two weeks, but rehearsals were held daily under the direction of Pierre Monteux. That distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company will conduct the November concert, as the arrival of Rabaud, the new French conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare the program for this trip. Rabaud is expected to arrive in America the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts.

Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Melba, Frederic Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Miss Easton is already a favorite in this city through her appearance here in various opera companies, including the Metropolitan. Frederic Fradkin is the new concertmaster of the Orchestra. A native of Troy, New York, a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, he returned to this country after experience abroad as concertmaster of the orchestra organized to travel with the Ballet Russe. All accounts have it that he is a violinist of unusual qualities, the possessor of a tone of singular beauty, of technique that is complete in every respect, and of refinement and elegance of style. Rubinstein, the Russian pianist, as a youth of 19 made a short tour of this country in 1905-1906. Most of his time has been spent in France, England and Spain, where he is acounted one of the giants of his art. For the past summer he has been playing in South America.

FLORENCE EASTON.

SUN
New York City.
OCT 20 1918

Henri Rabaud, the distinguished French musician, who becomes conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now on the ocean and is expected to arrive during the coming week. He will go at once to Boston, but his activities with the orchestra will not begin until November 11, when he holds his first rehearsal. Owing to the uncertainty of his arrival, arrangements were made with Mr. Gatti-Casazza whereby Pierre Monteux could stay with the orchestra through its first Southern trip, and he will therefore conduct the first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on November 7 and 9.

m RECORD
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te NOV 7 1918

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives every year in Boston a series of Sunday concerts that are the delight of crowds who cannot attend those given on week-days. Important soloists like Hofmann, Galli-Curci, Heifetz, etc., have been engaged for the coming season. New York, 1884

34

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 20 1918

Prominent Boston Symphony Soloists

MADAME MELBA FLORENCE EASTON

Of the four soloists to be heard here this Winter, two of them are well-known sopranos, Miss Florence Easton and Mme. Nellie Melba.

The general public sales of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming season will open tomorrow morning, October 21, at George T. Haly's ticket office, 1119 Chestnut Street. The concerts will be given as usual in the Academy of Music, and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

Philadelphia, since 1886, has been one of the most loyal supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it will be good news to those who have been going to the concerts for so many years to know that the orchestra will return here in better condition than it has ever been. There has been an extensive reorganization since last Spring and about 25 per cent. of the personnel is new. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians, and rehearsals, which have been in progress now in Boston for three weeks, show that the tonal quality of orchestra has never been more beautiful in the past than it is now, and that its discipline and technical skill have never been higher. The prevailing influenza compelled the postponement of the Boston season for two weeks, but rehearsals were held daily under the direction of Pierre Monteux, and vast progress has been made.

As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert, as the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare the program for this trip. Mr. Rabaud is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts.

Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Frederic Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is already a favorite in this city through her appearances here in various opera companies, including the Metropolitan. Madame Melba was announced to appear last season at the December concert, but owing to the ruling regarding enemy aliens this concert had to be abandoned, and it was impossible for her to appear in any of the remaining three. Therefore the management, wishing to keep faith with its Philadelphia subscribers, will have her appear this year.

The two other artists, like Madame Easton, are practically newcomers so far as concert work is concerned. Fredric Fradkin is the new concertmaster of the orchestra. A native of Troy, New York, a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, he returned to this country after experience abroad, as concertmaster of the orchestra organized to travel with the Ballet Russe.

Much interest is attached to the coming of Arthur Rubinstein, the Russian pianist. As a youth of nineteen, Mr. Rubinstein made a short tour in this country, this being in the Winter of 1905-06. He made an impression then; since that time, however, he has grown greatly. Most of his time has been spent in France, England and Spain, where he is accounted one of the giants of his art. For the past Summer he has been playing with extraordinary success in South America.

Renewal of subscriptions, which has been in progress for the last fortnight, has been most gratifying from every point of view.

* * *

The Board of Health has advised the Philadelphia Orchestra Association that its regular concert season, which was postponed from October 18-19 to October 25-26, cannot begin until November 1-2. Patrons who hold season tickets for the orchestral concerts should use their several tickets on the dates for which they are issued. The tickets for the first and second pairs will be good for other dates, which will be announced in due time. Announcement concerning the program and soloist for the concerts on November 1-2 will be made in the Sunday papers preceding.

GLOBE - NOVEMBER 3

Monteux Conducts on Tour

There will be no Symphony concerts the coming week, as the orchestra will be away on its first Southern trip. The usual schedule of concerts will be given, Monday night in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday night in Baltimore, Thursday night in New York, Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon in New York. At all of these concerts Mr Monteux will conduct. He will end his connection with the orchestra next Saturday after the matinee concert in New York, and will then resume his work at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he will have charge of the French opera during the coming season.

In all the cities except New York the soloist will be Florence Easton, who will sing the same numbers that she has just sung at our own Symphony concerts here. The program will be made of works which Mr Monteux has performed in Boston, except the D major Concerto Grosso of Handel for strings alone, which will be played in Washington, Baltimore and at the afternoon concert in New York, and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations, which will be played in Brooklyn. At all the concerts except the matinee concert in New York the symphony will be Franck's in D minor, and at this concert in New York Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be played. Mr Rabaud, who is to remain in Boston while the orchestra is away, will have his first meeting with his men at the rehearsal called for 10 o'clock Monday morning, Nov 11.

From

Address New York City

Date

Music

A French Conductor for Boston

WHEN Major Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1881, he decided to spare no expense in making it as good as possible. Most of the violinists were secured in Vienna, while for his players of wood-wind instruments he went to France, which had long been famed for its flutists, clarinetists, oboeists, and bassoonists. The successive conductors—Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler, and Muck—came from Germany and Austria-Hungary. In view of the fact that these two countries have produced more first-class orchestral compositions than all other lands put together, it cannot, perhaps, be said that German music was unduly favored on the programmes of this organization. Most of the conductors named were fairly in sympathy with the spirit of French music, too. Nevertheless, one could not but wonder what the result would be if, in place of a Teuton or a Magyar, the Boston Orchestra had, in addition to its wood-winds, a chef d'orchestre from Paris.

This curiosity is to be gratified during the present season. Two Frenchmen have been engaged, Pierre Monteux for October and Henri Rabaud for the remaining concerts, not only in Boston, but for those given on tour in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, which last-named city is now again open to this organization. The orchestra has been unionized, and of the new members as many as possible were recruited in France. Judges who have attended rehearsals think the ensemble will soon be as good as ever.

Except in Boston, Pierre Monteux will not be heard at the head of the Boston Orchestra. His duties as conductor of the French operas at the Metropolitan Opera House prevent his acceptance of the post in Boston for more than a month. Nor is the conductorship of M. Rabaud to last longer than a year, for it is reported from Boston that Arturo Toscanini is to succeed him next year. He had promised to conduct "Nero," the posthumous opera of the late Arrigo Boïto, in Rome, which prevents him from coming to Boston now. In Italy this temperamental wielder of the baton is esteemed equally in concert hall and opera house. On this side of the Atlantic he still has to win his spurs as a purely orchestral conductor.

It by no means follows that because Boston's two new conductors are patriotic Frenchmen they will eschew all German music. M. Monteux has announced that he will have none of Richard Strauss or even of Richard Wagner, because of his foolish farce on the subject of the capitulation of Paris in 1871. But the older masters are not to be boycotted. M. Rabaud's intentions are not yet made known at this writing, but it is a safe surmise that he will not punish such innocent masters as Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven for the crimes of the present day. At the same time one cannot but hope that he will give certain overworked Teutonic symphonies and overtures a well-earned rest, substituting for them neglected masterworks of France and other countries. There are plenty of these, and it will be a delight to hear those that come from Paris interpreted in the true Gallic fashion. It is one of the paradoxes of music that only a Frenchman can quite reproduce the exact spirit and esprit of French music, whereas the best interpreters of German orchestral and operatic music have usually been Hungarians.

Between Bizet, Gounod, Berlioz, Debussy, Dukas, and Ravel there is a wide divergence of styles which will test the versatility of M. Rabaud. While he is best known as an operatic composer, he is far from being without experience as a conductor. It is almost superfluous to say that he is a product of the Paris Conservatoire, and, like nearly all prominent French composers, a winner of the Prix de Rome. Among his teachers was Massenet, from whom he acquired the knack of scoring an opera fluently. Of his three best-known operas, "La fille de Roland" (1904), "Le premier Glaive" (1908), and "Marouf" (1914), only the last is known in this country. It was produced at the Metropolitan with considerable success. For several years he has served as one of the conductors of the Paris Grand Opera. In appearance as well as in his music he is thoroughly French, and in the present temper of the public is sure of a cordial welcome.

HENRY T. FINCK

INFORMATION OBSCURED

n RECORD
dress Philadelphia, Pa. 35
OCT 16 1918

THE DOMINANT FRENCH OF THE TRIUMPH YEAR

Voila! Say Wind Band, Orchestra, Composer, Conductor and Singers.

AND WE SAY "WELCOME!"

Rapprochement With the Latins an Engaging Note of Present Season.

WELL, at last the riddle of the Boston Symphony conductorship has been solved; and Henri Rabaud is the answer. Many names have been winnowed over in that famous guessing match of the past six months. A number of Frenchmen were mentioned. But in the grand parade past our eyes when the news reports came thickest, scarcely did the Rabaud colors ever have a sinkle call!

Now it is all right, and we are pleased as Punch. We do not like to have to forbid ourselves the pleasure of hearing the Boston Orchestra. Last season that was the only available course with a good many of us, and it went hard. Perhaps this winter, with the French composer-conductor officiating at the stand, we shall be able to make a little of the lost pleasure up.

Gallic Flavor Galore.

The strong general French tone that music will have in our country this winter is very interesting. For once, the Gauls will surely have their chance at us. First there was the superb martial band, La Musique Militaire Francaise. Then, only last night, the orchestra which we know as the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire played its opening program at the Metropolitan in New York. French opera, both new and old, will flourish glitteringly wherever opera is heard on our various stages. And, in addition to a conductor for the Boston Symphony direct from the Paris Opera, even the temporary conductorship of that orchestra will be filled by a Frenchman, Monteux. This, of course, is by no means the whole case for France in our American musical life of this winter. It is merely the few high lights. Undoubtedly the works of many French composers will figure largely on the orchestral, choral and song programs all over the country.

Rapprochement Internationale.

Italy, too, will naturally have her share. The three little Puccini operas in themselves are bound to make a fine stir. Bodansky, the Metropolitan conductor who went across and got these three scores from Puccini, tells with gusto how he introduced our Broadway classic "Over There" to the favorite Italian composer. And now Puccini is one of Georgie Cohan's most devoted! Truly, the rapprochement between the Mediterranean countries does grow apace.

It is bad news that our own opening pair of concerts had to be set back a week because of the widespread sickness. However, such things have to be taken up in the big broad balance-sheet of our living. Boys are daily giving up their hardy and cherished young lives for an ideal in Europe; so we ought to be able to worry along here with a concert or so the less.

E. H.

AMERICAN
ess: Baltimore, Md.
OCT 27

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater a week from next Wednesday evening, November 6. The return of this famous band will be warmly welcomed by the music lovers of Baltimore. Reports from Boston show that the reorganization made necessary by war conditions has involved no sacrifice in the efficiency of the Orchestra.

This first concert will have as conductor Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Mr. Monteux is one of the most distinguished of contemporary French conductors, and he was specially engaged, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra up to November 11, at which time Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, will take hold. Mr. Rabaud has just reached this country and is in Boston preparing his programs for the season.

The first concert of the season promises much pleasure. The soloist will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who has made such a profound impression in New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. A remarkable singer, a most excellent musician, and the possessor of a most attractive personality, Madame Easton is a valuable addition to the musical forces of this country. She will sing twice, her first number being the canzona Dove Solo from Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro, and her second, the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's The Prodigal Son. The symphony of the evening will be Franck's in D minor, one of the noblest works of contemporary music.

Eagle
OCT 27 1918 Brooklyn, N. Y.

COMING BROOKLYN EVENTS

Boston Smyphony's First Program—Gabrilowitsch With New York Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its concerts in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 8, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

There is every reason for the supporters of the orchestra to be gratified with the renewal of subscriptions and the sale to new subscribers which have been in progress for the past few weeks. The patronage promises to be as large this year as it ever has been in the past. It will also be good news to the patrons of the orchestra that the extensive reorganization that has taken place in the personnel of the orchestra since last spring has not only entailed no sacrifice, but has even worked improvement.

This first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the brilliant French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is making the first autumn tour with the orchestra through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza. Henry Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, is in America, but will not begin his work until Monday, November 11, when he holds his first rehearsal in Boston.

The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House. Madame Easton is not unknown in Brooklyn, where her beauty of voice, soundness of musicianship, and charm of personality, are justly admired. Madame Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the canzona "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

Mr. Monteux has arranged a most interesting list of works for the orchestra. Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, one of the noblest contributions of contemporary music, will be the first and longest number. The other works to be played will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's extraordinarily brilliant and, so to say, subversive variations entitled "Istar," and Debussy's kaleidoscopic "Ibéria."

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date

Music

Boston's First Symphony Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 7, at 8:15, and next Saturday afternoon, November 9, at 2:30. Both these concerts will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Monteux, through the courtesy of Giulio Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was engaged to conduct the October concerts in Boston, and when it became evident that Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, could not arrive from Paris in time properly to prepare for the first tour of the orchestra, Mr. Gatti-Casazza generously released Mr. Monteux from rehearsals at the Metropolitan so that he could conduct the concerts. His appearance on next Saturday afternoon will be the last with the Boston Symphony, and on the following Monday in Boston Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the rehearsals. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows: Symphony in D minor, Franck; overture, Byron's "Manfred," Schumann; "Le Peri," Poeme Danse, Dukas; "Iberia," "Images" for orchestra, Debussy.

Dukas's "La Peri" will be new in New York. Although it was written in 1910 and produced at the Chatelet in Paris as a poeme danse in 1912, it was not played in this country until Alfred Hertz performed it in San Francisco in January, 1916. Its next performance was in Boston ten days after at the opening of the Symphony season in that city. It is a work in modern form of great brilliancy. The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows: Handel, "Concerto Grosso," D major (Messrs. Fradkin and Noack, solo violins; Mr. Barrier, solo viola, Mr. Malkin, solor violoncello); Loeffler's poeme, "La Bonne Chanson"; D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A major. The novelty on this programme will be Martin Loeffler's poem, "La Bonne Chanson." As the title indicates, the composer has drawn his inspiration from the poem of the same name by Paul Verlaine. It was written originally fifteen or sixteen years ago and had one performance at a Symphony concert in Boston under Mr. Gericke. Then the composer withdrew it for revision. That revision was not made until last summer, and the work has just been played the past week in Boston for the first time in [illegible]

rom TRIBUNE
ddress: Providence, R. I.
Date

Musical Mention

Although the opening of the musical season in Providence has been deferred from time to time owing to the prevalence of the epidemic, there are many notable concerts to occur before snow flies. Prominent among these, of course, will be the concert to be given by the Paris Symphony Orchestra in the Billy Sunday Tabernacle on the evening of Monday, October 28.

Then, too, the series of Steinert concerts now loom up on the musical horizon, and not far in the distant future will be the opening of the concert series here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose coming to this country is so eagerly expected and of whom so much is anticipated, is scheduled to arrive in Boston toward the end of the coming week, for he is now on the ocean. Through the intervention of the French Minister of Fine Arts, Mr. Rabaud was released immediately from his duties in Paris and after his engagement by the orchestra was able to sail with a bit more than a week's delay. His arrival, however, will make no change in the plans of the orchestra for the early season. Pierre Monteaux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, will have charge of the orchestra until November 9th; then Mr. Rabaud will take hold.

The prevailing epidemic of influenza has postponed the opening of the Symphony season in Boston a fortnight, but now the first concerts are planned to be given next Friday and Saturday, October 25-26. The orchestra, however, has not been idle. Mr. Monteux, for three weeks now, has been holding three-hour rehearsals every week day. This has been invaluable, for 25 per cent. of the personnel is new and this long season of rehearsals has whipped the orchestra into marvelous shape. It is generally believed by those who have heard it that the orchestra is finer this year than it has ever been in the past.

n EVENING GLOBE
dress: New York City
te

The Boston Symphony Orchestra de-Germanized and in part reconstituted, gave in Symphony Hall, Boston, its first pair of concerts of the season Friday and Saturday of last week. Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera House, who is acting as conductor until Henri Rabaud takes up the batoh on Nov. 11, chose as programme César Franck's symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Péri" (first time in Boston), and Debussy's "Ibéria"—the same programme that he will conduct here for the Boston orchestra Thursday evening of next week. A part of Philip Hale's commentary on the opening of the Boston season, appearing in the Herald of that city, follows:

The answer to the many erroneous, some of them malicious, statements published abroad concerning the present condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the concert of yesterday, a concert that was conspicuously beautiful and brilliant; a concert long to be remembered gratefully, one that aroused the large audience to enthusiastic approval.

While Mr. Monteux had ample time, as it would seem to some, for preparation, his task was not an easy one. He had never conducted the orchestra in former years; he was musically unacquainted with the older members; no matter how skilful the new players may be, the orchestra could not reasonably be expected to be at once a homogeneous and plastic body. The tribute paid Mr. Monteux yesterday by audience and orchestra must have recompensed him for his indefatigable labor. There was spontaneous and public acknowledgment of his technical mastery as a conductor; of his sensitiveness and poetic insight as an interpreter; of the modest and ingratiating personality of the man himself.

Mr. Monteux has an exquisite sense of tonal values, of tonal balance and proportion. He is an invoker of euphony. He has the respect for clarity and logical development that characterizes his nation in literature and art. Mr. Gericke had these qualities, the exercise of which gave the Boston Symphony Orchestra international reputation; but Mr. Monteux has, in addition, warmth, imagination, emotional expressiveness, qualities that were foreign to Mr. Gericke's nature.

Led by Mr. Monteaux and played by the admirable orchestra, Franck's symphony is more than ever music of noble outlines, music rich in beauty, music that beginning in doubt and questioning finds consolation even on earth, and at the end rejoices, as a mighty alleluia of the celestial hosts. The loving attention paid the wealth of detail did not check the continuity of the composer's thought, did not stay the imperious rush in the two allegros. Inner voices were heard, but were not unduly prominent. They were not brought out by the conductor with the exulting air of a discoverer. And in the symphony one noted at once a marked improvement in the strings. They sang melodic passages with musical sensuousness. Pizzicati measures for once had body and significance. So, too, the brass choir had more character than in former years. Its full force was impressive, never blatant. Here, as in the other choirs, there was delightful precision. . . .

"La Peri" of Dukas was played here for the first time. Composed as a ballet for Miss Trouhanowa, it was reproached by some in Paris for being too "symphonic," fit for the concert hall rather than the stage. However this may be, the music is for the most part engrossing and not only by reason of exciting rhythms and gorgeous instrumentation. There are charming harmonic inventions, haunting modulations, delicate nuances—and Mr. Monteux is a master of nuances—melodic lines that are more noteworthy in measures for "stage business," or descriptive measures, than in [illegible]

STAR
Baltimore, Md.

Soloist With Boston Symphony

Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first concert here this season of that organization, at the Lyric, November 6.

It has happened that Mr. Monteux, who conducted last night his final Symphony concert in Boston this season, has given us particularly vivid and faithful interpretation of music by certain contemporaneous and "advanced" French composers. In the most mature works of Debussy and Ravel, in the "Peri" music of Dukas, he has impressed us ever with the spirit which obtains in French music of today. We have long been conversant with the accomplishments of this school, but have we realized how durable they are? It has been a fashion to hold up a question mark with Debussy, to exclaim "How interesting," or something of the kind, when listening to the music of Ravel, to speak of these "ingenious experimenters" and bestow other like condescensions and superficialities on their works. But as a matter of fact, this school of music, if any human being can be a judge of the probability of anything in the world, has come to stay, and to exert, in equal probability, as strong an influence on musical idioms of the future as German music has exerted in this field in the past. Modern French music is not coming. It is here. Its amazing development in recent years is one of the most confusing and extraordinary phenomena of the modern musical art. A quarter of a century ago it was an exotic, a novelty which did not seem to the majority of us to have roots or pith with which to sustain life. Today it is a fully developed language, different from that of any other nation, and a language which reflects in the most subtle and truthful manner the spirit of French genius—the beauty that is ordered, even when it is most impressionistic; the supremely fine sense of values; the refusal of anything which is gross and merely of the flesh; the culture and intellectuality of the most civilized peo-

Post Nov 3 STAR
om
dress Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its series of five concerts, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in the New National Theater, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 3 and March 18, at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon.

Since last spring there has been an extensive reorganization of the personnel. For the first time in its history there is a French conductor in Henri Rabaud. The first concert, however, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, pending the arrival of Mr. Rabaud. For the first time also it has an American concertmaster, a distinguished young violinist, Fredric Fradkin. In the ranks there have been changes affecting 25 per cent of the membership, the vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft being filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians.

Four soloists are announced—Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mme. Melba, Frederic Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is an Englishwoman of rare talent. Mme. Melba is returning from Australia this autumn for a few concerts in the United States.

Fredric Fradkin, the new concertmaster, is a native of Troy, N. Y., and a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and Arthur Rubinstein, the Russian pianist, as a youth of nineteen, made a short tour of this country in the winter of 1905-06. Most of his time has been spent in France, England and Spain, where he is accounted one of the giants of his art.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

It is welcome news to the public [illegible] Baltimore, which, for so many yea[illegible] has been a loyal supporter of t[illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra, th[illegible] that famous organization is returni[illegible] to Baltimore this season to give [illegible] usual series of five concerts. The co[illegible]certs will be given as usual in [illegible] Lyric Theater, and the dates are N[illegible]vember 6, December 4, January [illegible] February 4 and March 19. All th[illegible] concerts come on Wednesday ev[illegible]ings except that in February, w[illegible] the concert falls on a Tuesday ev[illegible]ing. This slight change is due to [illegible]avoidable complications in book[illegible] The general public sale of sea[illegible] tickets will open next Monday mo[illegible]ing, October 21, at Albaugh's off[illegible] Charles and Fayette streets.

Since last spring there has been [illegible] extensive reorganization of the p[illegible]sonnel of the orchestra. For t[illegible] first time in its history it has t[illegible] year a French conductor in He[illegible] Rabaud, who, however, will not a[illegible]pear in Baltimore until the Dece[illegible]ber concert. The first concert will [illegible] under the direction of Pierre M[illegible]teux, the distinguished French c[illegible]ductor of the Metropolitan Op[illegible] Company, who holds the post of co[illegible]ductor until Mr. Rabaud arrives. F[illegible] the first time in its history it has a[illegible] American concertmaster in the ve[illegible] distinguished young violinist, Fre[illegible]erick Fradkin. In the ranks of t[illegible] orchestra there have been chang[illegible] affecting 25 per cent. of the memb[illegible]ship. The vacancies caused by w[illegible] conditions and the draft have b[illegible] filled for the most part by you[illegible] enthusiastic musicians, and rehe[illegible]sals, which have been in prog[illegible] in Boston for three weeks, show [illegible] the tonal quality of the orche[illegible] has never been more beautiful in [illegible] past than it is now, and that its [illegible]cipline and technical skill have ne[illegible] been higher. The prevailing influe[illegible] compelled the postponement of [illegible] Boston season for two weeks, but [illegible]hearsals were held daily under [illegible] directions of Pierre Monteux and [illegible] progress has been made.

m EVENING POST
dress: New York City
e

A MUSICAL SOCIETY.

Boston Symphony Not a Polit[illegible] Affair.

The Fitchburg Sentinel notes tha[illegible] "weeding out" in the ranks of the B[illegible]ton Symphony Orchestra will aff[illegible] "those who were added to the orche[illegible]tra under the leadership of Dr. Ka[illegible] Muck, and who shared his views as t[illegible] the superiority of Germany over Amer[illegible]ica." The personnel of the orchestra was largely German or Austrian long before Dr. Muck became conductor, says the Springfield Republican, but it has contained notable exceptions like M. Longy and the other wood-wind players. Before the United States entered the war, the utmost harmony is said to have prevailed among musicians of warring nationalities. The orchestra was always scrupulously maintained by Major Higginson as a musical organization, into which national considerations did not enter. Ten and more years ago some demanded a larger representation of French music, not, indeed, on national grounds, but because they saw beauty in the work of Cesar Franck and other "moderns." The musical classics, being largely German, predominated in the orchestra's programmes, but new French, Russian, and Danish, as well as German, works

INFORMATION OBSCURED

n RECORD
dress Philadelphia, Pa.

THE DOMINANT FRENCH OF THE TRIUMPH YEAR

Voila! Say Wind Band, Orchestra, Composer, Conductor and Singers.

AND WE SAY "WELCOME!"

Rapprochement With the Latins an Engaging Note of Present Season.

WELL, at last the riddle of the Boston Symphony conductorship has been solved; and Henri Rabaud is the answer. Many names have been winnowed over in that famous guessing match of the past six months. A number of Frenchmen were mentioned. But in the grand parade past our eyes when the news reports came thickest, scarcely did the Rabaud colors ever have a sinkle call!

Now it is all right, and we are pleased as Punch. We do not like to have to forbid ourselves the pleasure of hearing the Boston Orchestra. Last season that was the only available course with a good many of us, and it went hard. Perhaps this winter, with the French composer-conductor officiating at the stand, we shall be able to make a little of the lost pleasure up.

Gallic Flavor Galore.

The strong general French tone that music will have in our country this winter is very interesting. For once, the Gauls will surely have their chance at us. First there was the superb martial band, La Musique Militaire Francaise. Then, only last night, the orchestra which we know as the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire played its opening program at the Metropolitan in New York. French opera, both new and old, will flourish glitteringly wherever opera is heard on our various stages. And, in addition to a conductor for the Boston Symphony direct from the Paris Opera, even the temporary conductorship of that orchestra will be filled by a Frenchman, Monteux. This, of course, is by no means the whole case for France in our American musical life of this winter. It is merely the few high lights. Undoubtedly the works of many French composers will figure largely on the orchestral, choral and song programs all over the country.

Rapprochement Internationale.

Italy, too, will naturally have her share. The three little Puccini operas in themselves are bound to make a fine stir. Bodansky, the Metropolitan conductor who went across and got these three scores from Puccini, tells with gusto how he introduced our Broadway classic "Over There" to the favorite Italian composer. And now Puccini is one of Georgie Cohan's most devoted! Truly, the rapprochement between the Mediterranean countries does grow apace.

It is bad news that our own opening pair of concerts had to be set back a week because of the widespread sickness. However, such things have to be taken up in the big broad balance-sheet of our living. Boys are daily giving up their hardy and cherished young lives for an ideal in Europe; so we ought to be able to worry along here with a concert or so the less.

F. H.

AMERICAN
ess: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater a week from next Wednesday evening, November 6. The return of this famous band will be warmly welcomed by the music lovers of Baltimore. Reports from Boston show that the reorganization made necessary by war conditions has involved no sacrifice in the efficiency of the Orchestra.

This first concert will have as conductor Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Mr. Monteux is one of the most distinguished of contemporary French conductors, and he was specially engaged, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra up to November 11, at which time Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, will take hold. Mr. Rabaud has just reached this country and is in Boston preparing his programs for the season.

The first concert of the season promises much pleasure. The soloist will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who has made such a profound impression in New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. A remarkable singer, a most excellent musician, and the possessor of a most attractive personality, Madame Easton is a valuable addition to the musical forces of this country. She will sing twice, her first number being the canzona Dove Solo from Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro, and her second, the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's The Prodigal Son. The symphony of the evening will be Franck's in D minor, one of the noblest works of contemporary music.

Eagle
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 27 1918

COMING BROOKLYN EVENTS

Boston Smyphony's First Program—Gabrilowitsch With New York Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its concerts in Brooklyn in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 8, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

There is every reason for the supporters of the orchestra to be gratified with the renewal of subscriptions and the sale to new subscribers which have been in progress for the past few weeks. The patronage promises to be as large this year as it ever has been in the past. It will also be good news to the patrons of the orchestra that the extensive reorganization that has taken place in the personnel of the orchestra since last spring has not only entailed no sacrifice, but has even worked improvement.

This first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the brilliant French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is making the first autumn tour with the orchestra through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza. Henry Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, is in America, but will not begin his work until Monday, November 11, when he holds his first rehearsal in Boston.

The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House. Madame Easton is not unknown in Brooklyn, where her beauty of voice, soundness of musicianship, and charm of personality, are justly admired. Madame Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the canzona "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

Mr. Monteux has arranged a most interesting list of works for the orchestra. Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, one of the noblest contributions of contemporary music, will be the first and longest number. The other works to be played will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's extraordinarily brilliant and, so to say, subversive variations entitled "Istar," and Debussy's kaleidoscopic "Ibéria."

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date

Music

Boston's First Symphony Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 7, at 8:15, and next Saturday afternoon, November 9, at 2:30. Both these concerts will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Monteux, through the courtesy of Giulio Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was engaged to conduct the October concerts in Boston, and when it became evident that Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, could not arrive from Paris in time properly to prepare for the first tour of the orchestra, Mr. Gatti-Casazza generously released Mr. Monteux from rehearsals at the Metropolitan so that he could conduct these concerts. His appearance on next Saturday afternoon will be the last with the Boston Symphony, and on the following Monday in Boston Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the rehearsals. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows: Symphony in D minor, Franck; overture to Byron's "Manfred," Schumann; "La Peri," Poeme Danse, Dukas; "Iberia," "Images" for orchestra, Debussy.

Dukas's "La Peri" will be new to New York. Although it was written in 1910 and produced at the Chatelet in Paris as a poeme danse in 1912, it was not played in this country until Alfred Hertz performed it in San Francisco in January, 1916. Its next performance was in Boston ten days ago at the opening of the Symphony season in that city. It is a work in modern form of great brilliancy. The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows: Handel, "Concerto Grosso," D major (Messrs. Fradkin and Noack, solo violins; Mr. Barrier, solo viola; Mr. Malkin, solor violoncello); Loeffler's poeme, "La Bonne Chanson"; D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A major. The novelty on this programme will be Martin Loeffler's poem, "La Bonne Chanson." As the title indicates, the composer has drawn his inspiration from the poem of the same name by Paul Verlaine. It was written originally fifteen or sixteen years ago and had one performance at a Symphony concert in Boston under Mr. Gericke. Then the composer withdrew it for revision. That revision was not made until last summer, and the work has just been played the past week in Boston for the first time [illegible]

rom TRIBUNE
ddress: Providence, R. I.
Date

Musical Mention

Although the opening of the musical season in Providence has been deferred from time to time owing to the prevalence of the epidemic, there are many notable concerts to occur before snow flies. Prominent among these, of course, will be the concert to be given by the Paris Symphony Orchestra in the Billy Sunday Tabernacle on the evening of Monday, October 28.

Then, too, the series of Steinert concerts now loom up on the musical horizon, and not far in the distant future will be the opening of the concert series here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose coming to this country is so eagerly expected and of whom so much is anticipated, is scheduled to arrive in Boston toward the end of the coming week, for he is now on the ocean. Through the intervention of the French Minister of Fine Arts, Mr. Rabaud was released immediately from his duties in Paris and after his engagement by the orchestra was able to sail with a bit more than a week's delay. His arrival, however, will make no change in the plans of the orchestra for the early season. Pierre Monteaux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, will have charge of the orchestra until November 9th; then Mr. Rabaud will take hold.

The prevailing epidemic of influenza has postponed the opening of the Symphony season in Boston a fortnight, but now the first concerts are planned to be given next Friday and Saturday, October 25-26. The orchestra, however, has not been idle. Mr. Monteux, for three weeks now, has been holding three-hour rehearsals every week day. This has been invaluable, for 25 per cent. of the personnel is new and this long season of rehearsals has whipped the orchestra into marvelous shape. It is generally believed by those who have heard it that the orchestra is finer this year than it has ever been in the past.

n EVENING GLOBE
dress: New York City

te

The Boston Symphony Orchestra de-Germanized and in part reconstituted, gave in Symphony Hall, Boston, its first pair of concerts of the season Friday and Saturday of last week. Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera House, who is acting as conductor until Henri Rabaud takes up the baton on Nov. 11, chose as programme César Franck's symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Péri" (first time in Boston), and Debussy's "Ibéria"—the same programme that he will conduct here for the Boston orchestra Thursday evening of next week. A part of Philip Hale's commentary on the opening of the Boston season, appearing in the Herald of that city, follows:

The answer to the many erroneous, some of them malicious, statements published abroad concerning the present condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the concert of yesterday, a concert that was conspicuously beautiful and brilliant; a concert long to be remembered gratefully, one that aroused the large audience to enthusiastic approval.

While Mr. Monteux had ample time, as it would seem to some, for preparation, his task was not an easy one. He had never conducted the orchestra in former years; he was musically unacquainted with the older members; no matter how skilful the new players may be, the orchestra could not reasonably be expected to be at once a homogeneous and plastic body. The tribute paid Mr. Monteux yesterday by audience and orchestra must have recompensed him for his indefatigable labor. There was spontaneous and public acknowledgment of his technical mastery as a conductor; of his sensitiveness and poetic insight as an interpreter; of the modest and ingratiating personality of the man himself.

Mr. Monteux has an exquisite sense of tonal values, of tonal balance and proportion. He is an invoker of euphony. He has the respect for clarity and logical development that characterizes his nation in literature and art. Mr. Gericke had these qualities, the exercise of which gave the Boston Symphony Orchestra international reputation; but Mr. Monteux has, in addition, warmth, imagination, emotional expressiveness, qualities that were foreign to Mr. Gericke's nature.

Led by Mr. Monteaux and played by the admirable orchestra, Franck's symphony is more than ever music of noble outlines, music rich in beauty, music that beginning in doubt and questioning finds consolation even on earth, and at the end rejoices, as a mighty alleluia of the celestial hosts. The loving attention paid the wealth of detail did not check the continuity of the composer's thought, did not stay the imperious rush in the two allegros. Inner voices were heard, but were not unduly prominent. They were not brought out by the conductor with the exulting air of a discoverer. And in the symphony one noted at once a marked improvement in the strings. They sang melodic passages with musical sensuousness. Pizzicati measures for once had body and significance. So, too, the brass choir had more character than in former years. Its full force was impressive, never blatant. Here, as in the other choirs, there was delightful precision. . . .

"La Peri" of Dukas was played here for the first time. Composed as a ballet for Miss Trouhanowa, it was reproached by some in Paris for being too "symphonic," fit for the concert hall rather than the stage. However this may be, the music is for the most part engrossing and not only by reason of exciting rhythms and gorgeous instrumentation. There are charming harmonic inventions, haunting modulations, delicate nuances—and Mr. Monteux is a master of nuances—melodic lines that are more noteworthy in measures for "stage business," or descriptive measures, than in [illegible]

STAR
Baltimore, Md.

Soloist With Boston Symphony

Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first concert here this season of that organization, at the Lyric, November 6.

It has happened that Mr. Monteux, who conducted last night his final Symphony concert in Boston this season, has given us particularly vivid and faithful interpretation of music by certain contemporaneous and "advanced" French composers. In the most mature works of Debussy and Ravel, in the "Peri" music of Dukas, he has impressed us ever with the spirit which obtains in French music of today. We have long been conversant with the accomplishments of this school, but have we realized how durable they are? It has been a fashion to hold up a question mark with Debussy, to exclaim "How interesting," or something of the kind, when listening to the music of Ravel, to speak of these "ingenious experimenters" and bestow other like condescensions and superficialities on their works. But as a matter of fact, this school of music, if any human being can be a judge of the probability of anything in the world, has come to stay, and to exert, in equal probability, as strong an influence on musical idioms of the future as German music has exerted in this field in the past. Modern French music is not coming. It is here. Its amazing development in recent years is one of the most confusing and extraordinary phenomena of the modern musical art. A quarter of a century ago it was an exotic, a novelty which did not seem to the majority of us to have roots or pith with which to sustain life. Today it is a fully developed language, different from that of any other nation, and a language which reflects in the most subtle and truthful manner the spirit of French genius—the beauty that is ordered, even when it is most impressionistic; the supremely fine sense of values; the refusal of anything which is gross and merely of the flesh; the culture and intellectuality of the most civilized peo-

Post Press
STAR

om
dress Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume its series of five concerts, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in the New National Theater, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 3 and March 18, at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon.

Since last spring there has been an extensive reorganization of the personnel. For the first time in its history there is a French conductor in Henri Rabaud. The first concert, however, will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, pending the arrival of Mr. Rabaud. For the first time also it has an American concertmaster, a distinguished young violinist, Frederic Fradkin. In the ranks there have been changes affecting 25 per cent of the membership, the vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft being filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians.

Four soloists are announced—Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mme. Melba, Frederic Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is an Englishwoman of rare talent. Mme. Melba is returning from Australia this autumn for a few concerts in the United States.

Fredric Fradkin, the new concertmaster, is a native of Troy, N. Y., and a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and Arthur Rubinstein, the Russian pianist, as a youth of nineteen, made a short tour of this country in the winter of 1905-06. Most of his time has been spent in France, England and Spain, where he is accounted one of the giants of his art.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

It is welcome news to the public of Baltimore, which, for so many years has been a loyal supporter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that that famous organization is returning to Baltimore this season to give its usual series of five concerts. The concerts will be given as usual in the Lyric Theater, and the dates are November 6, December 4, January 8, February 4 and March 19. All the concerts come on Wednesday evenings except that in February, when the concert falls on a Tuesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking. The general public sale of seat tickets will open next Monday morning, October 21, at Albaugh's office, Charles and Fayette streets.

Since last spring there has been an extensive reorganization of the personnel of the orchestra. For the first time in its history it has this year a French conductor in Henri Rabaud, who, however, will not appear in Baltimore until the December concert. The first concert will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who holds the post of conductor until Mr. Rabaud arrives. For the first time in its history it has an American concertmaster in the very distinguished young violinist, Frederick Fradkin. In the ranks of the orchestra there have been changes affecting 25 per cent. of the membership. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians, and rehearsals, which have been in progress in Boston for three weeks, show that the tonal quality of the orchestra has never been more beautiful in the past than it is now, and that its discipline and technical skill have never been higher. The prevailing influenza compelled the postponement of the Boston season for two weeks, but rehearsals were held daily under the directions of Pierre Monteux and great progress has been made.

m EVENING POST
dress: New York City

e

A MUSICAL SOCIETY.

Boston Symphony Not a Political Affair.

The Fitchburg Sentinel notes that a "weeding out" in the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will affect "those who were added to the orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, and who shared his views as to the superiority of Germany over America." The personnel of the orchestra was largely German or Austrian long before Dr. Muck became conductor, says the Springfield Republican, but it has contained notable exceptions, like M. Longy and the other wood-wind players. Before the United States entered the war, the utmost harmony is said to have prevailed among musicians of warring nationalities. The orchestra was always scrupulously maintained by Major Higginson as a musical organization, into which national considerations did not enter. Ten and more years ago some demanded a larger representation of French music, not, indeed, on national grounds, but because they saw beauty in the work of Cesar Franck and other "moderns." The musical classics, being largely German, predominated in the orchestra's programmes, but new French, Russian, and Danish, as well as German, works

STAR

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 14 1918

Soloists announced (without dates) for the coming season's series of five concerts in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Florence Easton, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Frederic Fradkin, new first violinist of the orchestra; Mme. Nellie Melba, soprano, and Arthur Rubinstein, pianist.

Dates of the concerts are: November 6, December 4, January 8, February 4 and March 19, at 8:15 P. M., in the Lyric. All except the fourth concert date will be on Wednesdays; the fourth date is on Tuesday—an unusual deviation for this orchestra, here.

Henri Rabaud, a noted Frenchman, has been engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, succeeding Dr. Karl Muck. It is reported changes have been made in the management of the orchestra and in the personnel of the players. Pierre Monteux, Metropolitan Opera conductor, will conduct the first concert.

Subscribers to last season's projected series of concerts in Baltimore have until tomorrow to retain their seats by renewed subscriptions. General public sale of season tickets begins on October 21. Sales of seats for single concerts begin a few days before each concert.

EVENING SUN

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 27 191

CONCERT ANNOUNCED

THE first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening, November 6. The return of this famous band will be warmly welcomed by the music lovers of Baltimore. Reports from Boston show that the reorganization made necessary by war conditions has involved no sacrifice in the efficiency of the orchestra. On the contrary, the belief is general that in tonal beauty, mastery of routine and technique, it is in better shape than it has ever been.

This first concert will have as conductor Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Mr. Monteux is one of the most distinguished of contemporary French conductors, and he was specially engaged, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra up to November 11, at which time Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, will take hold. Mr. Rabaud has just reached this country and is in Boston preparing his programs for the season.

The first concert of the season promises much pleasure. The soloists will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who has made such a profound impression in New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. A remarkable singer, a most excellent musician and the possessor of a most attractive personality, Mme. Easton is a valuable addition to the musical forces of this country. She will sing twice, her first number being the canzona, "Dovo Sono," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and her second the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." The symphony of the evening will be Franck's in D minor, one of the noblest works of contemporary music. The other orchestra numbers will be Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major and Charles Martin Loeffler's remarkable poem for orchestra, "La Bonne Chanson."

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 27 1918

There seems to be no question now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be able to give its first concert in Philadelphia on the date scheduled—a week from tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 4. It will be given as usual in the Academy of Music. The influenza has lessened here, as it has in Boston, and set back all music here about the same period of a fortnight, as it did in Boston. Despite the prevailing epidemic the renewal of subscriptions and the sale of season tickets to new subscribers, which have been in progress for the past three weeks, have been most gratifying. The orchestra comes from Boston for this first concert under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, of New York. Henri Habaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, is now in America, but will not take hold of his work until November 11, when the orchestra returns from its first tour. Mr. Monteux has been having distinguished success in Boston and the orchestra is considered to be even of finer quality than it has ever been in the past.

The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, the English soprano, who made so profound an impression on the musical public of Philadelphia last Spring, when she was one of the principal singers at the brief season of grand opera given in the Academy of Music. She will sing twice. Her first number will be the canzona "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of "Lia" from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

Mr. Monteux has arranged a most interesting list of works for the orchestra. Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, one of the noblest contributions of contemporary music, will be the first and longest number. The other works to be played will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's extraordinarily brilliant and, so to say, subversive variations entitled "Istar," and Debussy's kaleidoscopic "Iberia."

BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 19 1918

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has visited Philadelphia annually since 1886, is to be heard once more in a series of five concerts, the first to be under the direction of PIERRE MONTEUX, one of the conductors of the Metropolitan Opera Company, while another distinguished Frenchman, HENRI RABAUD, will lead the succeeding concerts. The

AMERICAN

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 20 1918

THE CITY

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Baltimore during the coming season will open tomorrow, Monday morning, October 21, at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets. The concerts will be given, as usual, in the Lyric Theater, and the dates are November 6, December 4, January 8, February 4 and March 19. All these concerts come on Wednesday evenings, except that in February, when the concert falls on a Tuesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert, as the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare the program for this trip. Mr. Rabaud is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts.

Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Frederic Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is an Englishwoman of rare talent. She is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company and is regarded as one of the best of the younger generation of lyric sopranos. Madame Melba is returning from Australia this autumn to give a few concerts in the United States and she has been engaged for several appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which the concert in Baltimore is one.

Frederic Fradkin is the new concertmaster of the orchestra. A native of Troy, N. Y., a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, he returned to this country after experience abroad as concertmaster of the orchestra organized to travel with the Ballet Russe.

Much interest is attached to the coming of Arthur Rubinstein, the Russian pianist.

ENQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 27 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There seems to be no question now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be able to give its first concert in Philadelphia on the date scheduled—a week from tomorrow evening, Nov. 4. It will be given as usual in Academy of Music. The Orchestra comes from Boston for this first concert under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the Orchestra, is now in America, but will not take hold of his work until November 11, when the Orchestra returns from its first tour.

The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, the English soprano, who will give the canzona "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

Mr. Monteux has arranged a most interesting list of works for the Orchestra. Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, one of the noblest contributions of contemporary music, will be the first and longest number. The other works to be played will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's "Star" variations and Debussy's kaleidoscopic "Iberia." The single seats for this concert are on sale at Heppe's.

EVENING GLOBE

New York City

OCT 24 1918

Music.

Notes and Announcements of Coming Concerts.

The first pair of concerts this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will be given Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9. Through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza these concerts will have as conductor Pierre Monteux, the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House. Mr. Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, does not take charge of the orchestra until the following Monday.

The programme for the Thursday night concert comprises César Franck's symphony in D minor; Schumann's "Manfred" overture; Dukas's "La Péri," and Debussy's "Ibéria." For Saturday afternoon the programme comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major,; Charles Martin Loeffler's poem, "La Bonne Chanson"; Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations "Istar," and Beethoven's symphony No. 7 in A major.

EVENING GLOBE

New York City

OCT 31 1918

Music.

Boston Symphony Novelties—Other Music.

Mr. Monteux has wisely included two novelties in the exceptionally interesting programmes he has made for the first two Carnegie Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week. At the Thursday night concert he is giving "La Péri" of Paul Dukas; at the Saturday afternoon concert Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson." "La Péri" is a "danced poem." According to the programme note of Philip Hale, this ballet was composed in 1910 and first performed at the Châtelet Theatre, Paris, at the Concerts de Danse, given by Mlle. Trouhanowa, in April, 1912. She took the part of the Péri, M. Bekefi that of Iskender. The ballet was added to the repertory of the Paris Opéra Comique May 29, 1914. As a concert piece the music was played at a Lamoureux concert in Paris Nov. 23, 1914. Alfred Hertz conducted it at a concert of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 7, 1916. The recent performance in Boston was the second in this country.

The story is the gorgeous oriental adventure of Iskender, the Péri, and the flower of immortality—in this instance the lotus. "The stage at the Châtelet," Mr. Hale tells us, "showed gold mountains, crimson valleys, and trees bearing silver fruit."

Mr. Loeffler's "Une Bonne Chanson" is a tone poem inspired by Verlaine. It was written originally fifteen or sixteen years ago, and had one performance at a symphony concert in Boston led by Mr. Gericke. The composer was dissatisfied, and withdrew the work for revision. Not until last summer did he make the revisions. The performance of the poem in Boston this week is the first in its new form.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 30 1918

BEGINNING OF NEW EPOCH FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Baltimore during the coming season will open tomorrow morning. The concerts will be given as usual in the Lyric Theatre, and the dates are November 6, December 4, January 8, February 4 and March 19. All these concerts come on Wednesday evenings except that in February, when the concert falls on a Tuesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

Baltimore, since 1887, has been one of the most loyal supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it will be good news to those who have been going to the concerts for so many years to know that the orchestra will return here in better condition than it has ever been. There has been an extensive reorganization since last spring and about 25 per cent. of the personnel is new. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians, and rehearsals, which have been in progress now in Boston for three weeks, show that the tonal quality of the orchestra has never been more beautiful in the past than it is now, and that its discipline and technical skill have never been higher. The prevailing influenza compelled the postponement of the Boston season for two weeks, but rehearsals were held daily under the direction of Pierre Monteux and vast progress has been made.

As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert, as the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare the program for this trip. Mr. Rabaud is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts.

Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Madame Melba, Frederic Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is an Englishwoman of rare talent. She is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company and has had remarkable success with that organization and may be regarded as one of the best of the younger generation of lyric sopranos. Madame Melba is returning from Australia this autumn to give a few concerts in the United States, and she has been engaged for several appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which the concert in Baltimore is one.

The other two artists, like Madame Easton, are practically newcomers, as far as concert work is concerned. Frederic Fradkin is the new concertmaster of the orchestra. A native of Troy, New York, a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, he returned to this country after experience abroad, as concertmaster with the orchestra organized to travel with the Ballet Russe. All accounts have it that he is a violinist of very unusual qualities, the possessor of a tone of singular beauty, of a technique that is complete in every respect, and of refinement and elegance of style which is found among no violinists except those of French training.

Much interest is attached to the coming of Arthur Rubinstein, the Russian pianist. As a youth of 19 Mr. Rubinstein made a short tour in this country, this being in the winter of 1905-06, and made an impression then. Since that time, however, he has grown greatly. Most of his time has been spent in France, England and Spain, where he is accounted one of the giants of his art. For the past summer he has been here with extraordinary success in America.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra this year beginning a new epoch in its career, and there is no question but its achievements in the future will be distinguished as those of the past.

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

OCT 2 - 1918

36

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in this city during the coming winter, will open at Seddon's news stand, Butler Exchange, on Nov. 4. The response of former subscribers to Boston Symphony concerts has been gratifying to the new management. The orchestra has just given its opening concerts in Boston, under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, who is to join the orchestra on Monday, Nov. 11, will conduct the first concert here on Tuesday, Nov. 19.

As already announced, the other dates are Dec. 17, Jan. 21, March 11 and April 8. The soloist at the first concert will be Merle Alcock, the distinguished contralto, and the other soloists, in their order, are Harold Bauer, pianist; Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master; Arthur Hackett, the American tenor, and Rosita Renard, the young Chilean pianist.

TRIBUNE

New York City

OCT 30 1918

German Music? Maybe

Muck's Successor Undecided on Symphony Policy

"Such questions are never asked in Paris," said Henri Rabaud, who succeeds Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he was asked yesterday whether he intends to include music by German composers in the concerts this season. "Why should we not play beautiful music like Beethoven's C minor Symphony?" But he said he would confer with the trustees of the orchestra before adopting a definite policy in the matter.

This is M. Rabaud's first visit to America. He did not even come over for the first performance of his opera "Marouf," which was given at the Metropolitan last winter.

M. Rabaud recently has been devoting his time to charity concerts. Before the war he was one of the conductors at the National Opera House in Paris. He is a pupil of the Conservatoire and won the Prix de Rome. He departed for Boston yesterday.

SOLOIST HERE NOVEMBER 6

Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first concert here this season of that organization, at the Lyric.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 20 1918

MUSIC AND MUSICIAN

The opening opera of the Metropo season on November 19 is t "Marouf," the work of the new B Symphony Orchestra conductor, Rabaud. It draws its inspiration the Arabian Nights, and is a wo vitality and nerve, like the bea second symphony in E minor, w Mr. Stokowski has brought forwar two pairs of concerts.

"The Legend," an opera in one the scene laid in a remote district o imaginary Muscovite country, boo Jacques Byrne, music by Joseph Ch Breil.

"The Temple Dancer," an oper one act, evoking some of the legen religious rites of the Hindus, libretto by Jutta Bell-Ranske, musi John Adam Hugo.

DRAMATIC MIRROR

New York City.

Rabaud Becomes Head of Boston Symphony

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have engaged Henri Rabaud, French conductor and composer, as permanent conductor, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck. A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts states that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement, and would sail as soon as possible for this country.

Rabaud at present is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris. This post he has filled for seven years.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, in November.

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

After postponement of two weeks the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its season in Boston Friday afternoon and next Saturday evening. Although the prevailing epidemic prevented the first two pairs of concerts the orchestra has not been idle. Three-hour rehearsals have been held every weekday under Mr. Monteux, who has charge of the orchestra until Nov. 9.

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor, is on his way to this country and is expected to reach here this week. He will go directly to Boston and will have more than a fortnight in which to become settled and to make his plans for the rest of the season. The concert which the orchestra will give in Providence on Tuesday evening, Nov. 19, will really be the first out-of-town concert for him, for he will conduct for the first time in Cambridge on the 14th and make his debut in Boston on the 15th and 16th.

Five concerts will be given in Infantry Hall. The dates of these are Nov. 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21, March 11 and April 8. The first concert will bring Merle Alcock, the distinguished American contralto; then will come Harold Bauer, pianist; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Fredric Fradkin, violinist, who is the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and finally Rosita Renard, the Chilean pianist.

STAR

Baltimore, Md.

Soloists announced (without dates) for the coming season's series of five concerts in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Florence Easton, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Frederic Fradkin, new first violinist of the orchestra; Mme. Nellie Melba, soprano, and Arthur Rubinstein, pianist.

Dates of the concerts are: November 6, December 4, January 8, February 4 and March 19, at 8:15 P. M., in the Lyric. All except the fourth concert date will be on Wednesdays; the fourth date is on Tuesday—an unusual deviation for this orchestra, here.

Henri Rabaud, a noted Frenchman, has been engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, succeeding Dr. Karl Muck. It is reported changes have been made in the management of the orchestra and in the personnel of the players. Pierre Monteux, Metropolitan Opera conductor, will conduct the first concert.

Subscribers to last season's projected series of concerts in Baltimore have until tomorrow to retain their seats by renewed subscriptions. General public sale of season tickets begins on October 21. Sales of seats for single concerts begin a few days before each concert.

EVENING SUN

Baltimore, Md.

CONCERT ANNOUNCED

THE first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening, November 6. The return of this famous band will be warmly welcomed by the music lovers of Baltimore. Reports from Boston show that the reorganization made necessary by war conditions has involved no sacrifice in the efficiency of the orchestra. On the contrary, the belief is general that in tonal beauty, mastery of routine and technique, it is in better shape than it has ever been.

This first concert will have as conductor Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Mr. Monteux is one of the most distinguished of contemporary French conductors, and he was specially engaged, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra up to November 11, at which time Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, will take hold. Mr. Rabaud has just reached this country and is in Boston preparing his programs for the season.

The first concert of the season promises much pleasure. The soloists will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who has made such a profound impression in New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. A remarkable singer, a most excellent musician and the possessor of a most attractive personality, Mme. Easton is a valuable addition to the musical forces of this country. She will sing twice, her first number being the canzona, "Dovo Sono," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and her second the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." The symphony of the evening will be Franck's in D minor, one of the noblest works of contemporary music. The other orchestra numbers will be Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major and Charles Martin Loeffler's remarkable poem for orchestra, "La Bonne Chanson."

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

There seems to be no question now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be able to give its first concert in Philadelphia on the date scheduled—a week from tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 4. It will be given as usual in the Academy of Music. The influenza has lessened here, as it has in Boston, and set back all music here about the same period of a fortnight, as it did in Boston. Despite the prevailing epidemic the renewal of subscriptions and the sale of season tickets to new subscribers, which have been in progress for the past three weeks, have been most gratifying. The orchestra comes from Boston for this first concert under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, of New York. Henri Habaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, is now in America, but will not take hold of his work until November 11, when the orchestra returns from its first tour. Mr. Monteux has been having distinguished success in Boston and the orchestra is considered to be even of finer quality than it has ever been in the past.

The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, the English soprano, who made so profound an impression on the musical public of Philadelphia last Spring, when she was one of the principal singers at the brief season of grand opera given in the Academy of Music. She will sing twice. Her first number will be the canzona "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of "Lia" from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

Mr. Monteux has arranged a most interesting list of works for the orchestra. Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, one of the noblest contributions of contemporary music, will be the first and longest number. The other works to be played will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's extraordinarily brilliant and, so to say, subversive variations entitled "Istar," and Debussy's kaleidoscopic "Iberia."

BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has visited Philadelphia annually since 1886, is to be heard once more in a series of five concerts, the first to be under the direction of PIERRE MONTEUX, one of the conductors of the Metropolitan Opera Company, while another distinguished Frenchman, HENRI RABAUD, will lead the succeeding concerts. The

AMERICAN

Baltimore, Md.

THE CITY

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Baltimore during the coming season will open tomorrow, Monday morning, October 21, at Albaugh's Ticket Office, Charles and Fayette streets. The concerts will be given, as usual, in the Lyric Theater, and the dates are November 6, December 4, January 8, February 4 and March 19. All these concerts come on Wednesday evenings, except that in February, when the concert falls on a Tuesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert, as the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare the program for this trip. Mr. Rabaud is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts.

Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Frederic Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is an Englishwoman of rare talent. She is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company and is regarded as one of the best of the younger generation of lyric sopranos. Madame Melba is returning from Australia this autumn to give a few concerts in the United States and she has been engaged for several appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which the concert in Baltimore is one.

Frederic Fradkin is the new concertmaster of the orchestra. A native of Troy, N. Y., a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, he returned to this country after experience abroad as concertmaster of the orchestra organized to travel with the Ballet Russe.

Much interest is attached to the coming of Arthur Rubinstein, the Russian pianist.

SOLOIST HERE NOVEMBER 6

Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the first concert here this season of that organization, at the Lyric.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa.

MUSIC AND MUSICIAN

The opening opera of the Metropo season on November 19 is to "Marouf," the work of the new B Symphony Orchestra conductor, Rabaud. It draws its inspiration the Arabian Nights, and is a wo vitality and nerve, like the bea second symphony in E minor, w Mr. Stokowski has brought forwar two pairs of concerts.

"The Legend," an opera in one the scene laid in a remote district o imaginary Muscovite country, book Jacques Byrne, music by Joseph Ch Brell.

"The Temple Dancer," an opera one act, evoking some of the legen religious rites of the Hindus. libretto by Jutta Bell-Ranske, musi John Adam Hugo.

ENQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 27 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There seems to be no question now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be able to give its first concert in Philadelphia on the date scheduled—a week from tomorrow evening, Nov. 4. It will be given as usual in Academy of Music. The Orchestra comes from Boston for this first concert under the direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the Orchestra, is now in America, but will not take hold of his work until November 11, when the Orchestra returns from its first tour.

The soloist at this first concert will be Florence Easton, the English soprano, who will give the canzona "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

Mr. Monteux has arranged a most interesting list of works for the Orchestra. Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, one of the noblest contributions of contemporary music, will be the first and longest number. The other works to be played will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's "Star" variations and Debussy's kaleidoscopic "Theria." The single seats for this concert are on sale at Heppe's.

EVENING GLOBE

New York City

OCT 24 1918

Music.

Notes and Announcements of Coming Concerts.

The first pair of concerts this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will be given Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9. Through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza these concerts will have as conductor Pierre Monteux, the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House. Mr. Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, does not take charge of the orchestra until the following Monday.

The programme for the Thursday night concert comprises César Franck's symphony in D minor; Schumann's "Manfred" overture; Dukas's "La Périe," and Debussy's "Ibéria." For Saturday afternoon the programme comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major,; Charles Martin Loeffler's poem, "La Bonne Chanson"; Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations "Istar," and Beethoven's symphony No. 7 in A major.

DRAMATIC MIRROR

New York City.

Rabaud Becomes Head of Boston Symphony

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have engaged Henri Rabaud, French conductor and composer, as permanent conductor, to succeed Dr. Karl Muck. A cablegram received from the French Ministry of Fine Arts states that Mr. Rabaud accepted the engagement, and would sail as soon as possible for this country.

Rabaud at present is the principal conductor at the Grand Opera in Paris. This post he has filled for seven years.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra through the first Southern trip, in November.

EVENING GLOBE

New York City

Music.

Boston Symphony Novelties—Other Music.

Mr. Monteux has wisely included two novelties in the exceptionally interesting programmes he has made for the first two Carnegie Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week. At the Thursday night concert he is giving "La Péri" of Paul Dukas; at the Saturday afternoon concert Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson." "La Péri" is a "danced poem." According to the programme note of Philip Hale, this ballet was composed in 1910 and first performed at the Châtelet Theatre, Paris, at the Concerts de Danse, given by Mlle. Trouhanowa, in April, 1912. She took the part of the Péri, M. Bekefi that of Iskender. The ballet was added to the repertory of the Paris Opéra Comique May 29, 1914. As a concert piece the music was played at a Lamoureux concert in Paris Nov. 23, 1914. Alfred Hertz conducted it at a concert of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 7, 1916. The recent performance in Boston was the second in this country.

The story is the gorgeous oriental adventure of Iskender, the Péri, and the flower of immortality—in this instance the lotus. "The stage at the Châtelet," Mr. Hale tells us, "showed gold mountains, crimson valleys, and trees bearing silver fruit."

Mr. Loeffler's "Une Bonne Chanson" is a tone poem inspired by Verlaine. It was written originally fifteen or sixteen years ago, and had one performance at a symphony concert in Boston led by Mr. Gericke. The composer was dissatisfied, and withdrew the work for revision. Not until last summer did he make the revisions. The performance of the poem in Boston this week is the first in its new form.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

BEGINNING OF NEW EPOCH FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Baltimore during the coming season will open tomorrow morning. The concerts will be given as usual in the Lyric Theatre, and the dates are November 6, December 4, January 8, February 4 and March 19. All these concerts come on Wednesday evenings except that in February, when the concert falls on a Tuesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

Baltimore, since 1887, has been one of the most loyal supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it will be good news to those who have been going to the concerts for so many years to know that the orchestra will return here in better condition than it has ever been. There has been an extensive reorganization since last spring and about 25 per cent. of the personnel is new. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians, and rehearsals, which have been in progress now in Boston for three weeks, show that the tonal quality of the orchestra has never been more beautiful in the past than it is now, and that its discipline and technical skill have never been higher. The prevailing influenza compelled the postponement of the Boston season for two weeks, but rehearsals were held daily under the direction of Pierre Monteux and vast progress has been made.

As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert, as the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare the program for this trip. Mr. Rabaud is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts.

Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Madame Melba, Frederic Fradkin and Arthur Rubinstein. Florence Easton is an Englishwoman of rare talent. She is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company and has had remarkable success with that organization and may be regarded as one of the best of the younger generation of lyric sopranos. Madame Melba is returning from Australia this autumn to give a few concerts in the United States, and she has been engaged for several appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which the concert in Baltimore is one.

The other two artists, like Madame Easton, are practically newcomers, so far as concert work is concerned. Frederic Fradkin is the new concertmaster of the orchestra. A native of Troy, New York, a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, he returned to this country after experience abroad, as concertmaster of the orchestra organized to travel with the Ballet Russe. All accounts have that he is a violinist of very unusual qualities, the possessor of a tone of singular beauty, of a technique that is complete in every respect, and of refinement and elegance of style which is found among no violinists except those of French training.

Much interest is attached to the coming of Arthur Rubinstein, the Russian pianist. As a youth of 19 Mr. Rubinstein made a short tour in this country, this being in the winter of 1905-06. He made an impression then. Since that time, however, he has grown greatly. Most of his time has been spent in France, England and Spain, where he is accounted one of the giants of his art. For the past summer he has been here with extraordinary success in America.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra this year beginning a new epoch in its career, and there is no question but achievements in the future will be distinguished as those of the past.

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

After postponement of two weeks the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its season in Boston Friday afternoon and next Saturday evening. Although the prevailing epidemic prevented the first two pairs of concerts the orchestra has not been idle. Three-hour rehearsals have been held every weekday under Mr. Monteux, who has charge of the orchestra until Nov. 9.

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor, is on his way to this country and is expected to reach here this week. He will go directly to Boston and will have more than a fortnight in which to become settled and to make his plans for the rest of the season. The concert which the orchestra will give in Providence on Tuesday evening, Nov. 19, will really be the first out-of-town concert for him, for he will conduct for the first time in Cambridge on the 14th and make his debut in Boston on the 15th and 16th.

Five concerts will be given in Infantry Hall. The dates of these are Nov. 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21, March 11 and April 8. The first concert will bring Merle Alcock, the distinguished American contralto; then will come Harold Bauer, pianist; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Fredric Fradkin, violinist, who is the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and finally Rosita Renard, the Chilean pianist.

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in this city during the coming winter, will open at Seddon's news stand, Butler Exchange, on Nov. 4. The response of former subscribers to Boston Symphony concerts has been gratifying to the new management. The orchestra has just given its opening concerts in Boston, under the direction of Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Rabaud, the new permanent conductor, who is to join the orchestra on Monday, Nov. 11, will conduct the first concert here on Tuesday, Nov. 19.

As already announced, the other dates are Dec. 17, Jan. 21, March 11 and April 8. The soloist at the first concert will be Merle Alcock, the distinguished contralto, and the other soloists in their order, are Harold Bauer, pianist; Fredric Fradkin, the new concert master; Arthur Hackett, the American tenor, and Rosita Renard, the young Chilean pianist.

TRIBUNE

New York City

German Music? Maybe

Muck's Successor Undecided on Symphony Policy

"Such questions are never asked in Paris," said Henri Rabaud, who succeeds Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he was asked yesterday whether he intends to include music by German composers in the concerts this season. "Why should we not play beautiful music like Beethoven's C minor Symphony?" But he said he would confer with the trustees of the orchestra before adopting a definite policy in the matter.

This is M. Rabaud's first visit to America. He did not even come over for the first performance of his opera "Marouf," which was given at the Metropolitan last winter.

M. Rabaud recently has been devoting his time to charity concerts. Before the war he was one of the conductors at the National Opera House in Paris. He is a pupil of the Conservatoire and won the Prix de Rome. He departed for Boston yes

NEWS
ss: Baltimore, Md.

HENRI RABAUD REACHES U. S.

Boston Orchestra Conductor Speaks No English, But Hopes To Learn.
(From the New York Times.)

Among the passengers arriving at an Atlantic port from France, on a French steamship, was Henri Rabaud, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has come over to replace Dr. Karl Muck. Mr. Rabaud has been for some years the musical director of the orchestra at the National Opera House, Paris, and is the composer of the French opera "Marouf," performed last season in New York, as well as of a symphony already heard here, and of several symphonic poems. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894 for the excellence of his musical works.

The new director of the Boston Symphony does not in any way look like the customary leader of an orchestra. He is tall, slight, has gray hair, mustache and whiskers, and wears a frock coat, with a somewhat clerical type of wide-brimmed, soft hat. He does not speak any English at present, he explained, but hopes to learn during the coming season in America

ENQUIRER
ss: Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming season will open tomorrow morning, at George T. Haly's ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. The concerts will be given as usual in the Academy of Music, and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings, except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

Philadelphia, since 1886, has been one of the most loyal supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it will be good news to those who have been going to the concerts for so many years to know that the orchestra will return here in better condition than it has ever been. There has been an extensive reorganization since last spring, and about 25 per cent. of the personnel is new.

As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert, as the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare the programme for this trip. Mr. Rabaud is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts.

Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master, and Arthur Rubinstein.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
OCT 23 1918

WILL BE SOLOIST AT FIRST BOSTON CONCERT

Florence Easton

Florence Easton will make her initial appearance in Baltimore as soloist at the concert at the Lyric on November 6, which will mark the return to this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of a year. Miss Easton is one of the leading sopranos of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company.

PUBLIC LEDGER
s Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 20 1918

The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming season will open tomorrow at Heppe's, 1119 Chestnut street. The concerts will be given as usual in the Acadedy of Music, and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings, except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

About 25 per cent of the personnel is new.

m EVENING TELEGRAM
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 19 1918

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts here this season will be given as usual in the Academy of Music and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

There has been an extensive reorganization since last spring and about 25 per cent of the orchestra's personnel is new. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians. The prevailing influenza compelled the postponement of the Boston season for two weeks, but rehearsals were held daily.

Pierre Monteux, French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert. Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor of the orchestra, is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts. The soloists will be Florence Fradkin, violinist; and Arthur Rubenstein, pianist.

STAR
ress: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater a week from next Wednesday evening, November 6. The return of this famous band will be warmly welcomed by the music lovers of Paltimore. Reports from Boston show that the reorganization made necessary by war conditions has involved no sacrifice in the efficiency of the orchestra. On the contrary, the belief is general that in tonal beauty, mastery of routine and technique, it is in better shape than it has ever been.

This first concert will have as conductor Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Mr. Monteux is one of the most distinguished of contemporary French conductors, and he was specially engaged, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra up to November 11, at which time Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, will take hold. Mr. Rabaud has just reached this country and is in Boston preparing his programs for the season.

The first concert of the season promises much pleasure. The soloist will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who has made such a profound impression in New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. A remarkable singer, a most excellent musician, and the possessor of a most attractive personality, Madame Easton is a valuable addition to the musical forces of this country.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City
Date

A Broad-minded French

Henri Rabaud, successor to the Muck as conductor of the Boston chestra, impresses the American p with his plea for German music in of his notable organization for the Speaking for a race which always the land of art as a republic, th Frenchman says:

Why should we not play beaut Beethoven's C Minor Symphony?

M. Rabaud is an artist of the as a composer and as a conductor. given at the Metropolitan Opera House last season and included in the programme at that institution for the coming season, marks him as a composer of high inspiration and broad artistic sympathy.

M. Rabaud's advocacy of German music—not of the belligerently Germanic type of Wagner's works, but of a school that knew not Wagner and the malignant outreachings of German imperialism —will appeal strongly to many music lovers in America.

n NORTH AMERICAN
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 20 1918

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL GIVE FIVE CONCERTS HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will give five concerts here at the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All of these concerts come on Monday evenings except that in February, which will be given on a Wednesday evening.

Four soloists announced are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba; Frederic Fradkin, violinist, who is also concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubenstein, the Russian pianist, who toured America half a dozen years ago, when scarcely 19 years old.

As the result of extensive reorganization and other changes brought about by the war, about 25 per cent of the personnel is new. The new musicians are said to be, for the most part, young and enthusiastic men, and those who have heard the early recitals of the orchestra this year declare that its tonal quality has never been more beautiful in the past than now, and that the discipline and technical skill have never been higher.

Pierre Monteux, the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company will conduct the November concert here as the arrival from France of Mr. Rabaud, the permanent conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare for this first trip.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,

WEEK-END CONCERTS

A SATURDAY AND SUNDAY FULL TO BRIM

Mr. Monteux Takes Leave of His Bostonian Public—Mr. Heifetz, the Violinist, in Form but Not Quite His Fullest and Finest Self—The Novel Spanish Piece of Mr. Laparra and Mme. Stanley—Mr. McCormack to a Rejoicing Audience

THOUGH Mr. Monteux will lead the Symphony Orchestra this week in its concerts at New York and other cities southward, he took leave, for the present, of its Bostonian public at Symphony Hall on Saturday evening. Listeners for the occasion as well as subscribers were assembled in the audience—clear evidence of the interest he has kindled and maintained as conductor in the community at large. At every turn the company was sincerely cordial to Mr. Monteux, applauding him at his coming to his place and at many a pause in the progress of the concert, lingering to recall him at the end, clapping him most of all when, with Mr. Loeffler rising in his place in the balcony, he divided the plaudits that rewarded the composer's tone-poem, "Le Bonre Chanson." The conductor received these compliments with unaffected modesty and an air of gentle satisfaction; yet nowhere in America and at no time during the two years he has spent in this country has he been so heartily and honestly applauded as in Boston during the past fortnight. The audiences hearing him with the Russian Ballet had neither eyes nor ears for the mere leader of its orchestra. At the Metropolitan he has been caught as a useful and dependable lever into that opera-making machine. Here in Boston, for the first time on this side of the Atlantic, he has tasted the sweets of prestige and deserved them. If the crucial concerts next Thursday and Saturday in New York—crucial for both orchestra and conductor—go as well as there is reason to expect, Mr. Monteux will return to the opera house acclaimed, laurelled.

Early last summer, before the company and the schedules of the Metropolitan were definitely settled for the present season, the trustees of the Boston Orchestra could, in all probability, have engaged Mr. Monteux as conductor of its concerts for a full musical year. But they, like the rest of us, were no diviners of the abilities he would prove in a new post and of the warmth with which the public would receive him in it. Even he himself may hardly have foreseen the change that a free hand, a fine and responsive instrument, large opportunity and congenial atmosphere were to make in him. As it is, he will abide in Bostonian memory as the conductor who has reared the new Symphony Orchestra in the image of the old and bettered the reflection. The men of the band will remember him as a gently insistent, politely exacting master who refused to be content until he had exactly gained his end. The listeners of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings will recall him as a leader who shaped interesting programmes under the hampering conditions of wartime, who heard orchestra and composer with an ear of rare sensibility, and who in unusual degree fused in his conducting intelligence with imagination, apt detail with large design, exceeding finesse with sweeping power. With both orchestra and audiences recollection will long linger of Mr. Monteux as a wholly sincere, modest, ingratiating personality. It is much to be admired; it is something also to be liked.

AMERICAN—NOVEMBER 4

NEW SYMPHONY CHIEF TELLS HIS PLANS

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Monsieur Henri Rabaud, late chief conductor of the Opera National de Paris, and present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard the great band which he is to command for the first time Friday and Saturday at the concerts conducted by Pierre Monteux.

"I am glad that I braved the submarines and crossed the Atlantic when my friends in Paris urged me to remain there. It is worth while to conduct such an orchestra as I have heard under the baton of my confrere Pierre Monteux.

"It is a good orchestra. A beautiful orchestra, a wonderfully trained orchestra. It will be a privilege to lead it."

LOOKS LIKE CHURCHMAN.

Rabaud told me these things in his little studio in the Hotel Hemenway, from the window of which he overlooks the Fenway. Aside from a grand piano, a huge stack of orchestral music and some photographs of his wife and four children, there is nothing to indicate that this is the workroom of the leader of the world's greatest orchestra.

And Monsieur Rabaud himself!

Well, the sage who first said you can never tell by appearances must have known about Rabaud. If you saw him walking along Tremont street, you would never mistake him for a great French musician, in fact, any kind of a musician.

Monsieur Rabaud looks exactly like the president of the Synod of the Presbyterian Churches of the district of Kansas and Iowa. He is tall and spare, wears a square, dark whisker, and affects the kind of clothes which you would expect a prosperous Kansas deacon to put on. His eye is mild and his expression austere.

If you sat opposite him in a street car, you would suspect him of ruminating on how to shut up the saloons and poolrooms instead of the proper tempo of the second Movement of Saint Saens Symphony.

PRAISES CONFERRE.

Pierre Monteux looked like a French musician with his flashing dark eyes and black mustache. He might also have passed as a pirate chief. Monsieur Rabaud would be mistaken for an American by a Frenchman on the streets of Paris, that's how unlike his job he appears.

But when Rabaud begins to talk music his austerity vanishes, and his native vivacity and enthusiasm makes you wonder how you ever got him confused with the Moderator of a town meeting west of the Mississippi.

"I can't begin to express my gratitude to Monteux for the wonderful work he did in blending the new element in the Boston orchestra so that it is the polished instrument it is at present. It was hard labor, of a sort that deserves recognition. I am so fortunate as to find my instrument already prepared."

"In your programs, are you planning to play German music?"

"I shall play the classics, of course. Who is so foolish as to confuse Mozart, Beethoven and Haydn with the spirit of Prussianism? You are doing the Huns too much credit when you call those composers Germans. They are the classics, and no true lover of music would wish to abandon them

Regarding living German composers Strauss and others, there seems to be a general opinion among musicians of the Allied nations that they ought to be ignored. Their contributions musically have been overrated, thanks to their dominance of symphonic music before the war, and while I do not deny the merit of some of their composers I feel sure we can get along without them.

"Oh, there is an emormous library of wonderful music for orchestra French composers have written, much that will interest you here in this country if you haven't already heard them. There are a number of modern Italian writers for orchestra who are doing splendid work. And the Russians. What wonderful things they have accomplished. I am particularly enraptured by Rimsky-Korsakoff. In fact I am planning to put his Spanish Caprice on my first program because it affords such wonderful opportunity to all the branches of the orchestra.

"Do you know American composers?"

Mr. Rabaud smiled and shrugged his shoulders apologetically. "By reputation I know of several, but I have heard few works by American composers played in Paris. It is my business to get acquainted with them and I intend to do so, since I have been assured that many admirable compositions have been written in this country.

At the concert of last Friday I was greatly charmed by Loeffler's "Bon Chanson," truly a meritorious work, and reflecting great credit upon its American composer."

"Do you know South American music?"

"No, alas. I have never traveled before. By an odd coincidence this Summer I was invited to go to Buenos Ayres and conduct the opera at the Theatre Colon. The bait was the promise of a performance under my direction of my opera "Marouf," which was done at the Metropolitan in New York last season. I would not go.

"But although Boston was also a long voyage, I came because the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a signal honor and the opera in Buenos Ayres not to be compared with it."

"Are you married, Monsieur Rabaud?"

"Yes, indeed. I have a wife and four children. My eldest daughter is attending college in Paris. I came alone because of the great dangers attending a transatlantic voyage at this time.

Myself I will take a chance, but to imperil my wife and children on a ship which might be destroyed by a dastardly submarine I would not do.

"These risks, by the way, were purely imaginary. The "Espagne" encountered nothing, the voyage was exceedingly comfortable and the inconveniences non existent.

"I feel sure the war will soon be over and then I shall bring my family to Boston."

n WORLD
ress: New York City
NOV 3 - 1918

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon. Both these concerts will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Monteux, through the courtesy of Giulio Gatti-Casazza, General Manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was engaged to conduct the October concerts in Boston, and when it became evident that Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, could not arrive from Paris in time properly to prepare for the first tour of the orchestra, Mr. Gatti-Casazza generously released Mr. Monteux from rehearsals at the Metropolitan so that he could conduct these concerts. His appearance on next Saturday afternoon will be the last with the Boston Symphony and on the following Monday in Boston Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the rehearsals. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Franck.....Symphony in D Minor
Schumann.....Overture to Byron's "Manfred"
Dukas.....La Peri: Poeme Danse
Debussy.....Iberia": "Images for Orchestra

Dukas's "La Peri" will be near to New York. Although it was written in 1910 and produced at the Chatelet in Paris as a poeme danse in 1912, it was not played in this country until Alfred Hertz performed it in San Francisco in January, 1916. Its next performance was in Boston ten days ago at the opening of the symphony season in that city. It is a work in modern form of great brilliancy.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Handel.....Concerto Grosso in D Major (Messrs. Fradkin and Noack, Solo Violins; Mr. Barrier, Solo Viola; Mr. Malkin, Solo Violoncello.)
Loeffler.....Poeme, "La Bonne Chanson"
D'Indy.....Symphonic Variation, "Istar"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A Major

The novelty on this programme will be Martin Loeffler's poem "La Bonne Chanson." As the title indicates, the composer has drawn his inspration from the poem of the same name by Paul Verlaine. It was written originally fifteen or sixteen years ago and had one performance at a Symphony concert in Boston under Mr. Gericke. Then the composer withdrew it for revision. That revision was not made until last summer, and the work has just been played the past week in Boston for the first time in its new form.

PRESS REPORTS ON RABAUD IN BOSTON

NEWS

ss: Baltimore, Md.

HENRI RABAUD REACHES U. S.

Boston Orchestra Conductor Speaks No English, But Hopes To Learn.

(From the New York Times.)

Among the passengers arriving at an Atlantic port from France, on a French steamship, was Henri Rabaud, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has come over to replace Dr. Karl Muck. Mr. Rabaud has been for some years the musical director of the orchestra at the National Opera House, Paris, and is the composer of the French opera "Marouf," performed last season in New York, as well as of a symphony already heard here, and of several symphonic poems. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894 for the excellence of his musical works.

The new director of the Boston Symphony does not in any way look like the customary leader of an orchestra. He is tall, slight, has gray hair, mustache and whiskers, and wears a frock coat, with a somewhat clerical type of wide-brimmed, soft hat. He does not speak any English at present, he explained, but hopes to learn during the coming season in America

ENQUIRER

ss: Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming season will open tomorrow morning, at George T. Haly's ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. The concerts will be given as usual in the Academy of Music, and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings, except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

Philadelphia, since 1886, has been one of the most loyal supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it will be good news to those who have been going to the concerts for so many years to know that the orchestra will return here in better condition than it has ever been. There has been an extensive reorganization since last spring, and about 25 per cent. of the personnel is new.

As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert, as the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare the programme for this trip. Mr. Rabaud is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts.

Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master, and Arthur Rubinstein.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 23 1918

WILL BE SOLOIST AT FIRST BOSTON CONCERT

Florence Easton

Florence Easton will make her initial appearance in Baltimore as soloist at the concert at the Lyric on November 6, which will mark the return to this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of a year. Miss Easton is one of the leading sopranos of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company.

PUBLIC LEDGER

s Philadelphia, Pa.

The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming season will open tomorrow at Heppe's, 1119 Chestnut street. The concerts will be given as usual in the Acadedy of Music, and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings, except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

About 25 per cent of the personnel is new.

m EVENING TELEGRAM

lress Philadelphia, Pa.

e

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts here this season will be given as usual in the Academy of Music and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

There has been an extensive reorganization since last spring and about 25 per cent of the orchestra's personnel is new. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians. The prevailing influenza compelled the postponement of the Boston season for two weeks, but rehearsals were held daily.

Pierre Monteux, French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert. Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor of the orchestra, is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts. The soloists will be Florence Fradkin, violinist; and Arthur Rubenstein, pianist.

STAR

ress: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater a week from next Wednesday evening, November 6. The return of this famous band will be warmly welcomed by the music lovers of Paltimore. Reports from Boston show that the reorganization made necessary by war conditions has involved no sacrifice in the efficiency of the orchestra. On the contrary, the belief is general that in tonal beauty, mastery of routine and technique, it is in better shape than it has ever been.

This first concert will have as conductor Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Mr. Monteux is one of the most distinguished of contemporary French conductors, and he was specially engaged, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra up to November 11, at which time Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, will take hold. Mr. Rabaud has just reached this country and is in Boston preparing his programs for the season.

The first concert of the season promises much pleasure. The soloist will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who has made such a profound impression in New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. A remarkable singer, a most excellent musician, and the possessor of a most attractive personality, Madame Easton is a valuable addition to the musical forces of this country.

From EVENING MAIL

Address: New York City

Date

A Broad-minded French

Henri Rabaud, successor to the Muck as conductor of the Boston chestra, impresses the American p with his plea for German music in of his notable organization for the Speaking for a race which always the land of art as a republic, th Frenchman says:

Why should we not play beaut Beethoven's C Minor Symphony?

M. Rabaud is an artist of the as a composer and as a conductor. given at the Metropolitan Opera House last season and included in the programme at that institution for the coming season, marks him as a composer of high inspiration and broad artistic sympathy.

M. Rabaud's advocacy of German music—not of the belligerently Germanic type of Wagner's works, but of a school that knew not Wagner and the malignant outreachings of German imperialism —will appeal strongly to many music lovers in America.

n NORTH AMERICAN

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 20

e

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL GIVE FIVE CONCERTS HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will give five concerts here at the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All of these concerts come on Monday evenings except that in February, which will be given on a Wednesday evening.

Four soloists announced are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba; Frederic Fradkin, violinist, who is also concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubenstein, the Russian pianist, who toured America half a dozen years ago, when scarcely 19 years old.

As the result of extensive reorganization and other changes brought about by the war, about 25 per cent of the personnel is new. The new musicians are said to be, for the most part, young and enthusiastic men, and those who have heard the early recitals of the orchestra this year declare that its tonal quality has never been more beautiful in the past than now, and that the discipline and technical skill have never been higher.

Pierre Monteux, the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company will conduct the November concert here as the arrival from France of Mr. Rabaud, the permanent conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare for this first trip.

188

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,

WEEK-END CONCERTS

A SATURDAY AND SUNDAY FULL TO BRIM

Mr. Monteux Takes Leave of His Bostonian Public—Mr. Heifetz, the Violinist, in Form but Not Quite His Fullest and Finest Self—The Novel Spanish Pieces of Mr. Laparra and Mme. Stanley—Mr. McCormack to a Rejoicing Audience

THOUGH Mr. Monteux will lead the Symphony Orchestra this week in its concerts at New York and other cities southward, he took leave, for the present, of its Bostonian public at Symphony Hall on Saturday evening. Listeners for the occasion as well as subscribers were assembled in the audience—clear evidence of the interest he has kindled and maintained as conductor in the community at large. At every turn the company was sincerely cordial to Mr. Monteux, applauding him at his coming to his place and at many a pause in the progress of the concert, lingering to recall him at the end, clapping him most of all when, with Mr. Loeffler rising in his place in the balcony, he divided the plaudits that rewarded the composer's tone-poem, "Le Bonre Chanson." The conductor received these compliments with unaffected modesty and an air of gentle satisfaction; yet nowhere in America and at no time during the two years he has spent in this country has he been so heartily and honestly applauded as in Boston during the past fortnight. The audiences hearing him with the Russian Ballet had neither eyes nor ears for the mere leader of its orchestra. At the Metropolitan he has been caught as a useful and dependable lever into that opera-making machine. Here in Boston, for the first time on this side of the Atlantic, he has tasted the sweets of prestige and deserved them. If the crucial concerts next Thursday and Saturday in New York—crucial for both orchestra and conductor—go as well as there is reason to expect, Mr. Monteux will return to the opera house acclaimed, laurelled.

Early last summer, before the company and the schedules of the Metropolitan were definitely settled for the present season, the trustees of the Boston Orchestra could, in all probability, have engaged Mr. Monteux as conductor of its concerts for a full musical year. But they, like the rest of us, were no diviners of the abilities he would prove in a new post and of the warmth with which the public would receive him in it. Even he himself may hardly have foreseen the change that a free hand, a fine and responsive instrument, large opportunity and congenial atmosphere were to make in him. As it is, he will abide in Bostonian memory as the conductor who has reared the new Symphony Orchestra in the image of the old and bettered the reflection. The men of the band will remember him as a gently insistent, politely exacting master who refused to be content until he had exactly gained his end. The listeners of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings will recall him as a leader who shaped interesting programmes under the hampering conditions of wartime, who heard orchestra and composer with an ear of rare sensibility, and who in unusual degree fused in his conducting intelligence with imagination, apt detail with large design, exceeding finesse with sweeping power. With both orchestra and audiences recollection will long linger of Mr. Monteux as a wholly sincere, modest, ingratiating personality. It is much to be admired; it is something also to be liked.

AMERICAN- NOVEMBER 4

NEW SYMPHONY CHIEF TELLS HIS PLANS

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Monsieur Henri Rabaud, late chief conductor of the Opera National de Paris, and present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard the great band which he is to command for the first time Friday and Saturday at the concerts conducted by Pierre Monteux.

"I am glad that I braved the submarines and crossed the Atlantic when my friends in Paris urged me to remain there. It is worth while to conduct such an orchestra as I have heard under the baton of my confrere Pierre Monteux.

"It is a good orchestra. A beautiful orchestra, a wonderfully trained orchestra. It will be a privilege to lead it."

LOOKS LIKE CHURCHMAN.

Rabaud told me these things in his little studio in the Hotel Hemenway, from the window of which he overlooks the Fenway. Aside from a grand piano, a huge stack of orchestral music and some photographs of his wife and four children, there is nothing to indicate that this is the workroom of the leader of the world's greatest orchestra.

And Monsieur Rabaud himself!

Well, the sage who first said you can never tell by appearances must have known about Rabaud. If you saw him walking along Tremont street, you would never mistake him for a great French musician, in fact, any kind of a musician.

Monsieur Rabaud looks exactly like the president of the Synod of the Presbyterian Churches of the district of Kansas and Iowa. He is tall and spare, wears a square, dark whisker, and affects the kind of clothes which you would expect a prosperous Kansas deacon to put on. His eye is mild and his expression austere.

If you sat opposite him in a street car, you would suspect him of ruminating on how to shut up the saloons and poolrooms instead of the proper tempo of the second Movement of Saint Saens Symphony.

PRAISES CONFERRE.

Pierre Monteux looked like a French musician with his flashing dark eyes and black mustache. He might also have passed as a pirate chief. Monsieur Rabaud would be mistaken for an American by a Frenchman on the streets of Paris, that's how unlike his job he appears.

But when Rabaud begins to talk music his austerity vanishes, and his native vivacity and enthusiasm makes you wonder how you ever got him confused with the Moderator of a town meeting west of the Mississippi.

"I can't begin to express my gratitude to Monteux for the wonderful work he did in blending the new element in the Boston orchestra so that it is the polished instrument it is at present. It was hard labor, of a sort that deserves recognition. I am so fortunate as to find my instrument already prepared."

"In your programs, are you planning to play German music?"

"I shall play the classics, of course. Who is so foolish as to confuse Mozart, Beethoven and Haydn with the spirit of Prussianism? You are doing the Huns too much credit when you call those composers Germans. They are the classics, and no true lover of music would wish to abandon them

Regarding living German composers Strauss and others, there seems to be a general opinion among musicians of the Allied nations that they ought to be ignored. Their contributions musically have been overrated, thanks to their dominance of symphonic music before the war, and while I do not deny the merit of some of their composers I feel sure we can get along without them.

"Oh, there is an enormous library of wonderful music for orchestra French composers have written, much that will interest you here in this country if you haven't already heard them. There are a number of modern Italian composers for orchestra who are doing splendid work. And the Russians. What wonderful things they have accomplished. I am particularly enraptured by Rimsky-Korsakoff. In fact I am planning to put his Spanish Caprice on my first program because it affords such wonderful opportunity to all the branches of the orchestra.

"Do you know American composers?"

Mr. Rabaud smiled and shrugged his shoulders apologetically. "By reputation I know of several, but I have heard few works by American composers played in Paris. It is my business to get acquainted with them and I intend to do so, since I have been assured that many admirable compositions have been written in this country.

At the concert of last Friday I was greatly charmed by Loeffler's "Bon Chanson," truly a meritorious work, and reflecting great credit upon its American composer."

"Do you know South American music?"

"No, alas. I have never traveled before. By an odd coincidence this Summer I was invited to go to Buenos Ayres and conduct the opera at the Theatre Colon. The bait was the promise of a performance under my direction of my opera "Marouf," which was done at the Metropolitan in New York last season. I would not go.

"But although Boston was also a long voyage, I came because the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a signal honor and the opera in Buenos Ayres not to be compared with it."

"Are you married, Monsieur Rabaud?"

"Yes, indeed. I have a wife and four children. My eldest daughter is attending college in Paris. I came alone because of the great dangers attending a transatlantic voyage at this time.

Myself I will take a chance, but to imperil my wife and children on a ship which might be destroyed by a dastardly submarine I would not do.

"These risks, by the way, were purely imaginary. The "Espagne" encountered nothing, the voyage was exceedingly comfortable and the inconveniences non existent.

"I feel sure the war will soon be over and then I shall bring my family to Boston."

n WORLD

ress: New York City

e

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon. Both these concerts will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Monteux, through the courtesy of Giulio Gatti-Casazza, General Manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was engaged to conduct the October concerts in Boston, and when it became evident that Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, could not arrive from Paris in time properly to prepare for the first tour of the orchestra, Mr. Gatti-Casazza generously released Mr. Monteux from rehearsals at the Metropolitan so that he could conduct these concerts. His appearance on next Saturday afternoon will be the last with the Boston Symphony and on the following Monday in Boston Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the rehearsals. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Franck.....Symphony in D Minor
Schumann.....Overture to Byron's "Manfred"
Dukas.....La Peri: Poeme Dansé
Debussy.....Ibéria: Images for Orchestra

Dukas's "La Peri" will be near to New York. Although it was written in 1910 and produced at the Chatelet in Paris as a poeme danse in 1912, it was not played in this country until Alfred Hertz performed it in San Francisco in January, 1916. Its next performance was in Boston ten days ago at the opening of the symphony season in that city. It is a work in modern form of great brilliancy.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Handel.....Concerto Grosso in D Major (Messrs. Fradkin and Noack, Solo Violins; Mr. Barber, Solo Viola; Mr. Malkin, Solo Violoncello)
Loeffler.....Poème: "La Bonne Chanson"
Dukas.....Symphonic Variation "Alcar"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A Major

The novelty on this programme will be Martin Loeffler's poem "La Bonne Chanson." As the title indicates, the composer has drawn his inspiration from the poem of the same name by Paul Verlaine. It was written originally fifteen or sixteen years ago and had one performance at a Symphony concert in Boston under Mr. Gericke. Then the composer withdrew it for revision. That revision was not made until last summer, and the work has just been played the past week in Boston for the first time in its new form.

PRESS REPORTS ON RABAUD IN BOSTON

NEWS

ss: Baltimore, Md.

OCT 7 1918

HENRI RABAUD REACHES U. S.

Boston Orchestra Conductor Speaks No English, But Hopes To Learn.

(From the New York Times.)

Among the passengers arriving at an Atlantic port from France, on a French steamship, was Henri Rabaud, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has come over to replace Dr. Karl Muck. Mr. Rabaud has been for some years the musical director of the orchestra at the National Opera House, Paris, and is the composer of the French opera "Marouf," performed last season in New York, as well as of a symphony already heard here, and of several symphonic poems. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894 for the excellence of his musical works.

The new director of the Boston Symphony does not in any way look like the customary leader of an orchestra. He is tall, slight, has gray hair, mustache and whiskers, and wears a frock coat, with a somewhat clerical type of wide-brimmed, soft hat. He does not speak any English at present, he explained, but hopes to learn during the coming season in America.

ENQUIRER

ss: Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming season will open tomorrow morning, at George T. Haly's ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. The concerts will be given as usual in the Academy of Music, and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings, except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

Philadelphia, since 1886, has been one of the most loyal supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it will be good news to those who have been going to the concerts for so many years to know that the orchestra will return here in better condition than it has ever been. There has been an extensive reorganization since last spring, and about 25 per cent. of the personnel is new.

As is generally known, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert, as the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare the programme for this trip. Mr. Rabaud is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts.

Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba, Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master, and Arthur Rubinstein.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 23 1918

WILL BE SOLOIST AT FIRST BOSTON CONCERT

Florence Easton

Florence Easton will make her initial appearance in Baltimore as soloist at the concert at the Lyric on November 6, which will mark the return to this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of a year. Miss Easton is one of the leading sopranos of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company.

PUBLIC LEDGER

s Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 6 1918

The general public sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming season will open tomorrow at Heppe's, 1119 Chestnut street. The concerts will be given as usual in the Acadedy of Music, and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings, except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

About 25 per cent of the personnel is new.

m EVENING TELEGRAM

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

e OCT 19 1918

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts here this season will be given as usual in the Academy of Music and the dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All these concerts come on Monday evenings except that in February, when the concert falls on a Wednesday evening. This slight change is due to unavoidable complications in booking.

There has been an extensive reorganization since last spring and about 25 per cent of the orchestra's personnel is new. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians. The prevailing influenza compelled the postponement of the Boston season for two weeks, but rehearsals were held daily.

Pierre Monteux, French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will conduct the November concert. Mr. Rabaud, the new French conductor of the orchestra, is expected the end of this month and he will conduct the other four concerts. The soloists will be Florence Fradkin, violinist; and Arthur Rubenstein, pianist.

a STAR

ress: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater a week from next Wednesday evening, November 6. The return of this famous band will be warmly welcomed by the music lovers of Paltimore. Reports from Boston show that the reorganization made necessary by war conditions has involved no sacrifice in the efficiency of the orchestra. On the contrary, the belief is general that in tonal beauty, mastery of routine and technique, it is in better shape than it has ever been.

This first concert will have as conductor Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Mr. Monteux is one of the most distinguished of contemporary French conductors, and he was specially engaged, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra up to November 11, at which time Henri Rabaud, the permanent conductor, will take hold. Mr. Rabaud has just reached this country and is in Boston preparing his programs for the season.

The first concert of the season promises much pleasure. The soloist will be Florence Easton, the English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who has made such a profound impression in New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. A remarkable singer, a most excellent musician, and the possessor of a most attractive personality, Madame Easton is a valuable addition to the musical forces of this country.

From EVENING MAIL

Address: New York City

Date OCT 1

A Broad-minded French

Henri Rabaud, successor to the Muck as conductor of the Boston chestra, impresses the American p with his plea for German music in of his notable organization for the Speaking for a race which always the land of art as a republic, th Frenchman says:

Why should we not play beaut Beethoven's C Minor Symphony?

M. Rabaud is an artist of the as a composer and as a conductor. given at the Metropolitan Opera House last season and included in the programme at that institution for the coming season, marks him as a composer of high inspiration and broad artistic sympathy.

M. Rabaud's advocacy of German music—not of the belligerently Germanic type of Wagner's works, but of a school that knew not Wagner and the malignant outreachings of German imperialism —will appeal strongly to many music lovers in America.

n NORTH AMERICAN

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 20 1918

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL GIVE FIVE CONCERTS HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will give five concerts here at the Academy of Music on November 4, December 2, January 6, February 5 and March 17. All of these concerts come on Monday evenings except that in February, which will be given on a Wednesday evening.

Four soloists announced are Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Madame Melba; Frederic Fradkin, violinist, who is also concertmaster of the orchestra, and Arthur Rubenstein, the Russian pianist, who toured America half a dozen years ago, when scarcely 19 years old.

As the result of extensive reorganization and other changes brought about by the war, about 25 per cent of the personnel is new. The new musicians are said to be, for the most part, young and enthusiastic men, and those who have heard the early recitals of the orchestra this year declare that its tonal quality has never been more beautiful in the past than now, and that the discipline and technical skill have never been higher.

Pierre Monteux, the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company will conduct the November concert here as the arrival from France of Mr. Rabaud, the permanent conductor, will be too late for him properly to prepare for this first trip.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,

WEEK-END CONCERTS

A SATURDAY AND SUNDAY FULL TO BRIM

Mr. Monteux Takes Leave of His Bostonian Public—Mr. Heifetz, the Violinist, in Form but Not Quite His Fullest and Finest Self—The Novel Spanish Pieces of Mr. Laparra and Mme. Stanley—Mr. McCormack to a Rejoicing Audience

THOUGH Mr. Monteux will lead the Symphony Orchestra this week in its concerts at New York and other cities southward, he took leave, for the present, of its Bostonian public at Symphony Hall on Saturday evening. Listeners for the occasion as well as subscribers were assembled in the audience—clear evidence of the interest he has kindled and maintained as conductor in the community at large. At every turn the company was sincerely cordial to Mr. Monteux, applauding him at his coming to his place and at many a pause in the progress of the concert, lingering to recall him at the end, clapping him most of all when, with Mr. Loeffler rising in his place in the balcony, he divided the plaudits that rewarded the composer's tone-poem, "Le Bonre Chanson." The conductor received these compliments with unaffected modesty and an air of gentle satisfaction; yet nowhere in America and at no time during the two years he has spent in this country has he been so heartily and honestly applauded as in Boston during the past fortnight. The audiences hearing him with the Russian Ballet had neither eyes nor ears for the mere leader of its orchestra. At the Metropolitan he has been caught as a useful and dependable lever into that opera-making machine. Here in Boston, for the first time on this side of the Atlantic, he has tasted the sweets of prestige and deserved them. If the crucial concerts next Thursday and Saturday in New York—crucial for both orchestra and conductor—go as well as there is reason to expect, Mr. Monteux will return to the opera house acclaimed, laurelled.

Early last summer, before the company and the schedules of the Metropolitan were definitely settled for the present season, the trustees of the Boston Orchestra could, in all probability, have engaged Mr. Monteux as conductor of its concerts for a full musical year. But they, like the rest of us, were no diviners of the abilities he would prove in a new post and of the warmth with which the public would receive him in it. Even he himself may hardly have foreseen the change that a free hand, a fine and responsive instrument, large opportunity and congenial atmosphere were to make in him. As it is, he will abide in Bostonian memory as the conductor who has reared the new Symphony Orchestra in the image of the old and bettered the reflection. The men of the band will remember him as a gently insistent, politely exacting master who refused to be content until he had exactly gained his end. The listeners of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings will recall him as a leader who shaped interesting programmes under the hampering conditions of wartime, who heard orchestra and composer with an ear of rare sensibility, and who in unusual degree fused in his conducting intelligence with imagination, apt detail with large design, exceeding finesse with sweeping power. With both orchestra and audiences recollection will long linger of Mr. Monteux as a wholly sincere, modest, ingratiating personality. It is much to be admired; it is something also to be liked.

AMERICAN—NOVEMBER 4

NEW SYMPHONY CHIEF TELLS HIS PLANS

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Monsieur Henri Rabaud, late chief conductor of the Opera National de Paris, and present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard the great band which he is to command for the first time Friday and Saturday at the concerts conducted by Pierre Monteux.

"I am glad that I braved the submarines and crossed the Atlantic when my friends in Paris urged me to remain there. It is worth while to conduct such an orchestra as I have heard under the baton of my confrere Pierre Monteux.

"It is a good orchestra. A beautiful orchestra, a wonderfully trained orchestra. It will be a privilege to lead it."

LOOKS LIKE CHURCHMAN.

Rabaud told me these things in his little studio in the Hotel Hemenway, from the window of which he overlooks the Fenway. Aside from a grand piano, a huge stack of orchestral music and some photographs of his wife and four children, there is nothing to indicate that this is the workroom of the leader of the world's greatest orchestra.

And Monsieur Rabaud himself!

Well, the sage who first said you can never tell by appearances must have known about Rabaud. If you saw him walking along Tremont street, you would never mistake him for a great French musician, in fact, any kind of a musician.

Monsieur Rabaud looks exactly like the president of the Synod of the Presbyterian Churches of the district of Kansas and Iowa. He is tall and spare, wears a square, dark whisker, and affects the kind of clothes which you would expect a prosperous Kansas deacon to put on. His eye is mild and his expression austere.

If you sat opposite him in a street car, you would suspect him of ruminating on how to shut up the saloons and poolrooms instead of the proper tempo of the second Movement of Saint Saens Symphony.

PRAISES CONFERRE.

Pierre Monteux looked like a French musician with his flashing dark eyes and black mustache. He might also have passed as a pirate chief. Monsieur Rabaud would be mistaken for an American by a Frenchman on the streets of Paris, that's how unlike his job he appears.

But when Rabaud begins to talk music his austerity vanishes, and his native vivacity and enthusiasm makes you wonder how you ever got him confused with the Moderator of a town meeting west of the Mississippi.

"I can't begin to express my gratitude to Monteux for the wonderful work he did in blending the new element in the Boston orchestra so that it is the polished instrument it is at present. It was hard labor, of a sort that deserves recognition. I am so fortunate as to find my instrument already prepared."

"In your programs, are you planning to play German music?"

"I shall play the classics, of course. Who is so foolish as to confuse Mozart, Beethoven and Haydn with the spirit of Prussianism? You are doing the Huns too much credit when you call those composers Germans. They are the classics, and no true lover of music would wish to abandon them.

Regarding living German composers Strauss and others, there seems to be a general opinion among musicians of the Allied nations that they ought to be ignored. Their contributions musically have been overrated, thanks to their dominance of symphonic music before the war, and while I do not deny the merit of some of their composers I feel sure we can get along without them.

"Oh, there is an enormous library of wonderful music for orchestra French composers have written, much that will interest you here in this country if you haven't already heard them. There are a number of modern Italian writers for orchestra who are doing splendid work. And the Russians. What wonderful things they have accomplished. I am particularly enraptured by Rimsky-Korsakoff. In fact I am planning to put his Spanish Caprice on my first program because it affords such wonderful opportunity to all the branches of the orchestra.

"Do you know American composers?"

Mr. Rabaud smiled and shrugged his shoulders apologetically. "By reputation I know of several, but I have heard few works by American composers played in Paris. It is my business to get acquainted with them and I intend to do so, since I have been assured that many admirable compositions have been written in this country.

At the concert of last Friday I was greatly charmed by Loeffler's "Bon Chanson," truly a meritorious work.

m WORLD

ress: New York City

e NOV 3 - 1918

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon. Both these concerts will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Monteux, through the courtesy of Giulio Gatti-Casazza, General Manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was engaged to conduct the October concerts in Boston, and when it became evident that Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, could not arrive from Paris in time properly to prepare for the first tour of the orchestra, Mr. Gatti-Casazza generously released Mr. Monteux from rehearsals at the Metropolitan so that he could conduct these concerts. His appearance on next Saturday afternoon will be the last with the Boston Symphony and on the following Monday in Boston Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the

The programme for evening is as follows:

.....Symphony in D Minor
....Overture to Byron's "Manfred"
.....La Peri: Poeme Dense
....."Iberia": "Images for Orchestra
s "La Peri" will be near to York. Although it was written 0 and produced at the Chatelet aris as a poeme danse in 1912, it not played in this country until ed Hertz performed it in San ancisco in January, 1916. Its next performance was in Boston ten days ago at the opening of the symphony season in that city. It is a work in modern form of great brilliancy.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Handel.....Concerto Grosso in D Major (Messrs. Fradkin and Noack, Solo Violins; Mr. Barrier, Solo Viola; Mr. Mathis, Solo Violoncello.)
Loeffler.....Poeme, "La Bonne Chanson"
D'Indy.....Symphonic Variations, "Istar"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A Major

The novelty on this programme will be Martin Loeffler's poem "La Bonne Chanson." As the title indicates, the composer has drawn his inspration from the poem of the same name by Paul Verlaine. It was written originally fifteen or sixteen years ago and had one performance at a Symphony concert in Boston under Mr. Gericke. Then the composer withdrew it for revision. That revision was not made until last summer, and the work has just been played the past week in Boston for the first time in its new form.

and reflecting great credit upon its American composer."

"Do you know South American music?"

"No, alas. I have never traveled before. By an odd coincidence this Summer I was invited to go to Buenos Ayres and conduct the opera at the Theatre Colon. The bait was the promise of a performance under my direction of my opera "Marouf," which was done at the Metropolitan in New York last season. I would not go.

"But although Boston was also a long voyage, I came because the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a signal honor and the opera in Buenos Ayres not to be compared with it."

"Are you married, Monsieur Rabaud?"

"Yes, indeed. I have a wife and four children. My eldest daughter is attending college in Paris. I came alone because of the great dangers attending a transatlantic voyage at this time.

Myself I will take a chance, but to imperil my wife and children on a ship which might be destroyed by a dastardly submarine I would not do.

"These risks, by the way, were purely imaginary. The "Espagne" encountered nothing, the voyage was exceedingly comfortable and the inconveniences non existent.

"I feel sure the war will soon be over and then I shall bring my family to Boston."

PRESS REPORTS ON RABAUD IN BOSTON

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ell Sage === Boston's Distinguished French Visitors

A Trinity of Great French Conductors en Famille in Boston

(By Courtesy of the Boston Sunday Pos

That Boston Reached a Musical Perihelion Last Week Is Well Illustrated Above

She May Well Feel Proud of Bringing So Celebrated a Group Together. From Left to Right They Are: Andre Messager, Conductor of the Paris Conservatoire; Mrs. Pierre Monteux; Miss Denise Monteux; Pierre Monteux, Who Has Been Leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Alfred Cortot, French Pianist-Composer; Henri Rabaud, New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

TIMES

New York City

INTERNATIONAL ORCHESTRA

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town this week under its new allied leadership by Monteux, soon to yield to Rabaud, and with permanent guarantees by a board of Major Higginson's fellow-townsmen, it will open all its concerts here by playing "The Star-Spangled Banner," says a private message today. More than a score of the players are new, but the quality of the premier band has been tried out in a month of rehearsals and recently in concerts at home.

Frederick S. Converse has prepared the Boston version of America's anthem, and Mr. Monteux himself asked permission to add two bars to Mr. Converse's orchestral arrangement, which is said to be a full harmonization, in place of last year's broadly simple air from Herbert's "American Fantasy." The song was then varied only with a few scale passages that on one Philadelphia visit aroused the comment of "contrapuntal camouflage." The Boston men, by the way, for the first time in a year, are this week revisiting both Washington and Baltimore.

New York Entertains Frenchmen.

The orchestra of the Symphony Society of New York will entertain the orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire at supper late this Sunday evening, after the concert of the French orchestra at Carnegie Hall. Manager George Engles mentions that the musical program after the supper will be "anti-symphonic," including a Debussy travesty by George Barrère, returned for the occasion, and moving pictures taken by Emil Mix, double bass, on last Spring's transcontinental tour.

The entente cordiale has been thoroughly established, it is said, between the two conductors of the New York and Paris orchestras, inasmuch as M. Messager plays Mr. Damrosch's arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner" at all of his concerts, and Mr. Damrosch returns the compliment by playing M. Messager's arrangement of "La Marseillaise."

Boston Also Has Added Players.

Many changes have been made in the Boston Symphony by the dismissal of more than twenty Teutonic subjects. "The presence in America of the famous French Military Band enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to secure several of its leading members," says W. H. Brennan, now the manager in place of C. A. Ellis, who quit with his chief at the time of the "dropping of the pilot," Major Higginson. Among the strings, Frederic Fradkin heads the first violins; Edward Tak the second, M. Barrier of Paris the violas, and Joseph Malkin of New York the 'cellos. A few woodwinds are new, while the brass is as before.

New Men in All the Orchestras

The New York Symphony Society has just announced the appointment of a new concertmaster, Gustave Tinlot, and first viola, René Pollain, both members of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, which is now visiting New York. Previously announced are a new first flute, Daniel Maquarre, from the Philadelphia Orchestra, and first 'cellist, Willem Willeke, formerly of the Kneisel Quartet. Other new "first" instruments are Samuel Miller, trumpet; Walter Lilleback, trombone; Scipione Guidi, assistant concertmaster, and Dirk Gootjes, principal second violin.

The Philharmonic Society has five new men, two among its first violins, H. Corduan and R. Baravalle; one second violin, Fedor Draesin, a Russian; one 'cellist, Gaston Dubois, a Belgian, and J. Lolito, harp.

From HERALD

Address: New York City

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, regenerated and reformed, which, under the temporary direction of Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, until Henri Rabaud takes permanent control, has made a triumphant beginning at Boston this season, gives its first pair of New York concerts at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The programme for Thursday comprises César Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, Dukas' "La Périe" and Debussy's Orchestral Images, "Iberia." For Saturday the programme includes Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson," Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

m EVENING POST

dress: New York City

e

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon. Both these concerts will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. His appearance on next Saturday afternoon will be the last with the Boston Symphony, and on the following Monday in Boston Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the rehearsals. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor; Schumann, Overture to Byron's "Manfred"; Dukas, "La Peri: Poème Danse"; Debussy, "Iberia"; "Images" for orchestra.

Dukas's "La Peri" will be new to New York. Although it was written in 1910 and produced at the Châtelet in Paris as a poème danse in 1912, it was not played in this country until Alfred Hertz performed it in San Francisco in January, 1916.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, in D major; Loeffler, Poème, "La Bonne Chanson"; D'Indy, Symphonic Variations "Istar"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, in A major.

The novelty of this programme will be Loeffler's poème "La Bonne Chanson," after the poem by Paul Verlaine. It was written originally fifteen or sixteen years ago and had one performance at a symphony concert in Boston under Mr. Gericke. Then the composer withdrew it for revision, which was made last summer.

of

Pierre Monteux, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Thursday

From TIMES

Address: New York City

Date

The Boston Symphony's first matinée next Saturday in Carnegie Hall is to present several of the new members, Fradkin, Barrier, Malkin, among the strings in Handel's Concerto Grosso in D-major; the American C. M. Loeffler's unfamiliar tone poem, "La Bonne Chanson"; d'Indy's "Istar," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

884

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 8.

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Symphony Orchestra Returns, Not Too Auspiciously, to New York—Band and Conductor Variously Viewed—Mr. Rabaud's First Programmes—Mr. Hofmann's Return—Items and Opinions

PLAYING in New York for the first time last evening, the reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra underwent a test no whit less exacting than it had undergone at home two weeks before, and one, besides, likely to set both band and conductor on nervous edge. Mr. Monteux, fresh from the garnered praises of Boston, was to meet an audience that knew him only as a conductor of the theatre and which there had taken him only as a cog in a big and busy operati: wheel. The new orchestra, in turn, was to face an audience sure to be quick with comparisons. Evidently, for all concerned the concert was uneasy occasion, to inevitable detriment of the outcome. Trying to do his best, nearly every one from the conductor downward, overdid himself. Moreover, the din of the street filled with a merry crowd celtbrating the end of the war, penetrated Carnegie Hall; while the audience plainly shared some of the excitement without delaying the beginning of the concert until it had heard the national airs of the victors.

The reviewers for the New York newspapers judge variously the quality of the reorganized orchestra, but not one of them thinks well of Mr. Monteux, who in the stress of the moment, must have been another conductor to what he was in Boston. Frankly, they counted him unequal to his post. Writing in The Times, Mr. Huneker is kindest:

> The new band from Boston is still the old band, and there were moments, nay stretches, when the strings were celestial, the woodwind euphonious as no other orchestra's, and the brass, both massive and mellow. Nevertheless, one had the unmistakable sensation that the entire symphony of Franck was overblown. The new and temporary conductor, Mr. Monteux, was at the head of the famous orchestra. A familiar figure his: New York has known and liked him at our Opera House. His routine in operatic work doubtless led him to transpose to the symphonic region something of broader tonal masses, something of tendency to shifting rhythms. There was less balance of the various instrumental choirs than a certain aiming at picturesque, even sweeping effects, in a word, operatic. In Schumann's "Manfred" Overture Mr. Monteux's reading did not reveal the eloquence, stammering as it sometimes is, of the composer. The conductor received a warm greeting from a large audience, both modish and musical. We await with curiosity his second and last concert tomorrow afternoon. and search for gratify ny Symphony Orchestra was dispelled after the orous chords. Our musical y breathed easier last night.

un, Mr. Henderson is more severe, writing:

> Mr. Monteux, who conducted, is a fortunately temporary leader of the Boston forces. Possibly for that reason it might not be amiss to defer analytical consideration of the reconstructed orchestra till it is heard under Mr. Rabaud. Of a certainty, all old friends of the gentlemen from Boston will hope that they will not contract a habit of playing as they played in Franck's symphony. It was a very vigorous, not to say robustious, reading that Mr. Monteux gave, deficient in delicate shades of color, insistent in style, overdrawn in most respects and sadly opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts. All the crystalline clarity, the sunny tone quality and the exquisite precision of the old orchestra were missing. There was more smoothness in the number from Schumann, the overture to Byron's "Manfred," but there was little vitality of tone and a want of shading throughout.

Tribune—The organization comes back to us "as chastened and not killed," as Paul remarked to the Corinthians. It brings with it on this visit M. Pierre Monteux, of whose excellence as an operatic conductor the local public was well advised. Nevertheless it is a pleasure to say of him that in his new capacity he seemed as admirable as in that in which he had already won our admiration. It was a happy dispensation which brought him to us on a night when we could think of the gentleman interned at Oglethorpe with some of the goodwill which filled all hearts and yet with no regret that he was not at the head of a purged and purified organization. Purged and purified, but neither bettered nor worsened as much as was hoped and feared. The wind choirs have suffered, both wood and brass, but that they are still capable is incontestable, and that M. Monteux has worked something like a miracle with the band is incontestable. Last night's audience, a fine one in number and character, was not in a captious mood, however, rejoiced in the opportunity to hear the organization. The performance of the symphoney might under ordinary circumstances have tempted a comparison of reading and execution with the work done recently under M. Messager by the orchestra of the Conservatory. But we forbear beyond saying that while there was not finesse in the performance of the Frenchmen there was less academic rigidity and more virility in that of the band from Boston.

Programmes in Prospect

Three pieces fill the programme in which on Friday afternoon, Nov. 15 and Saturday evening, Nov. 16, Mr. Rabaud will conduct for the first times before the public of the Symphony Concerts. They are Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, last heard here in the final concerts of May; Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," unknown to Bostonian ears for many a year and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," long a hallowed piece for the display of the virtuosity of an orchestra and a conductor. On Thursday evening, Nov. 14, when in Cambridge, Mr. Rabaud conducts for the first time on this side of the Atlantic, three orchestral numbers will be the "Eroica" symphony as aforesaid; Franck's tone poem, "The Daughters of Æolus" and Weber's overture to his opera, "Euryanthe." Mme. Alcock, the alto singer, will also be heard in airs from Händel's "Nerxes" and Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah."

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
2.5 mm 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
2.0 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
1.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
4.5 mm 1234567890

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, NOVEMBER 10

Rabaud to Lead Next Symphony Concert

THE third pair of Symphony concerts, which will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, are exciting unwonted interest. At these concerts the Symphony patrons will hear the orchestra for the first time under its new permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud.

In Boston, as in Cambridge on Thursday night, Mr. Rabaud opens his program with the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, thus paying tribute at the very beginning to what he calls "the beauty of the classics." In the second part of the program will be found the unfamiliar symphonic poem of Saint Saens, "The Youth of Hercules," and the second Rimsky Korsakoff's brilliant "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

POST, NOVEMBER 1

Boston Symphony's Director Far Excels Muck, Says Olin Downes

BY OLIN DOWNES

Our New York brethren did not like either the tone quality or, particularly, the conducting of Mr. Monteux when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season last Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. Some people are hard to please. Mr. Huneker, now writing for the New York Times, had "the unmistakable sensation that the entire symphony of Franck was overblown." Mr. Henderson of the Sun found the reading of the same symphony "very vigorous, not to say robustious . . . deficient in delicate shades of color, insistent in style, overdrawn in most respects and sadly opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts. All the crystalline clarity, the sunny tone quality and the exquisite precision of the old orchestra were missing."

"Exquisite precision!" But in none of the performances of the Franck's symphony by the Boston orchestra were the rhythmical accents of the string figures in the middle movement so inacurate and smudged as they were under Karl Muck in his last seasons in Boston, while if Mr. Monteux's performance has had one inescapable characteristic it has been the precision of attack and of intonation—notoriously false under his predecessor of the different choirs.

Admitted that criticism is in large degree a matter of conditions attending particular performances, the temperament and esthetic standpoint of the critic, etc., we believe that the reviewers of this city, with one voice, would acclaim in Mr. Monteux these very qualities in which our colleagues profess to have found him lacking. Perhaps in Carnegie Hall, where the acoustics are doubtless different than in Symphony Hall, the orchestra sounded "opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts," but surely Mr. Henderson would agree that the rich and sombre coloring of Franck's symphony is intentional on the part of the composer, and that the conductor should make an effort to reproduce this carefully contrived coloring in his performance.

Perhaps Mr. Monteux was in a tense mood when he conducted in New York, yet in view of the exquisite tone qualities of his performance here, and especially the roundness and glory of the brass tone, which contrasted so happily with the hard brilliancy to which Dr. Muck was prone—remember the trumpet?—it is difficult to understand Mr. Huneker's impressions of a symphony "over-blown."

The Tribune did find, what Boston musicians, with practically one accord, agree on, that "Mr. Monteux has worked something like a miracle with the band" and that "in his new capacity he seemed as admirable as in that in which he had already won our admiration," meaning as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Are the gentlemen in New York still laboring under the mistake that conductors are born only in Germany? Or are ears and acoustics so different in different parts of the world that no scale of comparison can be instituted? Or did the Boston Symphony Orchestra, forgetful of its Puritan ideals, excited by the peace talk or the noise of the great city, go on a sudden tear and escape the control of that admirable musician, Mr. Monteux? Or is it merely the custom, which gossip says is immemorial, for the critics of the one city to contradict the critics of the other city, whatever the occasion or the subject? We in Boston confess that, while warmly welcoming Mr. Rabaud, we regret that Mr. Monteux, owing to the epidemic, was heard so little here. We find his conducting to be replete with "delicate shades of color," "crystalline clarity," "sunny tone quality," "exquisite precision." We feel that in these precious qualities he unites the temperament and imagination of a great musician.

STANDARD UNION
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Henri Rabaud, the new French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take up his duties Monday, Nov. 11, the orchestra now being in charge of Pierre Monteux. Thus Mr. Monteux will conduct the first concert of the orchestra in Brooklyn, Nov. 8. The series of five concerts will be given as usual on Friday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being Nov. 8, Dec. 6, January 10, Feb. 7 and March 21. All applications for seats should be made to the Institute of Arts and Sciences, Academy of Music Building. Since last spring there has been an extensive reorganization of the personnel of the orchestra. For the first time in its history it has this year a French conductor in Henri Rabaud, who, however, will not appear in Brooklyn until the December concert. For the first time in its history it has an American concertmaster in the very distinguished young violinist, Frederic Fradkin. In the ranks of the orchestra there have been changes affecting twenty-three per cent. of the membership. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians. Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company, [illegible]mann, Frederic Fradkin [illegible]r Rubinstein.

HERALD
ess Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Despite the influenza, the renewal of subscriptions and the sale of seats to new subscribers for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been progressing in a gratifying way. This famous band will have its usual crowded houses for the concerts it is to give in Washington this winter. The first concert will be given a week from next Tuesday afternoon, in the New National Theater, at 4:30 o'clock. The conductor at this concert will be Pierre Monteux. Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, has arrived in America and is in Boston, but he will not assume the conductorship until Monday, November 11.

At this first concert the soloist will be Florence Easton, the brilliant English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mme. Easton will be new to many Washingtonians and they will find in her a remarkable singer and a charming personality. The program which Mr. Monteux has arranged is one of unusual interest. Its principal offering will be Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Mme. Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the canzona "Dove Sono" from Mozart's opera "The Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

With the gradual lessening of the influenza epidemic music throughout the country is beginnig to resume its normal course. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, after two weeks delay, began its season in Boston the past week with most brilliant success. About its first concert in Providence there is no question whatever as it does not come until Nov. 19th. The general sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the orchestra will give in Infantry Hall will open at Seddon's Newsstand, Butler Exchange, Monday morning, Nov. 4. In the meantime former subscribers to the Boston Symphony are making renewals, and the progress has been most gratifying from every point of view. There seems to be no doubt that Boston's great orchestra will resume its importantp art in the musical life of Providence.

Providence will not hear the orchestra under Pierre Monteux, who has been having the opening concerts in Boston and conducts the concerts on the first Southern tour, but Rabaud, the new permanent conduct, wil direct the first concert here, and, incidentally, it will be his first out-of-town concert with the orchestra.

There will be five concerts, all on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Nov 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21, March 11 and April 8 For each concert an interesting soloist has been engaged, and most of them have the quality of novelty. At the first concert the soloist will be Merle Alcock, the distinguished contrato. At the second concert Harold Bauer, the pianist, will appear; Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master of the orchestra, will be soloist at the third, and Arthur Hackett, the American tenor, will be soloist at the fourth. At the last concert Providence will make the acquaintance of that very remarkabe young Chilean pianist, Rosita Renard.

War's Effects on Symphony Programs

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

IN speaking of the new conductors of symphonic music in Boston, those that we have recently heard and the one whom we are to hear this week, very little has been said about their abilities as program-makers. It sometimes happens that we get a great conductor who seems not to have studied this essential part of concert-giving. Henschel was only moderate as a conductor when we had him in Boston, but he was one of the best of program-makers. Gericke was infinitely higher as a conductor, yet inferior in the matter of the make-up of his programs, leaning much too heavily to the classical side, and looking askance at almost everything that was modern. Dr. Muck was only modern on the German side. Fiedler, not our greatest conductor, was as good a programmaker as we ever had.

We may sound a note of warning against drawing too heavily in the near future on the modern French school. Cesar Franck is almost the only modern Frenchman (or Belgian) who will stand much repetition. We must have the Russian, Finnish, Norwegian, English and Italian works as well, and frequently. With regard to the American composer it was but natural that the German conductors should be better acquainted with him than the French leaders, for Paine, Chadwick, MacDowell, Hadley, Bird, Parker, Strong, Whiting, Bullard and many others, studied in Germany, taught there, and had their works played sometimes, in that country, while France drew chiefly to itself a few American organ students. Naturally, therefore, the Frenchmen are not as familiar with what American composers can do, or have done, as the Germans are.

And this leads to another point in connection with Germany. How many of the Teutonic composers shall be excluded from the programs because of the German barbarities of the last four years? In England they are playing many Wagner works without cavil. One would think that we have nothing to do in the concert room with the nationality or the personality of Wagner, but only with the standard of his music. If we thrilled to his music for years while we knew that the composer was selfish, ungrateful and almost a criminal, we should be able to enjoy it today even though we know that he was anti-French.

One of the new conductors draws the line at Wagner, but admits Brahms wrote a song of triumph over prostrate France, at the end of the Franco-Prussian war. We can understand the ostracism of Richard Strauss, for his music is often the embodiment of modern Prussian arrogance and brute force, yet even here we should be sorry to lose "Death and Transfiguration," or "Don Quixote." As regards the German classics we do not anticipate that any of the new conductors will be led by the adverse views of D'Indy or Debussy into excluding any of them. We can transmute the old saying about the Indians and read it—"A dead German is a good German."

The public will always demand soloists as an attraction in the symphony concerts, and when some great operatic star appears the great orchestra is thrown into the background, even in a symphony concert, and the tail temporarily wags the dog. For ourselves we wish that no vocalists were ever engaged for these concerts, for even in an operatic aria, where the orchestra is a partner in the work, the footlight flavor disagrees with the symphonic, and the lack of costume, scenery and dramatic action make themselves felt. It is different with pianists or violinists appearing in a concert, for here we still have the sonata-form, the true spirit of the concert room.

Mr. Gericke always insisted strongly upon the dignity of these concerts, and gave the symphony the preponderance. He generally placed the symphoy last upon the program so that the author might leave the hall with the greatest work strongly impressed upon his mind. Perhaps so earnest a view might make the concerts too heavily educational for the general public; a lighter program, a la Theodore Thomas, would certainly be welcome once in a while. Thomas even admitted Strauss (not the great Richard, but the three-quarter Johann) to an occasional program.

But there are younger concert-goers growing up who need to hear the chief classic works which have become familiar to our veterans, and we must have at least a sprinkling of these. In the old times we used faithfully to go through Beethoven's first eight symphonies every season. Dr. Ferdinand Hiller once said to the present writer: "You Americans are jumping at once into the heavily scored modern works. It is much safer to grow up to these through Mozart and Beethoven."

We may trust the tactful Frenchmen to give some graceful touches of lightness and humor to their programs. We wish that some time M. Rabaud would let us have a program of musical curiosities. Such a program would include Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," sometimes called the tenth symphony, which not one in a hundred concert auditors has ever heard. Then we might give our excellent kettle-drummer a chance with Tausch's concerto for kettle-drums, which we think has never been heard in America, a composition which is the symphonic world turned upside down, the kettle-drums (five of them played by the single pounder) being for the nonce the chief instrument of the composition. A Lully score for string orchestra would be a very old novelty also.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 - 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY GETS AN OVATION

Rejuvenated and Gallicized Orchestra Brilliantly Conducted by Pierre Monteaux.

PATRIOTIC AUDIENCE THRILLED

Playing of National Anthems of Allied Nations Stirs Great Crowd to High Pitch.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening was an occasion more memorable than even the season's salutatory of one of the finest organizations of its class in the world. It marked the emergence of this splendid band from the shadows of gradually dominating alien influences and un-American artistic bigotries, it signalized the regeneration of a great musical institution in the spirit and tendency of momentous times, and it was apparently with such thoughts that the great audience began its demonstrations of enthusiasm the moment Conductor Pierre Monteaux made his appearance.

There were more exulting thoughts of the ugly, because disloyal, incidents of the Muck regime, now happily past, if not forgotten, when the Boston Orchestra rose and struck up the strains of "The Star Spangled Banner." Never was it better played and never before certainly not at a symphony concert was it so gladly cheered and madly applauded. Perhaps something of the all pervading desire to celebrate the arrival of peace entered into the persistent clamor of cheers and handclapping which brought forth "The Marseillaise" with even more inspiring acclaim. But the audience remained standing, even after that, and with ceaseless cries of "bravo," in which even the usually sedate box circle and parquette rivalled the balconies in frantic enthusiasm. To this outburst Conductor Monteaux responded by playing "America," the audience lustily joining in the chorus. Then there were shouts of "Italia! Italia!" and not until that nation's passionate anthem was played was there sufficient quiet to begin the program of the evening.

Franck's Great Symphony.

M. Monteaux began his program with the radiantly opulent concerto in D minor by Cesar Franck, a selection eminently fitted to express the new French influence now dominant in the Boston organization and at the same time to test and demonstrate the superb discipline, unanimity of feeling and exquisite departmental balance which distinguishes the reorganized orchestra. Perhaps it has been as well played by the Conservatoire Societe in the first and third movements, but at least in the amazing middle and most inspirational movement it has not had a more spirited or sympathetic reading nor a finer delivery in New York this season.

The change from the Muck manner and method of reading and directing was instantly apparent in an indescribable verve, alacrity and almost emotional response to the baton, which became delightfully more apparent in the "Manfred" overture, with its lacelike fragility, its tenuous beauty, its musical conversations, which become at times almost instrumental persiflage, playfully rippling repartee between the muted strings, the lesser reeds and the recurrently sympathetic horns. Dukas' "La Peri; Poeme Danse," too, was given with the antic fancy and impish grace that have not always been within the easy accomplishment of this orchestra in past seasons.

Debussy in Sympathetic Hands.

Perhaps the Gallicized Boston Symphony Orchestra showed at its inspired best in the wonderfully imaginative and illustrative "Iberia" of Debussy. Conductor Monteaux and his men addressed its vividly descriptive and poetic themes with wonderful sympathy and perfect understanding. Perhaps there is nothing in Debussy so exotically beautiful or so luxuriantly imaginative as "Les Parfums de la Nuit," which constitutes this second movement of one of the famous Frenchman's most perfect orchestral compositions. And the bounding joyousness of the concluding excursion, with its burgeoning fountains of sparkling melody and tantalizing deviltry, gave the final touch to a performance which will be remembered as one of the best, as it was the most momentous, of the annual visits of the great Boston orchestra.

CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Appear Here Friday Evening.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 8, at 8:15. War conditions have wrought many changes in Boston's famous orchestra. Its management is new, its conductor is new, and 20 per cent. of its personnel is new.

The orchestra opened its season in Boston, after a delay of a fortnight due to the influenza, on Oct. 25-26, and the verdict there was unanimous that, if anything, the orchestra was more briliant, richer and more sonorous than it had ever been in the past. The management was fortunate in securing artists of unusual quality to fill the vacancies; it was most fortunate in having been able to secure a distinguished conductor like Pierre Monteux to take the orchestra in hand during the month of October, pending the arrival of its permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud.

Mr. Monteux has shown himself, in addition to being a most talented conductor, to be a skilled maker of programmes, and the first programme he has prepared for Brooklyn is remarkable for its "variety in unity." It begins with the noble symphony of Cesar Franck in D minor, and the other orchestral numbers comprise Schuman's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's superb symphonic variations "Istar," and the brilliant and colorful Spanish suite of Claude Debussy, entitled "Iberia."

The soloist will be Florence Easton. Her first number will be "Dove Sono," the air of the Countess from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number will be the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

EVENING SUN
ss: Baltimore, Md.
NOV 2 - 918

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS MUSIC SEASON

Classic And Modern French Works Will Be Presented At Concert Wednesday.

The formal opening of the local music season will take place next Wednesday evening at the Lyric when the reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which the management, the conductor and 25 per cent. of the personnel are new, will give the first of its local season's concerts under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

The influenza having delayed the opening of the season in Boston for two weeks, the great band was enabled to have a month of solid rehearsing, and because of this the personnel is said to have been welded into a homogeneous mass which plays as if it had been together for years. The orchestra is said to be finer and stronger than it has ever been at any time in its history.

As Henri Ribaud, the permanent conductor, did not arrive from France in time to take the baton for the first concert, Gatti-Casazze, of the Metropolitan Opera House, has lent Mr. Monteux to the orchestra for its first Southern trip, and he will present a program that is a skillful mingling of classic and modern French works. It will open with the Haendel fifth "Concerto Grosso," for string orchestra, the one in D major, in which Mr. Fradkin, the new concert master, and Mr. Noack will play the solo violins; Mr. Barrier, the solo viola, and Mr. Malkin, the solo violoncello. The other minor orchestral numbers will be Charles Martin Loeffler's symphonic poem, "La Bonne Chanson," and Debussy's Spanish suite, "Iberia." The symphony, which closes the program, will be the splendid one in D minor by Cesar Franck.

The soloist of the occasion will be Florence Easton, an English lyric soprano, who is now a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will be heard in two numbers, the famous "Dove Song" aria from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and the recitative and air of Lia, from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

EVENING JOURNAL
ess New York City
NOV 6 918

Washington music season opened yesterday with the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was in the National Theatre. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, entertained guests in her box. Mrs Franklin K. Lane, wife of the Secretary of the Interior, was a [illegible] Marshall Field's box.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, NOVEMBER 10

Rabaud to Lead Next Symphony Concert

THE third pair of Symphony concerts, which will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, are exciting unwonted interest. At these concerts the Symphony patrons will hear the orchestra for the first time under its new permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud.

In Boston, as in Cambridge on Thursday night, Mr. Rabaud opens his program with the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, thus paying tribute at the very beginning to what he calls "the beauty of the classics." In the second part of the program will be found the unfamiliar symphonic poem of Saint Saens, "The Youth of Hercules," and the second Rimsky Korsakoff's brilliant "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

POST, NOVEMBER 1

Boston Symphony's Director Far Excels Muck, Says Olin Downes

BY OLIN DOWNES

Our New York brethren did not like either the tone quality or, particularly, the conducting of Mr. Monteux when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season last Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. Some people are hard to please. Mr. Huneker, now writing for the New York Times, had "the unmistakable sensation that the entire symphony of Franck was overblown." Mr. Henderson of the Sun found the reading of the same symphony "very vigorous, not to say robustious . . . deficient in delicate shades of color, insistent in style, overdrawn in most respects and sadly opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts. All the crystalline clarity, the sunny tone quality and the exquisite precision of the old orchestra were missing."

"Exquisite precision!" But in none of the performances of the Franck's symphony by the Boston orchestra were the rhythmical accents of the string figures in the middle movement so inacurate and smudged as they were under Karl Muck in his last seasons in Boston, while if Mr. Monteux's performance has had one inescapable characteristic it has been the precision of attack and of intonation—notoriously false under his predecessor of the different choirs.

Admitted that criticism is in large degree a matter of conditions attending particular performances, the temperament and esthetic standpoint of the critic, etc., we believe that the reviewers of this city, with one voice, would acclaim in Mr. Monteux these very qualities in which our colleagues profess to have found him lacking. Perhaps in Carnegie Hall, where the acoustics are doubtless different than in Symphony Hall, the orchestra sounded "opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts," but surely Mr. Henderson would agree that the rich and sombre coloring of Franck's symphony is intentional on the part of the composer, and that the conductor should make an effort to reproduce this carefully contrived coloring in his performance.

Perhaps Mr. Monteux was in a tense mood when he conducted in New York yet in view of the exquisite tone qualities of his performance here, and especially the roundness and glory of the brass tone, which contrasted so happily with the hard brilliancy to which Dr. Muck was prone—remember the trumpet?—it is difficult to understand Mr. Huneker's impressions of a symphony "over-blown."

The Tribune did find, what Boston musicians, with practically one accord, agree on, that "Mr. Monteux has worked something like a miracle with the band" and that "in his new capacity he seemed as admirable as in that in which he had already won our admiration," meaning as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Are the gentlemen in New York still laboring under the mistake that conductors are born only in Germany? Or are ears and acoustics so different in different parts of the world that no scale of comparison can be instituted? Or did the Boston Symphony Orchestra, forgetful of its Puritan ideals, excited by the peace talk or the noise of the great city, go on a sudden tear and escape the control of that admirable musician, Mr. Monteux? Or is it merely the custom, which gossip says is immemorial, for the critics of the one city to contradict the critics of the other city, whatever the occasion or the subject? We in Boston confess that, while warmly welcoming Mr. Rabaud, we regret that Mr. Monteux, owing to the epidemic, was heard so little here. We find his conducting to be replete with "delicate shades of color," "crystalline clarity," "sunny tone quality," "exquisite precision." We feel that in these precious qualities he unites the temperament and imagination of a great musician.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

With the gradual lessening of the influenza epidemic music throughout the country is beginnig to resume its normal course. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, after two weeks delay, began its season in Boston the past week with most brilliant success. About its first concert in Providence there is no question whatever as it does not come until Nov. 19th. The general sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the orchestra will give in Infantry Hall will open at Seddon's Newsstand, Butler Exchange, Monday morning, Nov. 4. In the meantime former subscribers to the Boston Symphony are making renewals, and the progress has been most gratifying from every point of view. There seems to be no doubt that Boston's great orchestra will resume its importantp art in the musical life of Providence.

Providence will not hear the orchestra under Pierre Monteux, who has been having the opening concerts in Boston and conducts the concerts on the first Southern tour, but Rabaud, the new permanent conduct, wil direct the first concert here, and, incidentally, it will be his first out-of-town concert with the orchestra.

There will be five concerts, all on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Nov 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21, March 11 and April 8 For each concert an interesting soloist has been engaged, and most of them have the quality of novelty. At the first concert the soloist will be Merle Alcock, the distinguished contrato. At the second concert Harold Bauer, the pianist, will appear; Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master of the orchestra, will be soloist at the third, and Arthur Hackett, the American tenor, will be soloist at the fourth. At the last concert Providence will make the acquaintance of that very remarkabe young Chilean pianist, Rosita Renard.

HERALD
ess Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Despite the influenza, the renewal of subscriptions and the sale of seats to new subscribers for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been progressing in a gratifying way. This famous band will have its usual crowded houses for the concerts it is to give in Washington this winter. The first concert will be given a week from next Tuesday afternoon, in the New National Theater, at 4:30 o'clock. The conductor at this concert will be Pierre Monteux. Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, has arrived in America and is in Boston, but he will not assume the conductorship until Monday, November 11.

At this first concert the soloist will be Florence Easton, the brilliant English prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mme. Easton will be new to many Washingtonians and they will find in her a remarkable singer and a charming personality. The program which Mr. Monteux has arranged is one of unusual interest. Its principal offering will be Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Mme. Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the canzona "Dove Sono" from Mozart's opera "The Marriage of Figaro," and her second number the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

SUANDARD UNION
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Henri Rabaud, the new French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take up his duties Monday, Nov. 11, the orchestra now being in charge of Pierre Monteux. Thus Mr. Monteux will conduct the first concert of the orchestra in Brooklyn, Nov. 8. The series of five concerts will be given as usual on Friday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being Nov. 8, Dec. 6, January 10, Feb. 7 and March 21. All applications for seats should be made to the Institute of Arts and ences, Academy of Music Building. Since last spring there has been an extensive reorganization of the personnel of the orchestra. For the first time in its history it has this year a French conductor in Henri Rabaud, who, however, will not appear in Brooklyn until the December concert. For the first time in its history it has an American concert-master in the very distinguished young violinist, Frederic Fradkin. In the ranks of the orchestra there have been changes affecting twenty-three per cent. of the membership. The vacancies caused by war conditions and the draft have been filled for the most part by young, enthusiastic musicians. Four soloists are announced. These are Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Ilmann, Frederic Fradkin ar Rubinstein.

War's Effects on Symphony Programs

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

IN speaking of the new conductors of symphonic music in Boston, those that we have recently heard and the one whom we are to hear this week, very little has been said about their abilities as program-makers. It sometimes happens that we get a great conductor who seems not to have studied this essential part of concert-giving. Henschel was only moderate as a conductor when we had him in Boston, but he was one of the best of program-makers. Gericke was infinitely higher as a conductor, yet inferior in the matter of the make-up of his programs, leaning much too heavily to the classical side, and looking askance at almost everything that was modern. Dr. Muck was only modern on the German side. Fiedler, not our greatest conductor, was as good a programmaker as we ever had.

We may sound a note of warning against drawing too heavily in the near future on the modern French school. Cesar Franck is almost the only modern Frenchman (or Belgian) who will stand much repetition. We must have the Russian, Finnish, Norwegian, English and Italian works as well, and frequently. With regard to the American composer it was but natural that the German conductors should be better acquainted with him than the French leaders, for Paine, Chadwick, MacDowell, Hadley, Bird, Parker, Strong, Whiting, Bullard and many others, studied in Germany, taught there, and had their works played sometimes, in that country, while France drew chiefly to itself a few American organ students. Naturally, therefore, the Frenchmen are not as familiar with what American composers can do, or have done, as the Germans are.

And this leads to another point in connection with Germany. How many of the Teutonic composers shall be excluded from the programs because of the German barbarities of the last four years? In England they are playing many Wagner works without cavil. One would think that we have nothing to do in the concert room with the nationality or the personality of Wagner, but only with the standard of his music. If we thrilled to his music for years while we knew that the composer was selfish, ungrateful and almost a criminal, we should be able to enjoy it today even though we know that he was anti-French.

One of the new conductors draws the line at Wagner, but admits Brahms wrote a song of triumph over prostrate France, at the end of the Franco-Prussian war. We can understand the ostracism of Richard Strauss, for his music is often the embodiment of modern Prussian arrogance and brute force, yet even here we should be sorry to lose "Death and Transfiguration," or "Don Quixote." As regards the German classics we do not anticipate that any of the new conductors will be led by the adverse views of D'Indy or Debussy into excluding any of them. We can transmute the old saying about the Indians and read it—"A dead German is a good German."

The public will always demand soloists as an attraction in the symphony concerts, and when some great operatic star appears the great orchestra is thrown into the background, even in a symphony concert, and the tail temporarily wags the dog. For ourselves we wish that no vocalists were ever engaged for these concerts, for even in an operatic aria, where the orchestra is a partner in the work, the footlight flavor disagrees with the symphonic, and the lack of costume, scenery and dramatic action make themselves felt. It is different with pianists or violinists appearing in a concert, for here we still have the sonata-form, the true spirit of the concert room.

Mr. Gericke always insisted strongly upon the dignity of these concerts, and gave the symphony the preponderance. He generally placed the symphoy last upon the program so that the author might leave the hall with the greatest work strongly impressed upon his mind. Perhaps so earnest a view might make the concerts too heavily educational for the general public; a lighter program, a la Theodore Thomas, would certainly be welcome once in a while. Thomas even admitted Strauss (not the great Richard, but the three-quarter Johann) to an occasional program.

But there are younger concert-goers growing up who need to hear the chief classic works which have become familiar to our veterans, and we must have at least a sprinkling of these. In the old times we used faithfully to go through Beethoven's first eight symphonies every season. Dr. Ferdinand Hiller once said to the present writer: "You Americans are jumping at once into the heavily scored modern works. It is much safer to grow up to these through Mozart and Beethoven."

We may trust the tactful Frenchmen to give some graceful touches of lightness and humor to their programs. We wish that some time M. Rabaud would let us have a program of musical curiosities. Such a program would include Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," sometimes called the tenth symphony, which not one in a hundred concert auditors has ever heard. Then we might give our excellent kettle-drummer a chance with Tausch's concerto for kettle-drums, which we think has never been heard in America, a composition which is the symphonic world turned upside down, the kettle-drums (five of them played by the single pounder) being for the nonce the chief instrument of the composition. A Lully score for string orchestra would be a very old novelty also.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY GETS AN OVATION

Rejuvenated and Gallicized Orchestra Brilliantly Conducted by Pierre Monteaux.

PATRIOTIC AUDIENCE THRILLED

Playing of National Anthems of Allied Nations Stirs Great Crowd to High Pitch.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening was an occasion more memorable than even the season's salutatory of one of the finest organizations of its class in the world. It marked the emergence of this splendid band from the shadows of gradually dominating alien influences and un-American artistic bigotries, it signalized the regeneration of a great musical institution in the spirit and tendency of momentous times, and it was apparently with such thoughts that the great audience began its demonstrations of enthusiasm the moment Conductor Pierre Monteaux made his appearance.

There were more exulting thoughts of the ugly, because disloyal, incidents of the Muck regime, now happily past, if not forgotten, when the Boston Orchestra rose and struck up the strains of "The Star Spangled Banner." Never was it better played and never before certainly not at a symphony concert was it so gladly cheered and madly applauded. Perhaps something of the all-pervading desire to celebrate the arrival of peace entered into the persistent clamor of cheers and handclapping which brought forth "The Marseillaise" with even more inspiring acclaim. But the audience remained standing, even after that, and with ceaseless cries of "bravo," in which even the usually sedate box circle and parquette rivalled the balconies in frantic enthusiasm. To this outburst Conductor Monteaux responded by playing "America," the audience lustily joining in the chorus. Then there were shouts of "Italia! Italia!" and not until that nation's passionate anthem was played was there sufficient quiet to begin the program of the evening.

Franck's Great Symphony.

M. Monteaux began his program with the radiantly opulent concerto in D minor by Cesar Franck, a selection eminently fitted to express the new French influence now dominant in the Boston organization and at the same time to test and demonstrate the superb discipline, unanimity of feeling and exquisite departmental balance which distinguishes the reorganized orchestra. Perhaps it has been as well played by the Conservatoire Societe in the first and third movements, but at least in the amazing middle and most inspirational movement it has not had a more spirited or sympathetic reading nor a finer delivery in New York this season.

The change from the Muck manner and method of reading and directing was instantly apparent in an indescribable verve, alacrity and almost emotional response to the baton, which became delightfully more apparent in the "Manfred" overture, with its lacelike fragility, its tenuous beauty, its musical conversations, which become at times almost instrumental persiflage, playfully rippling repartee between the muted strings, the lesser reeds and the recurrently sympathetic horns. Dukas' "La Peri; Poeme Danse," too, was given with the antic fancy and impish grace that have not always been within the easy accomplishment of this orchestra in past seasons.

Debussy in Sympathetic Hands.

Perhaps the Gallicized Boston Symphony Orchestra showed at its inspired best in the wonderfully imaginative and illustrative "Iberia" of Debussy. Conductor Monteaux and his men addressed its vividly descriptive and poetic themes with wonderful sympathy and perfect understanding. Perhaps there is nothing in Debussy so exotically beautiful or so luxuriantly imaginative as "Les Parfums de la Nuit," which constitutes this second movement of one of the famous Frenchman's most perfect orchestral compositions. And the bounding joyousness of the concluding excursion, with its burgeoning fountains of sparkling melody and tantalizing deviltry, gave the final touch to a performance which will be remembered as one of the best, as it was the most momentous, of the annual visits of the great Boston orchestra.

CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Appear Here Friday Evening.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 8, at 8:15. War conditions have wrought many changes in Boston's famous orchestra. Its management is new, its conductor is new, and 20 per cent. of its personnel is new.

The orchestra opened its season in Boston, after a delay of a fortnight due to the influenza, on Oct. 25-26, and the verdict there was unanimous that, if anything, the orchestra was more briliant, richer and more sonorous than it had ever been in the past. The management was fortunate in securing artists of unusual quality to fill the vacancies; it was most fortunate in having been able to secure a distinguished conductor like Pierre Monteux to take the orchestra in hand during the month of October, pending the arrival of its permanent conductor, Henri Rabaud.

Mr. Monteux has shown himself, in addition to being a most talented conductor, to be a skilled maker of programmes, and the first programme he has prepared for Brooklyn is remarkable for its "variety in unity." It begins with the noble symphony of Cesar Franck in D minor, and the other orchestral numbers comprise Schuman's "Manfred" overture, Vincent d'Indy's superb symphonic variations "Istar," and the brilliant and colorful Spanish suite of Claude Debussy, entitled "Iberia."

The soloist will be Florence Easton. Her first number will be "Dove Sono," the air of the Countess from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and her second number will be the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

EVENING SUN
ss: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS MUSIC SEASON

Classic And Modern French Works Will Be Presented At Concert Wednesday.

The formal opening of the local music season will take place next Wednesday evening at the Lyric when the reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which the management, the conductor and 25 per cent. of the personnel are new, will give the first of its local season's concerts under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

The influenza having delayed the opening of the season in Boston for two weeks, the great band was enabled to have a month of solid rehearsing, and because of this the personnel is said to have been welded into a homogeneous mass which plays as if it had been together for years. The orchestra is said to be finer and stronger than it has ever been at any time in its history.

As Henri Ribaud, the permanent conductor, did not arrive from France in time to take the baton for the first concert, Gatti-Casazze, of the Metropolitan Opera House, has lent Mr. Monteux to the orchestra for its first Southern trip, and he will present a program that is a skillful mingling of classic and modern French works. It will open with the Haendel fifth "Concerto Grosso," for string orchestra, the one in D major, in which Mr. Fradkin, the new concert master, and Mr. Noack will play the solo violins; Mr. Barrier, the solo viola, and Mr. Malkin, the solo violoncello. The other minor orchestral numbers will be Charles Martin Loeffler's symphonic poem, "La Bonne Chanson," and Debussy's Spanish suite, "Iberia." The symphony, which closes the program, will be the splendid one in D minor by Cesar Franck.

The soloist of the occasion will be Florence Easton, an English lyric soprano, who is now a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will be heard in two numbers, the famous "Dove Song" aria from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and the recitative and air of Lia, from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

EVENING JOURNAL
ess New York City

Washington music season opened yesterday with the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was in the National Theatre. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, entertained guests in her box. Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, wife of the Secretary of the Interior, was a guest of Mrs. Marshall Field's box.

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Y.

ES EREST

hony Or-ear Here
ening.

e season by the chestra will be of Music next at 8:15. War
t many changes
hestra. Its manonductor is new,
personnel is new.
d its season in
of a fortnight
n Oct. 25-26, and unanimous that,
hestra was more ore sonorous than past. The man-ate in securing
uality to fill the most fortunate in secure a distin-
e Pierre Monteux
a in hand during ber, pending the nanent conductor,

shown himself, in most talented con-
lled maker of pro-
first programme he Brooklyn is remark-y in unity." It be-symphony of Cesar nor, and the other s comprise Schu-overture. Vincent
ymphonic variations
brilliant and colorful
Claude Debussy, en-

be Florence Easton,
will be "Dove Sono," untess from Mozart's
aro," and her second
he recitative and air
Debussy's "L'Enfant

N Md.
2- 1918

PHONY
SIC SEASON

n French Works
ted At Concert
esday.

g of the local music
ace next Wednesday
ic when the reorgan-hony Orchestra, of
ment, the conductor
f the personnel are first of its local sea-er the direction of having delayed the son in Boston for two band was enabled to solid rehearsing, and

e personnel is said to
into a homogeneous
as if it had been to-
The orchestra is said
ronger than it has ever
in its history.
ud, the permanent con-
arrive from France in baton for the first con-ze, of the Metropolitan
s lent Mr. Monteux to its first Southern trip,
ent a program that is a
of classic and modern
It will open with the Concerto Grosso," for
the one in D major.
radkin, the new concert
Noack will play the solo
rrier, the solo viola, and e solo violoncello. The hestral numbers will be Loeffler's symphonic
nne Chanson," and De-
h suite, "Iberia." The
ich closes the program,
endid one in D minor by

of the occasion will be on, an English lyric so-now a member of the Opera Company. She will wo numbers, the famous aria from Mozart's "Le
aro," and the recitative
from Debussy's "L'Enfant

NG JOURNAL
ew York City
NOV 6 1918

n music season opened
with the first concert of
Symphony Orchestra,
in the National Theatre.
rand, wife of the French
, entertained guests in her
Franklin K. Lane, wife of ry of the Interior, was a s Marshall Field's box.

Eagle

Hub Critics Approve Monteux; Rabaud, the Man and Artist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit to the Metropolitan district this week, playing in Brooklyn Friday evening and in Manhattan Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The time and place, and probably the audiences, will be the same as of past years, but the orchestra will be different. To those who have followed the course of this, the premier orchestra of this country, if not of the world, there will be much that is new in the personnel of the players, in the kind and quality of the conductor, in the whole atmosphere surrounding the concerts.

Memories are still fresh of the agitation that raged last year over Dr. Muck and the German members of the band, all of which culminated in the internment at the hands of the United States Government of the revered—so to speak—conductor, in the resignation of Col. Higginson, in the reorganization of the orchestra with the forcing out of all alien enemies, in the appointment of nine trustees to take the place of a single patron, and finally, after months of public apprehension, in the appointment of Henri Rabaud, distinguished French composer and conductor, to the post held for years by a German. All these things have happened. They are of the past, and now we can with confidence look to a new regime that will better express the spirit of the times and of America.

Undoubtedly many who have revered the orchestra and have for years looked upon it as the finest expressive medium for orchestral composition have wondered, pondered and been anxious over the possibility of its losing its position of pride in the world of music. They have lamented the changes that have taken place, not because their patriotism was to be questioned in the slightest, but because they have in their life-long admiration for the playing of the orchestra felt that any severance of past traditions might work harm to the musical value of its performances.

Boston Critics on the Orchestra.

Friday evening we in Brooklyn will hear and judge for ourselves, but it is not unwise to listen carefully to those Boston scribes who reviewed the first Boston concert in Symphony Hall, October 18. In the Boston Herald of October 19, Philip Hale said:

"The answer to the many erroneous, some of them malicious, statements published abroad concerning the present condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the concert of yesterday, a concert that was conspicuously beautiful and brilliant; a concert long to be remembered gratefully, one that aroused the large audience to enthusiastic approval.

"While Mr. Monteux had ample time, it would seem to some, for preparation, his task was not an easy one. He had never conducted the orchestra in former years; he was musically unacquainted with the older members; no matter how skilful the new players may be, the orchestra could not reasonably be expected to be at once a homogeneous and plastic body. The tribute paid Mr. Monteux yesterday by audience and orchestra must have recompensed him for his indefatigable labor. There was spontaneous and public acknowledgement of his technical mastery as a conductor; of his sensitiveness and poetic insight as an interpreter; of the modest and ingratiating personality of the man himself.

"Mr. Monteux has an exquisite sense of tone values, of tonal balance and proportion. He is an invoker of euphony. He has the respect for clarity and logical development that characterizes his nation in literature and art. Mr. Gericke had these qualities, the exercise of which gave the Boston Symphony Orchestra international reputation; but Mr. Monteux has in addition warmth, imagination, emotional expressiveness, qualities that were foreign to Mr. Gericke's nature."

Mr. H. T. Parker in the Boston Transcript pays equal praise to orchestra and conductor, but has more in the uniform of a Poilu in the French Infantry.

to say with regard to the new personnel. "Four-fold has been the good fortune of the band; first in the tireless pains and the relentless exaction with which Mr. Monteux and Mr. Fradkin, the concertmaster, have tested and chosen many of the new members; second, in the month, instead of a fortnight, that the postponement of the concerts yielded for daily rehearsals; third in the diligence, ambition and good will of the men themselves; fourth, above and beyond the rest, in the work of Mr. Monteux in the fusing of the orchestra into a sensitive and responsive body, in the schooling of it to plasticity, euphony and the whole gamut of symphonic eloquence. What Mr. Gericke or Dr. Muck, at his coming to the concerts, spreads over a season, Mr. Monteux, without haste, without waste, has largely accomplished in a month. Few conductors have done the Symphony Orchestra such signal service. Two weeks hence Mr. Rabaud may well marvel at the instrument that awaits his hand. He has known none such in the Paris that has enclosed, hitherto, his whole working life.

"To write so of the orchestra is not to imply that it is beyond betterment. A maturer first flute than Mr. De Mainy would serve it well. The English horn, under the exactions of Debussy and Dukas, left something to be desired; the eloquent tuba player is by no means the equal of his predecessor; Mr. Schroeder in his sixties hardly replaces Mr. Warnke in his prime. The three horns to be added to the orchestra should be of the finest obtainable material. On the other hand there is no doubting that the reorganization of the strong choir and its reaction to the abilities of Mr. Fradkin as concertmaster, have bettered it. In particular the second violins now escape the dryness, the suggestion of mechanism that were beginning to beset them in Dr. Muck's final year. They and the whole body of strings now play with an exceeding sensibility and plasticity, losing nothing in essential precision yet sloughing away a tendency to a hard accuracy. Their tone gains in sensuous beauty, delicate euphonies, soft and glamorous shimmer. Yet, as in the climaxes of Franck's Symphony, it lacked not a radiant power.

"The oboes with Mr. Longy, the clarinets with Mr. Sand, the horns with Mr. Wendler, keep familiar quality; while Mr. Monteux has mellowed the brass choir and tempered certain inclinations among the instruments of percussion to an excess of metallic zeal. As of old, the orchestra is master of adroit euphonies, as it proved time and again with Franck's music and the second division of Debussy's 'Iberia.' Throughout the afternoon it phrased like such a singing woman as was Mme. Sembrich in her golden prime while its graduations of long ascents and descents were as flawless. Its rhythm in 'Iberia' whipped the ear; in the 'Peri' it often overlaid the body of Dukas' music with a very jewelry of harmonies and timbres. To listen to it from the first darkling measures of Franck's symphony to the final flash of Debussy's 'Image' was to renew old, to discover new delights."

Monteux and Rabaud.

Because of the delay in the appointment of Mr. Rabaud and the consequent deferring of his arrival in this country. Mr. Monteux was secured through the kindness of the Metropolitan Opera House to attend to the initial rehearsals and to conduct the first month's concerts. Hence it happens that Mr. Monteux, familiar here as conductor of symphonic band and opera alike, will direct the concerts this week in Carnegie Hall and the Academy of Music. But following this month Mr. Rabaud, who arrived in this city within the past week, will take charge, and when the orchestra again visits us it will do so under the direction of its permanent conductor.

There is little need at the present time to retell Mr. Monteux's achievements in this city. What he can accomplish with the resources of the Boston Orchestra at his command may well reveal a new Monteux.

Of Mr. Rabaud little is known in this country, though last year we heard his opera, "Marouf," under auspices of the Metropolitan Opera House, and his "Second Symphony" played by the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Rabaud's Career.

Though known here, therefore, only as a composer he has for the past seven years been one of the principal conductors at the Paris Opera. He comes of musical stock, and was born in Paris, November 10, 1873. His father was the celebrated 'cellist and professor of the violoncello in the Conservatoire. One of his grandmothers was the famous singer, Mme. Dorus-Gros. He is a graduate of the Conservatoire, where he studied composition under Masseret, and in 1884 won the Grand Prix de Rome. For the four years following he lived in Rome at the Villa Medici, and when he finished his studies there he immediately organized a series of concerts in Rome, and in the following year in Vienna, for the purpose of familiarizing the public of those cities with modern French music.

For twenty years he has been a prominent figure in the musical and artistic life of Paris. Aside from his work at the Grand Opera he has been a conductor at the Opera Comique, and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne and the Concerts Monteux.

His first symphony was produced in Paris in 1895 and was followed by a Divertissement for orchestra on Russian folk songs, played for the first time at a Colonne Concert in 1901. Meantime, however, the second symphony—that heard in New York last spring—had its initial performance at a Concert Colonne in Paris in 1899. He has also composed a symphonic poem "La Procession Nocturne"; a setting of the Fourth Psalm for solo, chorus and orchestra; an oratorio "Job," and three operas, "La Fille de Roland," "La Premier Glaive" and "Marouf."

Rabaud's Appearance and Reticence.

When seen by The Eagle representative in New York last week Mr. Rabaud refused to reveal any of his ideas probably because as a gentleman he wanted in no way to embarrass the present trustees of the orchestra. Only after he had conferred with them, he said, would he have anything to say for publication. He is above all else quiet, dignified and reticent. Apparently he prefers to let his work speak for itself, not a bad idea in these days of the enterprising press agent.

In appearance, Mr. Rabaud is tall and spare with a long, thin body that fits into the loosest of sack suits. His head, slightly small for the huge length of body, is well formed. The face, benignant and calm except when animated by conversational interest when it breaks into a succession of rippling smiles, is such as might be seen in any number of New England clergymen. His beard and mustache are gray and full; the eyes gray and deeply set; the nose straight and without prominence; his hair sparse and what there is of it carefully, almost meticulously combed. He bears in toto little resemblance to any preconceived and conventional ideas regarding European composers; instead he might well be an American business man.

Friday's Program.

Friday's Brooklyn program, which as noted above will be conducted by Mr. Monteux, includes the Cesar Franck Symphony in D-minor, Schumann's Overture, "Manfred," D'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar" and Debussy's "Iberia." In addition Florence Easton, as soloist, will sing the aria "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Le Marriage de Figaro" and Lia's recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

Reorganizing Factors in Boston Symphony

Left—Pierre Monteux, who will conduct Friday's concert. Center—Henri Rabaud, newly appointe permanent conductor. Right—Fredric Fradkin, new American conce

SUN

New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SADLY DISAPPOINTS

Orchestra's Reconstruction Into Loyal Band Shows Effect in Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in this city given last evening in Carnegie Hall might easily have aroused misgivings in the minds of the faithful subscribers. History does not demand detailed repetition here, but it is well to call to mind the stormy period of last spring, when dissolution threatened the famous organization because of the peculiar actions of a Teutonic conductor (now retired) and others, in regard to the national anthem.

Major Higginson's abandonment of his long cherished creation was happily not fatal and public spirited Bostonians were found to take up the burden which he had laid down. They scanned the horizon for a conductor and saw Sir Henry Wood, Arturo Toscanini and other stars, which refused to move westward. Finally Henri Rabaud, composer, was secured, but he could not arrive in time to prepare the first concerts, whereupon Mr. Gatti-Casazza kindly lent Boston his French conductor, Pierre Monteux, who directed last evening's performance.

Incidentally it may be recorded that some two score of the twenty members of the band were dismissed and this generated a considerable rearrangement. A new concert master, Frederick Fradkin, supplanted Anton Witek, and altogether there was much to raise question as to the present state of music in Boston. Last evening's concert provided an uncertain answer.

The programme comprised Cesar Franck's symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." It will be noted that one Teutonic romanticist was represented by an overture to a drama by an English poet.

M. Monteux, who conducted, is a fortunately temporary leader of the Boston forces. Possibly for that reason it might not be amiss to defer analytical consideration of the reconstructed orchestra till it is heard under M. Rabaud. Of a certainty, all old friends of the gentlemen from Boston will hope that they will not contract a habit of playing as they played the Cesar Franck symphony.

It was a very vigorous, not to say robustious reading that M. Monteux gave, deficient in delicate shades of color, insistent in style, overdrawn in most respects and sadly opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts. All the crystalline clarity, the sunny tone quality and the exquisite precision of the old orchestra were missing.

There was more smoothness in the Schumann number, but there was again little vitality in the tone and a want of nuance throughout. The Dukas composition was a novelty. It was written around the chromatic scale, which is a foundation for tears, but not for melodic song. The composer was chiefly concerned about juggling with all the modern apparatus of the orchestral writer, from celesta to stopped trumpets.

Of plain line and curve, it seemed to take no heed. All this harmonic paint becoming wearisome. One yearns for a Bach fugue, which is at least obvious in its design. However, it is the pride of the day. If they would only combine their tone painting with some outlines after the manner of the Venetian colorists in a sister art there would be general happiness. The composition of M. Dukas might sound better if it were better played. It was a foggy night and there was noise both outdoors and in.

SUN

ess: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert of the season in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening. A year ago the orchestra suddenly became a storm center, which prevented its giving any concerts in this city, and, in fact, endangered the very existence of the orchestra itself. Fortunately it has not only survived the storm that raged about it but, from all accounts, has emerged from it stronger and finer than it has ever been in the past. It has a new management, a new conductor and many changes have been made in its personnel, affecting 25 per cent. of its members. But what has endured has been the splendid tradition and fine discipline established in 37 years of honest and sincere artistic effort. The management was most fortunate in securing artists of unusual quality to fill the vacancies that occurred in its ranks; it was most fortunate in being able to secure a most distinguished French musician as its permanent conductor, and, again, it was fortunate in securing the services of Pierre Monteux, the principal French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, to take charge of the orchestra for the month of October and the first week of November pending the arrival of Henri Rabaud.

This first concert has many points of interest. The orchestra brings to Baltimore as soloist Florence Easton, a singer of unusual quality of voice and unusual musical talent, who is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The program which Mr. Monteux has made is a clever mingling of the classic and the modern French. It opens with one of the Concerto Grossos of Handel, for strings alone. It is one of a set written by Handel while he was a resident of London and has all the aristocratic, elegant qualities that characterize his music at the best. The other orchestra numbers will be a symphonic poem entitled "La Bonne Chanson" by Charles Martin Loeffler, Claude Debussy's Spanish suite "Iberia," and the noble symphony of Cesar Franck in D minor.

Mme. Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the Countess' aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"—"Dove Sono," and her second will be the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's little opera "L'Enfant Prodigue."

ress: New York City

e

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON; HAS FRENCH CONDUCTOR

Starts Thirty-Third Season, with Pierre Monteux in Place of Doktor Muck.

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, revise and reconstructed following the inter ment of Dr. Karl Muck as an enemy alie opened its thirty-third season in New Yor with a concert at Carnegie Hall last nigh with Pierre Monteux, French conductor, the Metropolitan Opera House, as condu tor. The occasion was notable, owing t the fact that the orchestra played for th first time in New York under another b German conductor.

The orchestra was greeted by an aud ence ebullient with enthusiasm over t war news, true or false, to an exte which, after the playing of "The St Spangled Banner," which Dr. Muck on refused to conduct, to open the procee ings, demanded more patriotic music, a Mr. Monteux responded first with t "Marsellaise," then with "God, Save t King," and the Italian national anthem finish up with, before the audience wou quiet down to the serious musical busine of the evening.

Apart from Schumann's overture Byron's "Manfred," which on this ocasion sounded as dry as dust and ha as nails, the programme was compos entirely of music by French compose Memories of the interpretation of Franc D minor symphony, which opened t programme, by the French Orchestra w sufficiently recent and vivid to decide impair one's enjoyment of the work the very muddy way it was perform last night. Mons. Monteux is a very sistent conductor, anxious, as it we to dig out effects by the roots; and if t symphony, through his reading, gai somewhat in force and dynamic effect o that of the French Orchestra it l definitely the mystic color, elasticity nuance and subtle charm which sho characterize the work.

For me a little of Paul Dukas goes long way, but the little we heard night in the shape of "La Peri, a Dan Poem," showed the composer at his b in point of varied orchestral color effect, and also at his worst in p of diffuseness of expression and lack salient melodic material. This poem, set to music by Dukas, must have b very tempestuous and febrile in chara and I tremble to think of the feeli any dancer who danced it all.

But in this number the orchestra to play with something more of it finesse and finish than had been ex before, and this evidence of orch efficiency was fortunately again able in the playing of Dubussy's where both color and contrast it tion brought out with excellent results the impressionistic a varied imagery of this most and typical work of its compos

The Boston Symphony Orch many another institution durin has had to suffer by the fore

Y.

ES EREST hony Or-ar Here

ening.

he season by the chestra will be of Music next at 8:15. War
t many changes
hestra. Its man-nductor is new,
personnel is new.
d its season in
of a fortnight
Oct. 25-26, and
unanimous that,
hestra was more
re sonorous than past. The man-
ate in securing uality to fill the
most fortunate in secure a distin-
e Pierre Monteux
a in hand during ber, pending the anent conductor,

shown himself, in most talented con-
led maker of pro-rst programme he ooklyn is remark-y in unity." It be-symphony of Cesar
nor, and the other s comprise Schu-overture. Vincent
ymphonic variations
brilliant and colorful
Claude Debussy, en-

be Florence Easton,
will be "Dove Sono," untess from Mozart's
aro," and her second
he recitative and air
Debussy's "L'Enfant

N Md.
2- 1918

PHONY
SIC SEASON

n French Works
ted At Concert
esday.

g of the local music
ce next Wednesday
c when the reorgan-hony Orchestra, of
ment, the conductor
f the personnel are first of its local sea-er the direction of having delayed the son in Boston for two band was enabled to solid rehearsing, and

e personnel is said to
into a homogeneous
s as if it had been to-
The orchestra is said
ronger than it has ever
in its history.
ud, the permanent con-
arrive from France in baton for the first con-
ze, of the Metropolitan
s lent Mr. Monteux to its first Southern trip,
ent a program that is a
of classic and modern
It will open with the Concerto Grosso," for
, the one in D major.
radkin, the new concert
Noack will play the solo
rrier, the solo viola, and e solo violoncello. The hestral numbers will be n Loeffler's symphonic
nne Chanson," and De-
h suite, "Iberia." The
ich closes the program,
endid one in D minor by

of the occasion will be en, an English lyric so-now a member of the Opera Company. She will wo numbers, the famous aria from Mozart's "Le
aro," and the recitative
from Debussy's "L'Enfant

NG JOURNAL
ew York City
NOV 6 1918

n music season opened
with the first concert of Symphony Orchestra,
in the National Theatre.
rand, wife of the French
, entertained guests in her
Franklin K. Lane, wife of
ry of the Interior, was a s Marshall Field's box.

Eagle
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Hub Critics Approve Monteux; Rabaud, the Man and Artist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit to the Metropolitan district this week, playing in Brooklyn Friday evening and in Manhattan Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The time and place, and probably the audiences, will be the same as of past years, but the orchestra will be different. To those who have followed the course of this, the premier orchestra of this country, if not of the world, there will be much that is new in the personnel of the players, in the kind and quality of the conductor, in the whole atmosphere surrounding the concerts.

Memories are still fresh of the agitation that raged last year over Dr. Muck and the German members of the band, all of which culminated in the internment at the hands of the United States Government of the revered—so to speak—conductor, in the resignation of Col. Higginson, in the reorganization of the orchestra with the forcing out of all alien enemies, in the appointment of nine trustees to take the place of a single patron, and finally, after months of public apprehension, in the appointment of Henri Rabaud, distinguished French composer and conductor, to the post held for years by a German. All these things have happened. They are of the past, and now we can with confidence look to a new regime that will better express the spirit of the times and of America.

Undoubtedly many who have revered the orchestra and have for years looked upon it as the finest expressive medium for orchestral composition have wondered, pondered and been anxious over the possibility of its losing its position of pride in the world of music. They have lamented the changes that have taken place, not because their patriotism was to be questioned in the slightest, but because they have in their life-long admiration for the playing of the orchestra felt that any severance of past traditions might work harm to the musical value of its performances.

Boston Critics on the Orchestra.

Friday evening we in Brooklyn will hear and judge for ourselves, but it is not unwise to listen carefully to those Boston scribes who reviewed the first Boston concert in Symphony Hall, October 18. In the Boston Herald of October 19, Philip Hale said:

"The answer to the many erroneous, some of them malicious, statements published abroad concerning the present condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the concert of yesterday, a concert that was conspicuously beautiful and brilliant; a concert long to be remembered gratefully, one that aroused the large audience to enthusiastic approval.

"While Mr. Monteux had ample time, it would seem to some, for preparation, his task was not an easy one. He had never conducted the orchestra in former years; he was musically unacquainted with the older members; no matter how skilful the new players may be, the orchestra could not reasonably be expected to be at once a homogeneous and plastic body. The tribute paid Mr. Monteux yesterday by audience and orchestra must have recompensed him for his indefatigable labor. There was spontaneous and public acknowledgement of his technical mastery as a conductor; of his sensitiveness and poetic insight as an interpreter; of the modest and ingratiating personality of the man himself.

"Mr. Monteux has an exquisite sense of tone values, of tonal balance and proportion. He is an invoker of euphony. He has the respect for clarity and logical development that characterizes his nation in literature and art. Mr. Gericke had these qualities, the exercise of which gave the Boston Symphony Orchestra international reputation; but Mr. Monteux has in addition warmth, imagination, emotional expressiveness, qualities that were foreign to Mr. Gericke's nature."

Mr. H. T. Parker in the Boston Transcript pays equal praise to orchestra and conductor, but has more in the uniform of a Poilu in the French Infantry.

to say with regard to the new personnel. "Four-fold has been the good fortune of the band; first in the tireless pains and the relentless exaction with which Mr. Monteux and Mr. Fradkin, the concertmaster, have tested and chosen many of the new members; second, in the month, instead of a fortnight, that the postponement of the concerts yielded for daily rehearsays; third in the diligence, ambition and good will of the men themselves; fourth, above and beyond the rest, in the work of Mr. Monteux in the fusing of the orchestra into a sensitive and responsive body, in the schooling of it to plasticity, euphony and the whole gamut of symphonic eloquence. What Mr. Gericke or Dr. Muck, at his coming to the concerts, spreads over a season, Mr. Monteux, without haste, without waste, has largely accomplished in a month. Few conductors have done the Symphony Orchestra such signal service. Two weeks hence Mr. Rabaud may well marvel at the instrument that awaits his hand. He has known none such in the Paris that has enclosed, hitherto, his whole working life.

"To write so of the orchestra is not to imply that it is beyond betterment. A maturer first flute than Mr. De Mainy would serve it well. The English horn, under the exactions of Debussy and Dukas, left something to be desired; the eloquent tuba player is by no means the equal of his predecessor; Mr. Schroeder in his sixties hardly replaces Mr. Warnke in his prime. The three horns to be added to the orchestra should be of the finest obtainable material. On the other hand there is no doubting that the reorganization of the strong choir and its reaction to the abilities of Mr. Fradkin as concertmaster, have bettered it. In particular the second violins now escape the dryness, the suggestion of mechanism that were beginning to beset them in Dr. Muck's final year. They and the whole body of strings now play with an exceeding sensibility and plasticity, losing nothing in essential precision yet sloughing away a tendency to a hard accuracy. Their tone gains in sensuous beauty, delicate euphonies, soft and glamorous shimmer. Yet, as in the climaxes of Franck's Symphony, it lacked not a radiant power.

"The oboes with Mr. Longy, the clarinets with Mr. Sand, the horns with Mr. Wendler, keep familiar quality; while Mr. Monteux has mellowed the brass choir and tempered certain inclinations among the instruments of percussion to an excess of metallic zeal. As of old, the orchestra is master of adroit euphonies, as it proved time and again with Franck's music and the second division of Debussy's 'Iberia.' Throughout the afternoon it phrased like such a singing woman as was Mme. Sembrich in her golden prime while its graduations of long ascents and descents were as flawless. Its rhythm in 'Iberia' whipped the ear; in the "Peri' it often overlaid the body of Dukas' music with a very jewelry of harmonies and timbres. To listen to it from the first darkling measures of Franck's symphony to the final flash of Debussy's 'Image' was to renew old, to discover new delights."

Monteux and Rabaud.

Because of the delay in the appointment of Mr. Rabaud and the consequent deferring of his arrival in this country. Mr. Monteux was secured through the kindness of the Metropolitan Opera House to attend to the initial rehearsals and to conduct the first month's concerts. Hence it happens that Mr. Monteux, familiar here as conductor of symphonic band and opera alike, will direct the concerts this week in Carnegie Hall and the Academy of Music. But following this month Mr. Rabaud, who arrived in this city within the past week, will take charge, and when the orchestra again visits us it will do so under the direction of its permanent conductor.

There is little need at the present time to retell Mr. Monteux's achievements in this city. What he can accomplish with the resources of the Boston Orchestra at his command may well reveal a new Monteux.

Of Mr. Rabaud little is known in this country, though last year we heard his opera, "Marouf," under auspices of the Metropolitan Opera House, and his "Second Symphony" played by the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Rabaud's Career.

Though known here, therefore, only as a composer he has for the past seven years been one of the principal conductors at the Paris Opera. He comes of musical stock, and was born in Paris, November 10, 1873. His father was the celebrated 'cellist and professor of the violoncello in the Conservatoire. One of his grandmothers was the famous singer, Mme. Dorus-Gros. He is a graduate of the Conservatoire, where he studied composition under Masseret, and in 1884 won the Grand Prix de Rome. For the four years following he lived in Rome at the Villa Medici, and when he finished his studies there he immediately organized a series of concerts in Rome, and in the following year in Vienna, for the purpose of familiarizing the public of those cities with modern French music.

For twenty years he has been a prominent figure in the musical and artistic life of Paris. Aside from his work at the Grand Opera he has been a conductor at the Opera Comique, and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne and the Concerts Monteux.

His first symphony was produced in Paris in 1895 and was followed by a Divertissement for orchestra on Russian folk songs, played for the first time at a Colonne Concert in 1901. Meantime, however, the second symphony—that heard in New York last spring—had its initial performance at a Concert Colonne in Paris in 1899. He has also composed a symphonic poem "La Procession Nocturne"; a setting of the Fourth Psalm for solo, chorus and orchestra; an oratorio "Job," and three operas, "La Fille de Roland," "La Premier Glaive" and "Marouf."

Rabaud's Appearance and Reticence.

When seen by The Eagle representative in New York last week Mr. Rabaud refused to reveal any of his ideas probably because as a gentleman he wanted in no way to embarrass the present trustees of the orchestra. Only after he had conferred with them, he said, would he have anything to say for publication. He is above all else quiet, dignified and reticent. Apparently he prefers to let his work speak for itself, not a bad idea in these days of the enterprising press agent.

In appearance, Mr. Rabaud is tall and spare with a long, thin body that fits into the loosest of sack suits. His head, slightly small for the huge length of body, is well formed. The face, benignant and calm except when animated by conversational interest when it breaks into a succession of rippling smiles, is such as might be seen in any number of New England clergymen. His beard and mustache are gray and full; the eyes gray and deeply set; the nose straight and without prominence; his hair sparse and what there is of it carefully, almost meticulously combed. He bears in toto little resemblance to any preconceived and conventional ideas regarding European composers; instead he might well be an American business man.

Friday's Program.

Friday's Brooklyn program, which as noted above will be conducted by Mr. Monteux, includes the Cesar Franck Symphony in D-minor, Schumann's Overture, "Manfred," D'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar" and Debussy's "Iberia." In addition Florence Easton, as soloist, will sing the aria "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Le Marriage de Figaro" and Lia's recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

Reorganizing Factors in Boston Symphony

Left—Pierre Monteux, who will conduct Friday's concert. Center—Henri Rabaud, newly appointe permanent conductor. Right—Fredric Fradkin, new American concert master.

SUN

New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SADLY DISAPPOINTS

Orchestra's Reconstruction Into Loyal Band Shows Effect in Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in this city given last evening in Carnegie Hall might easily have aroused misgivings in the minds of the faithful subscribers. History does not demand detailed repetition here, but it is well to call to mind the stormy period of last spring, when dissolution threatened the famous organization because of the peculiar actions of a Teutonic conductor (now retired) and others, in regard to the national anthem.

Major Higginson's abandonment of his long cherished creation was happily not fatal and public spirited Bostonians were found to take up the burden which he had laid down. They scanned the horizon for a conductor and saw Sir Henry Wood, Arturo Toscanini and other stars, which refused to move westward. Finally Henri Rabaud, composer, was secured, but he could not arrive in time to prepare the first concerts, whereupon Mr. Gatti-Casazza kindly lent Boston his French conductor, Pierre Monteux, who directed last evening's performance.

Incidentally it may be recorded that some two score alien enemy members of the band were dismissed, and this necessitated a considerable rearrangement. A new concert master, Frederick Fradkin, supplanted Anton Witek, and altogether there was much to raise question as to the present state of music in Boston. Last evening's concert provided an uncertain answer.

The programme comprised Cesar Franck's symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." It will be noted that one Teutonic romanticist was represented by an overture to a drama by an English poet.

M. Monteux, who conducted, is a fortunately temporary leader of the Boston forces. Possibly for that reason it might not be amiss to defer analytical consideration of the reconstructed orchestra till it is heard under M. Rabaud. Of a certainty, all old friends of the gentlemen from Boston will hope that they will not contract a habit of playing as they played the Cesar Franck symphony.

It was a very vigorous, not to say robustious reading that M. Monteux gave, deficient in delicate shades of color, insistent in style, overdrawn in most respects and sadly opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts. All the crystalline clarity, the sunny tone quality and the exquisite precision of the old orchestra were missing.

There was more smoothness in the Schumann number, but there was again little vitality in the tone and a want of nuance throughout. The Dukas composition was a novelty. It was written around the chromatic scale, which is a foundation for tears, but not for melodious song. The composer was chiefly concerned about juggling with all the modern apparatus of the orchestral writer, from celesta to stopped trumpets.

Of plain line and curve, he seemed to take no heed. All this harmonic paint became wearisome. One yearns for a Bach fugue, which is at least obvious in its design. However, it is the modernists' day. If they would only combine their tone tinting with some outlines after the manner of the Venetian colorists in a sister art there would be general happiness. The composition of M. Dukas might sound better if it were better played. It was a foggy night and there was noise both outdoors and in.

SUN

ess: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert of the season in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening. A year ago the orchestra suddenly became a storm center, which prevented its giving any concerts in this city, and, in fact, endangered the very existence of the orchestra itself. Fortunately it has not only survived the storm that raged about it but, from all accounts, has emerged from it stronger and finer than it has ever been in the past. It has a new management, a new conductor and many changes have been made in its personnel, affecting 25 per cent. of its members. But what has endured has been the splendid tradition and fine discipline established in 37 years of honest and sincere artistic effort. The management was most fortunate in securing artists of unusual quality to fill the vacancies that occurred in its ranks; it was most fortunate in being able to secure a most distinguished French musician as its permanent conductor, and, again, it was fortunate in securing the services of Pierre Monteux, the principal French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, to take charge of the orchestra for the month of October and the first week of November pending the arrival of Henri Rabaud.

This first concert has many points of interest. The orchestra brings to Baltimore as soloist Florence Easton, a singer of unusual quality of voice and unusual musical talent, who is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The program which Mr. Monteux has made is a clever mingling of the classic and the modern French. It opens with one of the Concerto Grossos of Handel, for strings alone. It is one of a set written by Handel while he was a resident of London and has all the aristocratic, elegant qualities that characterize his music at the best. The other orchestra numbers will be a symphonic poem entitled "La Bonne Chanson" by Charles Martin Loeffler. Claude Debussy's Spanish suite "Iberia," and the noble symphony of Cesar Franck in D minor.

Mme. Easton will sing twice. Her first number will be the Countess' aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"—"Dove Sono," and her second will be the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's little opera "L'Enfant Prodigue."

rk City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON; HAS FRENCH CONDUCTOR

Starts Thirty-Third Season, with Pierre Monteux in Place of Doktor Muck.

By REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, revise and reconstructed following the inter ment of Dr. Karl Muck as an enemy alie opened its thirty-third season in New Yor with a concert at Carnegie Hall last nigh with Pierre Monteux, French conductor, the Metropolitan Opera House, as condu tor. The occasion was notable, owing t the fact that the orchestra played for th first time in New York under another bu German conductor.

The orchestra was greeted by an aud once ebullient with enthusiasm over t war news, true or false, to an exte which, after the playing of "The St Spangled Banner," which Dr. Muck on refused to conduct, to open the procee ings, demanded more patriotic music, a Mr. Monteux responded first with t "Marsellaise," then with "God, Save t King," and the Italian national anthem finish up with, before the audience wou quiet down to the serious musical busine of the evening.

Apart from Schumann's overture Byron's "Manfred," which on this ocasion sounded as dry as dust and ha as nails, the programme was compos entirely of music by French compose Memories of the interpretation of Franc D minor symphony, which opened t programme, by the French Orchestra w sufficiently recent and vivid to decide impair one's enjoyment of the work the very muddy way it was perform last night. Mons. Monteux is a very sistent conductor, anxious, as it we ti dig out effects by the roots; and if t symphony, through his reading, gai somewhat in force and dynamic effect o that of the French Orchestra it l definitely the mystic color, elasticity nuance and subtle charm which sho characterize the work.

For me a little of Paul Dukas goes long way, but the little we heard night in the shape of "La Peri, a Dan Poem," showed the composer at his b in point of varied orchestral color effect, and also at his worst in p of diffuseness of expression and lack salient melodic material. This poem, set to music by Dukas, must have b very tempestuous and febrile in chara and I tremble to think of the feeli any dancer who danced it all.

But in this number the orchestra to play with something more of it finesse and finish than had been ex before, and this evidence of orch efficiency was fortunately again able in the playing of Dubussy's " where both color and contrast i tion brought out with excellent results the impressionistic a varied imagery of this most and typical work of its compos

The Boston Symphony Orch many another institution durin has had to suffer by the forc of adverse circumstance sc

EVENING WORLD

New York City.

NOV 8 1918

Boston Players Led by Monteux At First Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, purged of its German conductor and regenerated by the infusion of more than a score of new players, gave its first concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was as large as ever, and, while there were many new faces to be seen, after a remarkable exhibition of exaltation in celebration of Victory, remained typical of New York's best musical intelligence and appreciation. First "The Star Spangled Banner" was played. Demands for "The Marseillaise" followed, next for "God Save the King" and, finally, for the "Marcia Reale." Patriotic fervor then subsided and the official programme was permitted to be carried out.

Pierre Monteux, who, by courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, has conducted the opening concerts of the organization in Boston this season, again was the leader, as he will be at the concert here on to-morrow afternoon. After that Henri Rabaud, another Frenchman, who has been engaged as successor to the interned Dr. Karl Muck, will take charge. Mr. Monteux showed vigorous qualities not anticipated and something lacking in poetic interpretation to be expected.

The programme consisted of Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Dukas's danced poem "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." There was harshness, not to say blatancy, in the orchestra's pronouncement of each of these works, save in the Dukas composition, unquestionably the best played. In that the suavity and grace to which this orchestra has accustomed us were maintained. Doubtless after Mr. Rabaud has welded the old and the new material together the virtues of this superb band, fostered by Mayor Higginson and developed under master conductors for lo! these many years, will shine resplendent as ever.

Leon Sampaix was to have given a piano recital at Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon, but the noise and excitement of the Victory celebration caused him and his managers to postpone it until next Friday.

TIMES

New York City

SYMPHONY CONCERT MARRED BY THE DIN

Boston Orchestra Begins Its Program at Carnegie Hall with Patriotic Airs.

PIERRE MONTEUX CONDUCTS

His Reading of Cesar Franck's Work and Schumann's Manfred Overture Not Noteworthy.

By JAMES GIBBONS HUNEKER.

There were vibrations extraordinary in Carnegie Hall last night; vibrations both patriotic and musical. When Pierre Monteux mounted his little railed-in rostrum he found an audience ready to go up in the air at the merest provocation. No wonder. Without the hall cacophany reigned. "The Star-Spangled Banner" led to the "Marseillaise," which in turn modulated into "God Save the King," followed by the "Marcia Reale" of Italy. Only the fact that Cesar Franck opened the program, or a call might have been made for the Belgian National Hymn. However, M. Monteux's amiability and patriotism merged into the Franck work, which was not played in a noteworthy fashion. Perhaps the strenuous preludings upset the color scheme, for the first movement was opaque, the second was heavy in touch, and the final allegro noisy.

But the new band from Boston is still the old band, and there were moments, nay, stretches, when the strings were celestial, the woodwind euphonious as no other orchestra's, and the brass both massive and mellow. Nevertheless, one had the unmistakable sensation that the entire symphony was overblown. It is profound, this "genial" composition. It has an atmosphere of its own, and like the composer levies upon Brahms, Schumann, Wagner—toujours Wagner!—has an individual profile. With Debussy he is one of the beloved Little Masters.

The new and temporary conductor, M. Monteux, was at the head of the famous orchestra through the courtesy of Manager Gatti-Casazza. A familiar figure his; New York has known and liked him at our Opera House. His routine in operatic work doubtless led him to transpose to the symphonic region something of broader tonal masses, something of tendency to shifting rhythms. There was less balance of the various instrumental choirs than a certain aiming at picturesque, even sweeping effects, in a word, operatic. The Schumann Manfred Overture, muddy in orchestration yet contains nobler ideas and more poetical expressiveness than [illegible] But the Belgian is the better in safer waters. "The Peri: A Poem Danced," by Dukas, may not add to his reputation, though it proved entertaining. This charming French composer is now the sorcerer's apprentice to his own mannerisms. He spins an iridescent, harmonious web, and his dance rhythms were sonorous and melodic and in his beloved exotic scales. The evening ended with Debussy's "Iberia," with the Spain of Velasquez, El Greco or Goya, but a subtilized Spain in which the stark realism of Zuloaga is sifted through silken veils, painted veils, like the perfumed prose of Maurice Barrès. Yet all that followed the glow and rapture of the national anthems seemed in the nature of an anticlimax.

Pierre Monteux received a warm greeting from a large audience, both modish and musical. We await with curiosity his second and last concert next Saturday afternoon. No doubt the serenity and search for nuances will be more gratifying. Any fear that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had changed was dispelled after the first clangorous chords. Our musical community breathed easier last night.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York City

Date NOV 3 1918

Boston Symphony Next.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening at 8.15 and next Saturday afternoon, November 9, at 2.30. Both concerts will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Monteux, through the courtesy of Giulio Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was engaged to conduct the October concerts in Boston, and when it became evident that Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, could not arrive from Paris in time properly to prepare for the first tour of the orchestra Mr. Gatti-Casazza generously released Mr. Monteux from rehearsals at the Metropolitan so that he could conduct these concerts. His appearance on next Saturday afternoon will be the last with the Boston Symphony, and on the following Monday in Boston Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the rehearsals.

The program for Thursday evening is as follows: Franck Symphony in D minor, Schumann overture to Byron's "Manfred," Dukas's "La Peri: Poeme Danse," Debussy's "Iberia," "Images" for orchestra.

Dukas's "La Peri" will be new to New York. Although it was written in 1910 and produced at the Chatelet in Paris as a poeme danse in 1912, it was not played in this country until Alfred Hertz performed it in San Francisco in January, 1916. Its next performance was in Boston ten days ago at the opening of the symphony season in that city. It is a work in modern form of great brilliancy.

The program for Saturday afternoon is as follows: Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major (Messrs. Fradkin and Noack, solo violins; Mr. Barrier, solo viola; Mr. Malkin, solo violoncello); Loeffler's poeme, "La Bonne Chanson"; D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar"; Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major.

The novelty on this program will be Martin Loeffler's poem, "La Bonne Chanson." As the title indicates, the composer has drawn his inspiration from the poem of the same name by Paul Verlaine. It was written originally fifteen or sixteen years ago and had one performance at a symphony concert in Boston under Mr. Gericke. Then the composer withdrew it for revision. That revision was not made until last Summer, and the work has just been played the past week in Boston for the first time in its new form.

HERALD

New York City

NOV 6 - 1918

Washington music season opened yesterday with the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was in the National Theatre. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, entertained guests in her box. Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, wife of the Secretary of the Interior, was a guest in Mrs. Marshall Field's box.

From Nati

Address New York City

Date NOV 1918

Correspondence

Gallicizing the Boston Orchestra

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Henry T. Finck stated in your issue of October 12, that "the Boston Orchestra has lately been thoroughly Americanized as well as unionized." The negotiations, undertaken last May between members of the orchestra and officers of the American Federation of Musicians came to nothing, as the newspapers of Boston recorded at the time, and the band is still outside the union. Furthermore, the new conductors, both temporary and permanent—MM. Monteux and Rabaud—are Parisians; while the more important newcomers to the orchestra are almost wholly French. Only in the rank and file of the strings is there any appreciable increase in Americans. Much more truly, the Boston Orchestra has been Gallicized.

H. T. PARKER

Boston, October 17.

TIMES

ress: Washington, D. C.

1918

MUSIC SEASON TO OPEN NEXT WEEK

By J. MacB.

Washington no longer is to remain music starved! All indications point to the formal opening of the season of music next week, with four concerts in the first week's schedule. These are the first lecture-recital of Nicholas Douty, tenor, at Central High School, on Monday evening; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Tuesday afternoon; the French Orchestra from the Paris Conservatoire on Wednesday afternoon, and the recital of Pablo Casals, the Spanish 'cellist, on Friday afternoon.

The late beinning of the music season has revealed, to an unusual degree, what music means in the life of each of us. At every hand one hears "Oh, aren't you hungry for some good music?"

And there should be music enough for all, although T. Arthur Smith says that his former estimate of 1,128 people, to quote him literally, as the regular patrons of music in the National Capital, has increased this year to at least double that number.

Miss Laura Harlan, who as secretary for the concerts of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra always is identified with these important musical events in Washington, said this week that the clientele of the concerts will show a marked change. The newcomers, she asserts, seem to belong, all of them, to the list of music patrons.

Already most of the concerts are fully subscribed for, with perhaps a few seats on the lower floors. This holds good for most of the music events announced for the season.

n TIMES

ress: Washington, D. C.

OCT 1918

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Through the courtesy of Gatti-Casazza and the Metropolitna Opera, Pierre Monteux will direct the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday. M. Monteux will conduct the opening opera of the Metropolitan's season on November 1, when Caruso and Mme. Homer will be heard in "Samson et Delila." Thus it is by a very small margin that we are privileged to know yet another great French conductor.

Henri Rabaud, who comes from Europe to direct the Boston Orchestra for the season, arrived in the United States last Monday. He has gained fame in conducting opera at the Grand Opera, Paris, where he was under Messager. It will be interesting to compare these three Frenchmen who bring us the best traditions of the French art in music.

SUN

ss: New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan, will open its New York series of Thursday evening concerts this week with Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's Manfred Overture, Dukas's Dance-Poem "The Peri," and Debussy's "Iberia," from the Images, No. 2.

om STANDARD UNION

ldress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

ate NOV 7 - 1918

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play tomorrow evening for the first concert of the season at the Academy of Music, with Pierre Monteux as conductor, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, was considered in detail in a lecture recital given yesterday afternoon in the Academy lecture hall by Prof. Walter R. Spalding, of Harvard University. Prof. Spalding gave an exhaustive exposition of the symphony, Cesar Franck's D minor composition, and played the chief motives of the three movements. He devoted some time to the study of D'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar," and played portions of Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Debussy's "Iberia," analyzing the distinctive themes.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL NOVEMBER 14.

HENRI RABAUD, NEW DIRECTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

He is an Eminent Composer and Holds a High Rank Among French Conductors

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 2

Symphony Proud of War Record

Liberty loan industrial honor pennant and service flags draped balcony at Symphony Hall.

All Own Bonds and Eleven Are in the Service

The Boston Symphony orchestra is proud of its war record. It won an industrial honor pennant for 100 per cent. subscription in the fourth Liberty loan, and has 11 men in the service of Uncle Sa mor the allies.

The attention of patrons who attended the first Symphony concert this afternoon was attracted to two flags draped artistically over the railing of the first balcony. One flag was the honor pennant and the other the service flag.

Every member of the orchestra and every Symphony Hall employe bought Liberty bonds, making the total for the organization $15,150. Joseph Mann, librarian, who took part in the campaign, states he believes no large orchestra made a better record.

The stars in the service flag are for George Grisez, Paul Mimart, Modeste Alloo, Andre Gletzen, Leslie J. Rogers, Charles Pinfield, Joseph Gewirtz, Samuel Rosen, Leon Roby and Mrs. Florence Hayford.

EVENING WORLD

: New York City.

Boston Players Led by Monteux At First Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, purged of its German conductor and regenerated by the infusion of more than a score of new players, gave its first concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was as large as ever, and, while there were many new faces to be seen, after a remarkable exhibition of exaltation in celebration of Victory, remained typical of New York's best musical intelligence and appreciation. First "The Star Spangled Banner" was played. Demands for "The Marseillaise" followed, next for "God Save the King" and, finally, for the "Marcia Reale." Patriotic fervor then subsided and the official programme was permitted to be carried out.

Pierre Monteux, who, by courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, has conducted the opening concerts of the organization in Boston this season, again was the leader, as he will be at the concert here on to-morrow afternoon. After that Henri Rabaud, another Frenchman, who has been engaged as successor to the interned Dr. Karl Muck, will take charge. Mr. Monteux showed vigorous qualities not anticipated and something lacking in poetic interpretation to be expected.

The programme consisted of Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Dukas's danced poem "La Peri" and Debussy's "Iberia." There was harshness, not to say blatancy, in the orchestra's pronouncement of each of these works, save in the Dukas composition, unquestionably the best played. In that the suavity and grace to which this orchestra has accustomed us were maintained. Doubtless after Mr. Rabaud has welded the old and the new material together the virtues of this superb band, fostered by Mayor Higginson and developed under master conductors for lo! these many years, will shine resplendent as ever.

Leon Sampaix was to have given a piano recital at Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon, but the noise and excitement of the Victory celebration caused him and his managers to postpone it until next Friday.

TIMES

New York City

SYMPHONY CONCERT MARRED BY THE DIN

Boston Orchestra Begins Its Program at Carnegie Hall with Patriotic Airs.

PIERRE MONTEUX CONDUCTS

His Reading of Cesar Franck's Work and Schumann's Manfred Overture Not Noteworthy.

By JAMES GIBBONS HUNEKER.

There were vibrations extraordinary in Carnegie Hall last night; vibrations both patriotic and musical. When Pierre Monteux mounted his little railed-in rostrum he found an audience ready to go up in the air at the merest provocation. No wonder. Without the hall cacophany reigned. "The Star-Spangled Banner" led to the "Marseillaise," which in turn modulated into "God Save the King," followed by the "Marcia Reale" of Italy. Only the fact that Cesar Franck opened the program, or a call might have been made for the Belgian National Hymn. However, M. Monteux's amiability and patriotism merged into the Franck work, which was not played in a noteworthy fashion. Perhaps the strenuous preludings upset the color scheme, for the first movement was opaque, the second was heavy in touch, and the final allegro noisy.

But the new band from Boston is still the old band, and there were moments, nay, stretches, when the strings were celestial, the woodwind euphonious as no other orchestra's, and the brass both massive and mellow. Nevertheless, one had the unmistakable sensation that the entire symphony was overblown. It is profound, this "genial" composition, it has an atmosphere of its own, and ile the composer levies upon Brahms, aumann, Wagner—toujours Wagner!—has an individual profile. With ebussy he is one of the beloved Little lasters.

The new and temporary conductor, M. Monteux, was at the head of the famous orchestra through the courtesy of Manager Gatti-Casazza. A familiar figure his; New York has known and liked him at our Opera House. His routine in operatic work doubtless led him to transpose to the symphonic region something of broader tonal masses, something of tendency to shifting rhythms. There was less balance of the various instrumental choirs than a certain aiming at picturesque, even sweeping effects, in a word, operatic. The Schumann Manfred Overture, muddy in orchestration yet contains nobler ideas and more poetical expressiveness than ... But the Belgian is the better ... in safer waters. "The Peri: A Poem Danced," by Dukas, may not add to his reputation, though it proved entertaining. This charming French composer is now the sorcerer's apprentice to his own mannerisms. He spins an iridescent, harmonious web, and his dance rhythms were sonorous and melodic and in his beloved exotic scales. The evening ended with Debussy's "Iberia," with the Spain of Velasquez, El Greco or Goya, but a subtilized Spain in which the stark realism of Zuloaga is sifted through silken veils, painted veils, like the perfumed prose of Maurice Barrès. Yet all that followed the glow and rapture of the national anthems seemed in the nature of an anticlimax.

Pierre Monteux received a warm greeting from a large audience, both modish and musical. We await with curiosity his second and last concert next Saturday afternoon. No doubt the serenity and search for nuances will be more gratifying. Any fear that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had changed was dispelled after the first clangorous chords. Our musical community breathed easier last night.

From _____

Address New York City

Date _____ 1918

rom MORNING TELEGRAPH

ddress: New York City

ate _____

Boston Symphony Next.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening at 8.15 and next Saturday afternoon, November 9, at 2.30. Both concerts will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Monteux, through the courtesy of Giulio Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was engaged to conduct the October concerts in Boston, and when it became evident that Henri Rabaud, the new permanent conductor of the orchestra, could not arrive from Paris in time properly to prepare for the first tour of the orchestra Mr. Gatti-Casazza generously released Mr. Monteux from rehearsals at the Metropolitan so that he could conduct these concerts. His appearance on next Saturday afternoon will be the last with the Boston Symphony, and on the following Monday in Boston Mr. Rabaud will take charge of the rehearsals.

The program for Thursday evening is as follows: Franck Symphony in D minor, Schumann overture to Byron's "Manfred," Dukas's "La Peri: Poeme Danse," Debussy's "Iberia," "Images" for orchestra.

Dukas's "La Peri" will be new to New York. Although it was written in 1910 and produced at the Chatelet in Paris as a poeme danse in 1912, it was not played in this country until Alfred Hertz performed it in San Francisco in January, 1916. Its next performance was in Boston ten days ago at the opening of the symphony season in that city. It is a work in modern form of great brilliancy.

The program for Saturday afternoon is as follows: Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major (Messrs. Fradkin and Noack, solo violins; Mr. Barrier, solo viola; Mr. Malkin, solo violoncello); Loeffler's poeme, "La Bonne Chanson"; D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar"; Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major.

The novelty on this program will be Martin Loeffler's poem, "La Bonne Chanson." As the title indicates, the composer has drawn his inspiration from the poem of the same name by Paul Verlaine. It was written originally fifteen or sixteen years ago and had one performance at a symphony concert in Boston under Mr. Gericke. Then the composer withdrew it for revision. That revision was not made until last Summer, and the work has just been played the past week in Boston for the first time in its new form.

HERALD

: New York City

Washington music season opened yesterday with the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was in the National Theatre. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, entertained guests in her box. Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, wife of the Secretary of the Interior, was a guest in Mrs. Marshall Field's box.

n TIMES

ress: Washington, D. C.

MUSIC SEASON TO OPEN NEXT WEEK

By J. MacB.

Washington no longer is to remain music starved! All indications point to the formal opening of the season of music next week, with four concerts in the first week's schedule. These are the first lecture-recital of Nicholas Douty, tenor, at Central High School, on Monday evening; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Tuesday afternoon; the French Orchestra from the Paris Conservatoire, on Wednesday afternoon, and the recital of Pablo Casals, the Spanish 'cellist, on Friday afternoon.

The late beinning of the music season has revealed, to an unusual degree, what music means in the life of each of us. At every hand one hears: "Oh, aren't you hungry for some good music?"

And there should be music enough for all, although T. Arthur Smith says that his former estimate of 1,128 people, to quote him literally, as the regular patrons of music in the National Capital, has increased this year to at least double that number.

Miss Laura Harlan, who as secretary for the concerts of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra always is identified with these important musical events in Washington, said this week that the clientele of the concerts will show a marked change. The newcomers, she asserts, seem to belong, all of them, to the list of music patrons.

Already most of the concerts are fully subscribed for, with perhaps a few seats on the lower floors. This holds good for most of the music events announced for the season.

n TIMES

ress: Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Through the courtesy of Gatti-Casazza and the Metropolitan Opera, Pierre Monteux will direct the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday. M. Monteux will conduct the opening opera of the Metropolitan's season on November 1, when Caruso and Mme. Homer will be heard in "Samson et Delila." Thus it is by a very small margin that we are privileged to know yet another great French conductor.

Henri Rabaud, who comes from Europe to direct the Boston Orchestra for the season, arrived in the United States last Monday. He has gained fame in conducting opera at the Grand Opera, Paris, where he was under Messager. It will be interesting to compare these three Frenchmen who bring us the best traditions of the French art in music.

SUN

ss: New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan, will open its New York series of Thursday evening concerts this week with Franck's Symphony in D minor, Schumann's Manfred Overture, Dukas's Dance-Poem "The Peri," and Debussy's "Iberia," from the Images, No. 2.

Correspondence

Gallicizing the Boston Orchestra

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Henry T. Finck stated in your issue of October 12, that "the Boston Orchestra has lately been thoroughly Americanized as well as unionized." The negotiations, undertaken last May between members of the orchestra and officers of the American Federation of Musicians came to nothing, as the newspapers of Boston recorded at the time, and the band is still outside the union. Furthermore, the new conductors, both temporary and permanent—MM. Monteux and Rabaud—are Parisians; while the more important newcomers to the orchestra are almost wholly French. Only in the rank and file of the strings is there any appreciable increase in Americans. Much more truly, the Boston Orchestra has been Gallicized.

H. T. PARKER

Boston, October 17

om STANDARD UNION

ldress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

ate _____

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play tomororw evening for the first concert of the season at the Academy of Music, with Pierre Monteux as conductor, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, was considered in detail in a lecture recital given yesterday afternoon in the Academy lecture hall by Prof. Walter R. Spalding, of Harvard University. Prof. Spalding gave an exhaustive exposition of the symphony, Cesar Franck's D minor composition, and played the chief motives of the three movements. He devoted some time to the study of D'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar," and played portions of Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Debussy's "Iberia," analyzing the distinctive themes.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL NOVEMBER 14.

HENRI RABAUD, NEW DIRECTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

He is an Eminent Composer and Holds a High Rank Among French Conductors

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 2

Symphony Proud of War Record

Liberty loan industrial honor pennant and service flags draped balcony at Symphony Hall.

All Own Bonds and Eleven Are in the Service

The Boston Symphony orchestra is proud of its war record. It won an industrial honor pennant for 100 per cent. subscription in the fourth Liberty loan, and has 11 men in the service of Uncle Sa mor the allies.

The attention of patrons who attended the first Symphony concert this afternoon was attracted to two flags draped artistically over the railing of the first balcony. One flag was the honor pennant and the other the service flag.

Every member of the orchestra and every Symphony Hall employe bought Liberty bonds, making the total for the organization $15,150. Joseph Mann, librarian, who took part in the campaign, states he believes no large orchestra made a better record.

The stars in the service flag are for George Grisez, Paul Mimart, Modeste Alloo, Andre Gietzen, Leslie J. Rogers, Charles Pinfield, Joseph Gewirtz, Samuel Rosen, Leon Roby and Mrs. Florence Hayford.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

RALD NOVEMBER 10

Mr. Rabaud, who will conduct for the first time in this country next Thursday night at Cambridge, does not believe in long concerts. He thinks that a concert of an hour and a half is long enough; at the utmost, it should not exceed an hour and three-quarters.

And it is evident that Mr. Rabaud is not a chauvinist. An overture by Weber is on the program of the Cambridge concert; a symphony by Beethoven will be played in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday.

A little sketch of Mr. Rabaud has already been published in the Herald. A more complete one is now pertinent. Born at Paris in 1873, he is the son of Hippolyte Francois Rabaud (1839-1900), who took the first prize for violoncello playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1861. He was violoncellist of the Opera orchestra (1859-1889), professor of the violoncello at the Paris Conservatory (1886-1900) and for many years the solo violoncellist of the famous Conservatory orchestra. He wrote a method for his instrument, 12 etudes for it, also violoncello pieces.

The celebrated singer, Mme. Dorus-Gras, was the sister of Mr. Rabaud's grandfather, the flute player, equally distinguished. Vincent Joseph Van Steenkiste, better known by the name of Dorus. Mr. Rabaud is therefore the grand-nephew of the singer, not the grandson, as has been stated. The singer (1805-1896) and the flute player were born at Valenciennes.

Mr. Rabaud, a pupil of Massenet at the Paris Conservatory, took the prix de Rome in 1894. He spent four years at the Villa Medicis. With his colleague, Max d'Ollone, he gave in Rome (1898) and in Vienna (1899) orchestral concerts to introduce in those cities the works of contemporaneous French composers.

In 1908 he was chosen a conductor at the Paris Opera. His debut was on Feb. 1 and the opera was "Lohengrin." His command of the orchestra and singers and his musical taste at once excited attention. Among the operas he conducted that year were "Tristan und Isolde," "Thais" and "Tannhauser." In 1912 he produced "Cobzar," an opera by Mme. Ferrari. On Jan. 3, 1914, he was named first conductor of the Opera in the place of Paul Vidal. The war came. In 1914-15 he conducted concerts of the Conservatory Orchestra, which were then given at the Sorbonne.

On June 30, 1915, at a performance of his opera "Marouf," the minister of fine arts announced that he was made chevalier of the Legion of Honor. Mr. Rabaud was then and there loudly applauded "for this honor spontaneously awarded to a true though very modest artist, to a musician of great and fine talent, to the composer of beautiful musical work that is genuinly French." It is to be noted that in all the reviews of Mr. Rabaud's career published in Paris emphasis is laid on the refreshing modesty of the man as well as on his skill as a conductor and talent as a composer.

Mr. Rabaud is on the committee of performances for the Societe Nationale de Musique.

The list of his chief compositions is as follows:

OPERAS: "La Fille de Roland," musical tragedy in four acts, libretto based by Paul Ferrier on the tragedy of Henri de Bornier. Opera Comique, Paris, March 16, 1904. There were 10 performances that year. Chief singers: Mmes, Carre, Mumesnil, Muratore; Messrs. Beyle, Dufranne, Vieuille, Sizes, Allard, Huberdeau, Vignie Messager conducted.

"Marouf," opera comique in five acts, book by Lucien Nepoty, based on a tale in "The Thousand Nights and a Night" (translation of Dr. Mardrus) Opera Comique, Paris, May 15, 1914 Chief singers: Mmes. Davelli, Tippaine; Messrs, Perier, Vieuille, Delvoye, Vigneau. Ruhlmann conducted

The opera was produced at the Metropolitan House, Dec. 19, 1917. Mr. Morteux was the conductor.

STAGE MUSIC: For Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice" at the Theatre Antoine, Paris, 1916-17, Mr. Rabaud took his themes from English composers of the 16th century, employing an orchestra that was not too palpably modern.

For "Antony and Cleopatra" (Shakespeare's) at the Theatre Antoine, Paris, 1917.

CHORAL WORKS, etc.: "Job," an oratorio for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, performed at the Conservatory, for the Academy of Fine Arts, 1900. This was Mr. Rabaud's "Envoi de Rome."

"Daphne," the work with which Mr. Rabaud won the prix de Rome. Performed at the Institute in 1894.

Second Lyric Poem on Job, for baritone solo and orchestra. Colonne concert, 1905.

Psalm IV., for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, 1901. Societe des Compositeurs and Societe Guillot de Sainbris.

Hymn a la France Eternelle (Victor Hugo), for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. Opera House, Paris, December, 1916, at a performance "Theatre aux Armees."

Songs.

INSTRUMENTAL: Symphony in D minor, No. 1, Concert d'Harcourt, 1895. This symphony was written while Mr. Rabeau was still in the Conservatory.

Symphony, E minor, No. 2, Colonne Concert. Performed in Boston on Jan. 21, 1908, at Mrs. R. J. Hall's concert conducted by Mr. Longy. This symphony was awarded the Prix Mobinne.

Divertissement sur les Chansons Russe. Colonne Concert, 1901. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, April 1, 1902.

"La Procession Nocturne" (after Lenau), Colonne Concert, Jan. 15, 1899. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, Jan. 7, 1903. Performed in Boston by the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music, Nov. 19, 1909, Mr. Chadwick conductor.

Eglogue: Pieme Virgilien. Colonne Concert. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, Jan. 5, 1904.

String quartet.

Andante and Scherzo for flute, violin and piano.

Mr. Rabaud orchestrated "Dolly." Six piano pieces by Gabriel Faure. Nancy, Feb. 9, 1908.

He has made an orchestral suite from the stage music to "The Merchant of Venice."

SYMPHONY CO

Left to Right, Henri Rabaud, Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra, Baritone, W

When the present war comes to an end, there will be no need of forming new musical organizations to celebrate the jubilant event. The existing choruses and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be here, ready to give fitting observance to the great day.

In the first year of war-time Symphony Hall itself was converted almost into a battle-ground, on which, most happily, the orchestra, as an institution of Boston and America, was not put to flight. Already the smoke of that clash of opinions is vanishing in a brightned sunlight. There may not be many months to wait before the orchestra will take its foreordained place as the clearest voice to interpret the great meaning of victory. The possibilities of that interpretation hardly need to be suggested. When they are realized, music, perhaps more than ever before in the long history of the orchestra, will have come completely into its own in Boston.

sc.

Music and Victory

It is not necessary to look beyond the history of Boston to find illustrations of the fact that music affords one of the most natural and satisfying expressions of the joy that comes through victory. After the war of 1812 there was held in King's Chapel a peace jubilee, out of which grew the Handel and Haydn Society. After the civil war there was another peace jubilee, leaving no permanent traces in musical Boston, but uttering in the universal language of the emotions something that was in the hearts of all the people.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, NOVEMBER 14

HENRI RABAUD TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

All German and Austrian Musicians Discharged from Organization.

Henri Rabaud's first appearance in this city as the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday evening should provide an incentive for all music lovers to attend the concert in Infantry Hall.

The elimination of all German and Austrian musicians from the famous orchestra, thereby removing the objectionable features which aroused public disapproval and its present constitution of musicians free from the taint of disloyalty, should make certain the return of the orchestra to the niche in popular esteem which it enjoyed for so long a period prior to the war.

Henri Rabaud, the new director, has for 20 years been one of the most distinguished figures in French music, standing in the first rank among French conductors and being an eminent composer as well. Now in his 54th year, he won the Grand Prix de Rome at the Paris Conservatoire in 1894 and for seven years he has been the principal conductor at the Grand Opera, Paris, under Messager, the leader of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, which recently appeared in this city. In addition M. Rabaud has conducted symphony concerts in Rome, Vienna and other cities, so that his continental reputation is firmly established.

As a composer he has to his credit two symphonies, a symphonic poem, two oratorios and three operas. His opera, "Marouf," was one of the novelties produced at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, last season.

Providence and the Boston Symphony

Providence is prepared to give a rousing welcome to the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it makes its first appearance here under its new auspices. This city has always been among the firmest friends of the splendid organization, though it resented the leadership of the infamous Muck, in whose subsequent downfall it openly rejoiced.

The orchestra as at present constituted no longer bears its old Teutonic stamp—there is nothing about it to offend the patriotic sensibilities of the most loyal American. Under French direction its technical quality, moreover, has not suffered. The concerts thus far given this season have shown a fine spirit and execution. M. Rabaud, who will make his initial appearance in Providence next week, may be depended upon to maintain its best traditions. He s among the most accomplished of European conductors.

There are to be five concerts here during the next few months, and the people of Providence will greet with enthusiasm the opportunity of proving anew their affectionate regard for this premier body of skilled musicians.

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 3 1916

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brings Florence Easton back to Baltimore for the first time since she appeared here several years ago with the Henry W. Savage company in English opera. She is one of the American girls who have made good at the Metropolitan Opera House and she will give two operatic selections, the well-known "Dove Sono?" of the countess from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and a recitative and air from Debussy's operetta "L'Enfant Prodigue." The latter will be of particular interest on account of the recent death of the composer. As long as a man is living and producing we are apt to take his compositions for their face value; after his death the public begins to place them for posterity, and the next few years will determine Debussy's position and the extent of his contribution to the music of the world. His lovely "Iberia" suite, not urly as nationalistic in inspiration, however, as the name would imply, will be the program, as well as the Cesar Franck Symphony in D Minor and a musical version of Verlaine's poem, "La Bonne Chanson," by Charles Martin Loeffler.

"La Bonne Chanson" is a collection of seven short poems written by Verlaine in one of his exquisite moods of faith and optimism, and it is utterly free from the esoteric and rather decadent flavor of much of his work. It is a sort of Epithalamion—a tender and lovely exposition of the thoughts of an expectant bridegroom looking forward to "la vie du foyer," life by his own fireside, and the serene joys of domesticity. It contains the beautiful lyric "L'Heure Exquise," which has become familiar to the musical public through the setting of Reynaldo Hahn.

Fradkin, the new concert master of the orchestra, will be heard in the Handel String Concerto, which completes the program, and Pierre Monteux will lead. Later in the season we will have the new conductor, Henri Rabaud, who has arrived in this country. At the present writing the program for the concert of the French orchestra has not reached us, but it will probably be of unusual interest and composed entirely of the works of French composers.

THE BOSTON LEADER.

In engaging Pierre Monteux to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the month of October the management of America's premier orchestra has officially indicated its independence of the enslaving and ridiculous idea that only a German or an Austrian is capable of successfully conducting symphony concerts. Mr. Monteux has, of course, conducted such concerts with distinguished success both in Paris and in New York, besides proving his ability as a leader of opera and of ballet. His training at the Paris Conservatory and his experience as a viola player in orchestra and in chamber music organizations speak for the thoroughness of his musicianship. Altogether Mr. Monteux is a conductor eminently worthy of the honor that has come his way. The Boston Symphony Orchestra need only regret that a contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company makes it impossible for Mr. Monteux to remain its leader throughout the season.

Whoever immediately succeeds Mr. Monteux when his October engagement is at an end, it seems certain that the next permanent conductor of the orchestra will also be a man chosen from among our allies and artistically altogether up to the requirements of the position. The most credible report has it that the great Toscanini will return to America a year hence to this appropriate field for the display of his extraordinary abilities. There are also persistent rumors that Camille Chevillard will come hither from Paris, whether to fill the gap between the going of Mr. Monteux and the coming of Mr. Toscanini or as permanent conductor is not disclosed. Mr. Chevillard, who succeeded Lamoureux as conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra of Paris, is, like Messrs. Monteux and Toscanini, a leader of sound training, long experience, and recognized ability. In any case it is clear that a suitable man will guide the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and contribute at the same time to the further liberation of America from its former humiliating position as a musical vassal of Germany.

GLOBE-NOVEMBER 10

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Rabauds Debut as Conductor of Symphony

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance in America Thursday evening when the orchestra gives its second concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. Mr Rabaud, who did not accompany the orchestra on its Southern trip, spent the week in Boston, devoting much of his time to going over the library of the orchestra at Symphony Hall.

In keeping with the belief the new conductor expressed on his arrival, that at this time the music of Beethoven should remain an inspiration to all, he will appropriately play the third, "Eroica," symphony, a work recalling first Beethoven's tribute to Napoleon, and later his angry repudiation of him when he learned that the enemy of kings had had himself declared Emperor.

The soloist of the concert will be Merle Alcock, the contralto who sang successfully last Winter in the Symphony Choral concerts. The program will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 3; Handel, recit. and aria from "Xerxes," popularly known as the "Largo"; Franck, "Les Eolides"; Saint-Saens, Aria, "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice"; Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe."

Mr Rabaud's First Concerts Here Friday and Saturday

Mr Rabaud will begin rehearsals tomorrow morning with the Symphony Orchestra, which has had the benefit of the opening weeks of rehearsal and the past week's trip with Mr Monteux. For his first Boston concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr Rabaud will play, as in Cambridge, Beethoven's third symphony.

In the second part of the program will be found the unfamiliar symphonic poem of Saint-Saens, "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky Korsakoff's brilliant Caprice on Spanish Themes. "The Youth of Hercules" was last played in Boston in the Spring of 1905 and so will come as a novelty to a large part of the audience. Rimsky Korsakoff's Caprice, better known, has been played several times in the last

om WORLD

ddress: New York City

Date NOV 8 - 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY LED HERE BY M. MONTEUX

Muck's Temporary Successor Gets Enthusiastic Reception at Carnegie Hall Opening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has established many records here, but never such a one as that of last night, when the first New York concert of the current season took place in Carnegie Hall.

Every seat was occupied, and each auditor waited expectantly for a first sight of Pierre Monteux, the French Conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. M. Monteux prepared the Boston orchestra for the introductory concerts, pending the delayed arrival of Henri Rabaud, who is to be Karl Muck's successor.

M. Monteux was enthusiastically received, and when he and his players finished "The Star-Spangled Banner" there were shouts from all parts of the auditorium. Demands for "La Marseillaise" brought a stirring performance of that work and enthusiasm from the audience. Then followed "God Save the King" and the Italian national anthem.

M. Monteux's abilities never showed to such advantage as they did last evening in his reading of Caesar Franck's D minor symphony, the Schumann "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Peri" and the three Debussy bits for orchestra, called "Iberia." The playing of the musi-

RALD NOVEMBER 10,

Mr. Rabaud, who will conduct for the first time in this country next Thursday night at Cambridge, does not believe in long concerts. He thinks that a concert of an hour and a half is long enough; at the utmost, it should not exceed an hour and three-quarters.

And it is evident that Mr. Rabaud is not a chauvinist. An overture by Weber is on the program of the Cambridge concert; a symphony by Beethoven will be played in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday.

A little sketch of Mr. Rabaud has already been published in the Herald. A more complete one is now pertinent. Born at Paris in 1873, he is the son of Hippolyte Francois Rabaud (1839-1900), who took the first prize for violoncello playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1861. He was violoncellist of the Opera orchestra (1859-1889), professor of the violoncello at the Paris Conservatory (1886-1900) and for many years the solo violoncellist of the famous Conservatory orchestra. He wrote a method for his instrument, 12 etudes for it, also violoncello pieces.

The celebrated singer, Mme. Dorus-Gras, was the sister of Mr. Rabaud's grandfather, the flute player, equally distinguished. Vincent Joseph Van Steenkiste, better known by the name of Dorus. Mr. Rabaud is therefore the grand-nephew of the singer, not the grandson, as has been stated. The singer (1805-1896) and the flute player were born at Valenciennes.

Mr. Rabaud, a pupil of Massenet at the Paris Conservatory, took the prix de Rome in 1894. He spent four years at the Villa Medicis. With his colleague, Max d'Ollone, he gave in Rome (1898) and in Vienna (1899) orchestral concerts to introduce in those cities the works of contemporaneous French composers.

In 1908 he was chosen a conductor at the Paris Opera. His debut was on Feb. 1 and the opera was "Lohengrin." His command of the orchestra and singers and his musical taste at once excited attention. Among the operas he conducted that year were "Tristan und Isolde," "Thais" and "Tannhauser." In 1912 he produced "Cobzar," an opera by Mme. Ferrari. On Jan. 3, 1914, he was named first conductor of the Opera in the place of Paul Vidal. The war came. In 1914-15 he conducted concerts of the Conservatory Orchestra, which were then given at the Sorbonne.

On June 30, 1915, at a performance of his opera "Marouf," the minister of fine arts announced that he was made chevalier of the Legion of Honor. Mr. Rabaud was then and there loudly applauded "for this honor spontaneously awarded to a true though very modest artist, to a musician of great and fine talent, to the composer of beautiful musical work that is genuinly French." It is to be noted that in all the reviews of Mr. Rabaud's career published in Paris emphasis is laid on the refreshing modesty of the man as well as on his skill as a conductor and talent as a composer.

Mr. Rabaud is on the committee of performances for the Societe Nationale de Musique.

The list of his chief compositions is as follows:

OPERAS: "La Fille de Roland," musical tragedy in four acts, libretto based by Paul Ferrier on the tragedy of Henri de Bornier. Opera Comique, Paris, March 16, 1904. There were 10 performances that year. Chief singers: Mmes. Carre, Mumesnil, Muratore; Messrs. Beyle, Dufranne, Vieuille, Sizes, Allard, Huberdeau, Vignie Messager conducted.

"Marouf," opera comique in five acts, book by Lucien Nepoty, based on a tale in "The Thousand Nights and a Night" (translation of Dr. Mardrus) Opera Comique, Paris, May 15, 1914 Chief singers: Mmes. Davelli, Tippaine; Messrs, Perier, Vieuille, Delvoye, Vigneau. Ruhlmann conducted

The opera was produced at the Metropolitan House, Dec. 19, 1917. Mr. Morteux was the conductor.

STAGE MUSIC: For Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice" at the Theatre Antoine, Paris, 1916-17, Mr. Rabaud took his themes from English composers of the 16th century, employing an orchestra that was not too palpably modern.

For "Antony and Cleopatra" (Shakespeare's) at the Theatre Antoine, Paris, 1917.

CHORAL WORKS, etc.: "Job," an oratorio for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, performed at the Conservatory, for the Academy of Fine Arts, 1900. This was Mr. Rabaud's "Envoi de Rome."

"Daphne," the work with which Mr. Rabaud won the prix de Rome. Performed at the Institute in 1894.

Second Lyric Poem on Job, for baritone solo and orchestra. Colonne concert, 1905.

Psalm IV., for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, 1901. Societe des Compositeurs and Societe Guillot de Sainbris.

Hymn a la France Eternelle (Victor Hugo), for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. Opera House, Paris, December, 1916, at a performance "Theatre aux Armees."

Songs.

INSTRUMENTAL: Symphony in D minor, No. 1, Concert d'Harcourt, 1895. This symphony was written while Mr. Rabeau was still in the Conservatory.

Symphony, E minor, No. 2, Colonne Concert. Performed in Boston on Jan. 21, 1908, at Mrs. R. J. Hall's concert conducted by Mr. Longy. This symphony was awarded the Prix Mobinne.

Divertissement sur les Chansons Russe. Colonne Concert, 1901. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, April 1, 1902.

"La Procession Nocturne" (after Lenau), Colonne Concert, Jan. 15, 1899. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, Jan. 7, 1903. Performed in Boston by the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music, Nov. 19, 1909, Mr. Chadwick conductor.

Eglogue: Pieme Virgilien. Colonne Concert. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, Jan. 5, 1904.

String quartet.

Andante and Scherzo for flute, violin and piano.

Mr. Rabaud orchestrated "Dolly." Six piano pieces by Gabriel Faure. Nancy, Feb. 9, 1908.

He has made an orchestral suite from the stage music to "The Merchant of Venice."

SYMPHONY CO

Left to Right, Henri Rabaud, Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra,

When the present war comes to an end, there will be no need of forming new musical organizations to celebrate the jubilant event. The existing choruses and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be here, ready to give fitting observance to the great day.

In the first year of war-time Symphony Hall itself was converted almost into a battle-ground, on which, most happily, the orchestra, as an institution of Boston and America, was not put to flight. Already the smoke of that clash of opinions is vanishing in a brightened sunlight. There may not be many months to wait before the orchestra will take its foreordained place as the clearest voice to interpret the great meaning of victory. The possibilities of that interpretation hardly need to be suggested. When they are realized, music, perhaps more than ever before in the long history of the orchestra, will have come completely into its own in Boston.

Music and Victory

It is not necessary to look beyond the history of Boston to find illustrations of the fact that music affords one of the most natural and satisfying expressions of the joy that comes through victory. After the war of 1812 there was held in King's Chapel a peace jubilee, out of which grew the Handel and Haydn Society. After the civil war there was another peace jubilee, leaving no permanent traces in musical Boston, but uttering in the universal language of the emotions something that was in the hearts of all the people.

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date 3 191

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brings Florence Easton back to Baltimore for the first time since she appeared here several years ago with the Henry W. Savage company in English opera. She is one of the American girls who have made good at the Metropolitan Opera House and she will give two operatic selections, the well-known "Dove Sono?" of the countess from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and a recitative and air from Debussy's operetta "L'Enfant Prodigue." The latter will be of particular interest on account of the recent death of the composer. As long as a man is living and producing we are apt to take his compositions for their face value; after his death the public begins to place them for posterity, and the next few years will determine Debussy's position and the extent of his contribution to the music of the world. His lovely "Iberia" suite, not unlikely as nationalistic in inspiration, however, as the name would imply, will be on the program, as well as the Cesar Franck Symphony in D Minor and a musical version of Verlaine's poem, "La Bonne Chanson," by Charles Martin Loeffler.

"La Bonne Chanson" is a collection of seven short poems written by Verlaine in one of his exquisite moods of faith and optimism, and it is utterly free from the esoteric and rather decadent flavor of much of his work. It is a sort of Epithalamion—a tender and lovely exposition of the thoughts of an expectant bridegroom looking forward to "la vie du foyer," life by his own fireside, and the serene joys of domesticity. It contains the beautiful lyric "L'Heure Exquise," which has become familiar to the musical public through the setting of Reynaldo Hahn.

Franklin, the new concert master of the orchestra, will be heard in the Handel String Concerto, which completes the program, and Pierre Monteux will lead. Later in the season we will have the new conductor, Henri Rabaud, who has arrived in this country. At the present writing the program for the concert of the French orchestra has not reached us, but it will probably be of unusual interest and composed entirely of the works of French composers.

THE BOSTON LEADER.

In engaging Pierre Monteux to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the month of October the management of America's premier orchestra has officially indicated its independence of the enslaving and ridiculous idea that only a German or an Austrian is capable of successfully conducting symphony concerts. Mr. Monteux has, of course, conducted such concerts with distinguished success both in Paris and in New York, besides proving his ability as a leader of opera and of ballet. His training at the Paris Conservatory and his experience as a viola player in orchestra and in chamber music organizations speak for the thoroughness of his musicianship. Altogether Mr. Monteux is a conductor eminently worthy of the honor that has come his way. The Boston Symphony Orchestra need only regret that a contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company makes it impossible for Mr. Monteux to remain its leader throughout the season.

Whoever immediately succeeds Mr. Monteux when his October engagement is at an end, it seems certain that the next permanent conductor of the orchestra will also be a man chosen from among our allies and artistically altogether up to the requirements of the position. The most credible report has it that the great Toscanini will return to America a year hence to this appropriate field for the display of his extraordinary abilities. There are also persistent rumors that Camille Chevillard will come hither from Paris, whether to fill the gap between the going of Mr. Monteux and the coming of Mr. Toscanini or as permanent conductor is not disclosed. Mr. Chevillard, who succeeded Lamoureux as conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra of Paris, is, like Messrs. Monteux and Toscanini, a leader of sound training, long experience, and recognized ability. In any case it is clear that a suitable man will guide the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and contribute at the same time to the further liberation of America from its former humiliating position as a musical vassal of Germany.

GLOBE-NOVEMBER 10

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Rabauds Debut as Conductor of Symphony

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance in America Thursday evening when the orchestra gives its second concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. Mr Rabaud, who did not accompany the orchestra on its Southern trip, spent the week in Boston, devoting much of his time to going over the library of the orchestra at Symphony Hall.

In keeping with the belief the new conductor expressed on his arrival, that at this time the music of Beethoven should remain an inspiration to all. he will appropriately play the third, "Eroica," symphony, a work recalling first Beethoven's tribute to Napoleon, and later his angry repudiation of him when he learned that the enemy of kings had had himself declared Emperor.

The soloist of the concert will be Merle Alcock, the contralto who sang successfully last Winter in the Symphony Choral concerts. The program will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 3; Handel, recit. and aria from "Xerxes," popularly known as the "Largo"; Franck, "Les Eolides"; Saint-Saens, Aria, "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice"; Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe."

Mr Rabaud's First Concerts Here Friday and Saturday

Mr Rabaud will begin rehearsals tomorrow morning with the Symphony Orchestra, which has had the benefit of the opening weeks of rehearsal and the past week's trip with Mr Monteux. For his first Boston concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr Rabaud will play, as in Cambridge, Beethoven's third symphony.

In the second part of the program will be found the unfamiliar symphonic poem of Saint-Saens, "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky Korsakoff's brilliant Caprice on Spanish Themes. "The Youth of Hercules" was last played in Boston in the Spring of 1905 and so will come as a novelty to a large part of the audience. Rimsky Korsakoff's Caprice, better known, has been played several times in the last

om WORLD

ddress: New York City

Date NOV 8 - 9

BOSTON SYMPHONY LED HERE BY M. MONTEUX

Muck's Temporary Successor Gets Enthusiastic Reception at Carnegie Hall Opening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has established many records here, but never such a one as that of last night, when the first New York concert of the current season took place in Carnegie Hall.

Every seat was occupied, and each auditor waited expectantly for a first sight of Pierre Monteux, the French Conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. M. Monteux prepared the Boston orchestra for the introductory concerts, pending the delayed arrival of Henri Rabaud, who is to be Karl Muck's successor.

M. Monteux was enthusiastically received, and when he and his players finished "The Star-Spangled Banner" there were shouts from all parts of the auditorium. Demands for "La Marseillaise" brought a stirring performance of that work and enthusiasm from the audience. Then followed "God Save the King" and the Italian national anthem.

M. Monteux's abilities never showed to such advantage as they did last evening in his reading of Caesar Franck's D minor symphony, the Schumann "Manfred" overture, Dukas's "La Peri" and the three Debussy bits for orchestra, called "Iberia." The playing of the musi-

sc

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL NOVEMBER 14

HENRI RABAUD TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

All German and Austrian Musicians Discharged from Organization.

Henri Rabaud's first appearance in this city as the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday evening should provide an incentive for all music lovers to attend the concert in Infantry Hall.

The elimination of all German and Austrian musicians from the famous orchestra, thereby removing the objectionable features which aroused public disapproval and its present constitution of musicians free from the taint of disloyalty, should make certain the return of the orchestra to the niche in popular esteem which it enjoyed for so long a period prior to the war.

Henri Rabaud, the new director, has for 20 years been one of the most distinguished figures in French music, standing in the first rank among French conductors and being an eminent composer as well. Now in his 54th year, he won the Grand Prix de Rome at the Paris Conservatoire in 1894 and for seven years he has been the principal conductor at the Grand Opera, Paris, under Messager, the leader of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, which recently appeared in this city. In addition M. Rabaud has conducted symphony concerts in Rome, Vienna and other cities, so that his continental reputation is firmly established.

As a composer he has to his credit two symphonies, a symphonic poem, two oratorios and three operas. His opera, "Marouf," was one of the novelties produced at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, last season.

Providence and the Boston Symphony

Providence is prepared to give a rousing welcome to the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it makes its first appearance here under its new auspices. This city has always been among the firmest friends of the splendid organization, though it resented the leadership of the infamous Muck, in whose subsequent downfall it openly rejoiced.

The orchestra as at present constituted no longer bears its old Teutonic stamp—there is nothing about it to offend the patriotic sensibilities of the most loyal American. Under French direction its technical quality, moreover, has not suffered. The concerts thus far given this season have shown a fine spirit and execution. M. Rabaud, who will make his initial appearance in Providence next week, may be depended upon to maintain its best traditions. He s among the most accomplished of European conductors.

There are to be five concerts here during the next few months, and the people of Providence will greet with enthusiasm the opportunity of proving anew their affectionate regard for this premier body of skilled musicians.

HERALD NOV. 1 8

SPEAKERS LAUD GREAT VICTORY

Mayor Peters Presides at Notable Celebration in Symphony Hall

Boston's municipal victory celebration was given a fitting setting last evening at Symphony Hall where, with Mayor Peters presiding, representatives of the army and the navy and the church vied in giving expression to a feeling of thankfulness that the long period of bloody strife had been ended and prolonged peace appears on the horizon of nations.

Not alone that, but the Boston Symphony orchestra was also present to perform in a most impressive way the national anthems of the allies and to lead in the singing of the various camp songs which the audience sang with a will, under the leadership of Herbert W. Smith, camp song leader, and the singing of "La Marseillaise," which was demanded by the audience as a tribute to France and to the new leader of the orchestra, Henri Rabaud, who was accorded an enthusiastic reception.

Distinguished Speakers

Addresses were made by Maj.-Gen. William Crozier, commandant of the department of the northeast; Rear Admiral Spencer S. Wood, commandant of the 1st naval district; Brig.-Gen. John A. Ruckman, in charge of the coast fortifications; Chaplain Henry E. Van Dyke, and the Rt. Rev. William Lawrence, bishop of Massachusetts. The closing number was the singing of "America" by the audience, led by the orchestra.

Mayor Peters, in opening, declared that it was eminently proper to celebrate such a day, and that he knew of no city in the country where the glad tidings came with greater joy than right here. "We may feel proud that we have taken part in these great things," he said; "that we have stood shoulder to shoulder with a nation struggling against the autocratic rule of Germany. And today we may grasp in a way the great things that have made the world safe for democracy. Let us remember today that we have much to be grateful for, for our security, progress and peace. We owe the deepest debt of gratitude to those who risked all to cross the waters and fight the battles of democracy on the fields of France."

Maj.-Gen. Crozier said the signing of the armistice had come somewhat suddenly. "The Kaiser rather took us by surprise," he added. "Not that we did not expect it, but what we were thinking of was of making it sure rather than speedy." The speaker referred to a talk he had with Marshal Joffre and of a question he asked regarding the probability of the Germans breaking through the French line, and of the conclusion he reached that if an American army could be got across the success of the allied arms was assured. "Since the middle of August it has come our time to turn in and fight," he continued.

"We have reached the point of surrender on his part and we have done it without breaking through the centre or enveloping the flanks. But we have done it very completely. The Germans knew enough to give in and avoid the inevitable. We have the right to assemble here and say to ourselves we are not a warlike nation, but we can congratulate ourselves that we have reached a stage in the history of the world where we have made ourselves felt. We are grateful for the self-content and great satisfaction that has come to us and which is going to last."

Rear Admiral Wood paid a compliment to the people of Boston who have so nobly helped the navy and he urged all to "be not weary in well doing." "Further aid, comfort and the right hand of fellowship are needed and all these things take money," he said. "It is your privilege and duty to help out the war work drive and so help every individual who is fighting your battles for you and this dear city of ours," he declared.

Brig.-Gen. Ruckman declared that he had been in various parts of the country since the war began but his experience in Boston led him to believe that Boston is a good place to receive such news as came during the day. The speaker referred at some length to the great part this country is to take in the future and the great problems to be met. "All the little nations and even Germany want to be republics and they all need instruction. It seems to me that we are going to set up a kindergarten to teach small nations to become republics. All our standards have been very high, but we may have to raise them if we are to become the big brother of all these little nations."

"It has been a fine day," said Chaplain Van Dyke, "and it has been one of the most splendid 'falls' the world has ever seen. It is evident that we will have plenty of Turkey and very likely Strassburgh goose for Thanksgiving." He made a strong plea for the war work drive support and declared "we must do more in the hours of grateful victory for our boys who have won it than we did in the hours of peril."

Bishop Lawrence was the closing speaker and declared that all should be grateful for our men and our leaders. He paid a strong tribute to King Albert of Belgium, to Lord Kitchener, to the fleets and army of Great Britain, to King George and to Lloyd George, to Gen. Joffre and to Marshal Foch and [illegible] leaders of the other allied na[illegible] and closed by thanking God for [illegible]adership of President Wilson, who [illegible] sent such men as Pershing and [illegible] to lead our forces across the [illegible]ers. "And thank God for all those [illegible] men, from the cabin and the [illegible]tation, from the homes of the rich [illegible] from the hovels of the poor, some [illegible] rest beneath the sod of a [illegible]

TRIBUNE

New York City

NOV 1 1918

Music

The Second Concert of the Boston Orchestra—Assyriology and Music

By H. E. Krehbiel

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of M. Monteux, which took place in Carnegie Hall, was a more enjoyable entertainment than that which had preceded it on Thursday evening. This was because of its programme, for it offered no revelation touching the constitution of the band calculated to cause a change of the opinion expressed in the first review, though the Concerto grosso in D by Handel which opened the programme enabled the hearers to form a better judgment of the quality of the strings.

That judgment is highly favorable to the organization, as well as to the excellence of the training which it has received at the hands of M. Monteux, who now surrenders it to M. Rabaud in order to take up his duties at the opera. The strings are good in quality, precise, sonorous and responsive to their leader. Their work in the last movement of the concerto was distinctly brilliant, as was that of Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster, whose boyhood was spent in New York, where he received his early training. Following the concerto came music of the modern type, Mr. Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and D'Indy's "Istar."

Mr. Loeffler's piece is a musical transcription or paraphrase of Verlaine's dainty poem, beginning "Avant que tu ne t'en Allies," which it follows as closely as highly idealized music can follow verses which appeal to a sweet and gentle fancy, with their invocation of the fading morning star, the matin call of birds, the upward circling lark, the spreading benediction of azure light, the glistening dew, the quickening of a lover's thoughts under the urge of the rising sun. There is much that is correspondingly exquisite in the iridescent web of tone which the composer has woven, but fortunately the beauty is not all of orchestral vesture and adornment, but also of musical thought. The composition differed from M. D'Indy's, in that it aroused delicate fancies while it charmed the sense, while "Istar" was chiefly an irritant of curiosity.

It was pleasant to have Verlaine's gentle images in mind while listening to Loeffler, but it was not necessary to enjoyment; understanding of D'Indy's purposes and devices depended upon knowledge of its literary motive. When the work was first performed by the Boston Orchestra, in February, 1899, even the erudite Mr. Apthorp was at a loss to explain its singular structure, which is that of a theme and variations played wrong and foremost, the variations coming first and the theme last, a disquisition before announcement of its topic, a sermon with the text at the conclusion.

There are no programme books to be had in Carnegie Hall for the Boston concerts, and those who failed to get one in the street yesterday were as much puzzled as the accomplished annotator of former years, unless they chanced to be familiar with Deltzsch's translation of tht old Babylonia poem, which the German professor calls "Höllenfahrt der Istar," or the chapter in George Smith's "Chaldean Genesis," which tells how Istar, an Oriental love-goddess of unspeakable divinity, descended into the underworld in search of her husband-lover Tammuz.

On this subterranean visit she was compelled by seven warders of as many portals to divest herself of an article of ornament or dess until she passed through the last gate entirely nude. To illustrate this series of adventures the composer (who, by the way, conducted a performance of the work here in 1905) conceived the ingenious scheme of writing seven variations on a theme and playing the variations first and the theme last. Only a fragment of the theme is heard at the outset, and this is tricked out with much scintillant ornament (the tiara of the goddess). As the music goes on the melodic formation is augmented and this investiture simplified, until at the last the theme stalks forth in its whole stature, nude of even harmony.

The mere title might enable an Assyriologist familiar with musical devices to comprehend M. D'Indy's scheme. It is expecting too much of an ordinary mortal unprovided even with an English translation of the French lines which are printed in the score. We might at least have the text in cuneiform characters thrown on a screen. Debussy might also have found for us an Assyrian or Chaldean scale.

The concert ended with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which was just music and asked no toleration of the hearer, though it was the third performance of the work here within nine days, and there were things admirable as well as things questionable in its reading and performance. To expound them would call for technical analysis, which, of course, is not tolerable.

Music.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Victory Concert.

While the city was frantically celebrating victory, if not yet peace, Carnegie Hall housed last evening the first local concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last season this orchestra of great renown was notoriously not identified with patriotism—that is, American patriotism—nor, it must in justice be said, were the highly decorous audiences it habitually commands here by any means so vigorous in their greetings of our National Anthem as in the applause they bestowed on Dr. Muck, though already under suspicion of the conduct that soon compelled him to quit his Boston habitat for a residence in Fort Oglethorpe. Yesterday, however, much had been changed.

The orchestra returns to us cleansed of enemy-members, whose places have been filled by men of Allied citizenship. Instead of a German conductor, Henri Rabaud, immediately from the Paris Opéra, is now the official conductor of the band, though last evening, through the courtesy of Mr. Gatti-Casazza, Pierre Monteux, the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, led in the place of Mr. Rabaud, who, reaching Boston after the beginning of the season, takes up his new duties only on Monday next. As for the audience, in appearance quite the decorous Boston Symphony audience to which we are accustomed, it exploded with enthusiasm when Mr. Monteux entered, and the majestic playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner" wrought it to such a frenzy that nothing short of the "Marseillaise," "God Save the King," and the Italian "Marcia Reale," to an obbligato of hand-clapping broken by cheers, served to still its ebullitions of emotion so that the orchestra could begin the programme of the evening.

This programme consisted of César Franck's symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" overture, a "danced poem" by Dukas, being the score of his ballet "La Péri," and Debussy's "Ibéria." Probably to most of those present the concert itself, after such a strenuous prelude, made an anticlimax. Possibly the orchestra shared in this feeling. At any rate, a fairer judgment can be passed on the reconstituted orchestra from the concert it will give in the same hall to-morrow afternoon than from its victory concert last night. Nevertheless, it was evident yesterday that, though the new band did not always play with the clarity or the finish that characterized its performance in former years, it is still the unmatched band of America, one of the premier orchestras of the world.

Mr. Monteux is, of course, no stranger to New York audiences as a symphonic conductor. He won local distinction in that field through his leadership of the Civic concerts in the summer of 1917. In Paris, despite his association with the Diaghileff ballet and opera company, he is best known as a conductor of symphony concerts. There was, therefore, nothing of the experimental in his taking up the baton Dr. Muck had laid down, and no one who recalled his conducting at the Civic concerts felt the slightest surprise that once more he followed the growing custom of conducting everything without a score before him. His reading of the great symphony of Franck emphasized the contrasts of substance and of treatment in the composition, and he whipped out the strenuous pages of the two allegros with greater speed and thrust than has been the habit of Teutonic conductors. He also led a broad and richly sonorous performance of the "Manfred" overture, though neither he nor any other conductor can disguise the fact that all but the concluding measures of this work are now hopelessly aged. The overture might with profit have been omitted from a programme that was too long even without the patriotic prelude.

The Dukas and the Debussy pieces were in a sense the royal dishes of the feast—the Debussy because the composer's evocation of Spain is a major enchantment, and because no conductor surpasses, if any indeed equals, Mr. Monteux as a conductor of Debussy; the Dukas because it was new. Doubtless this "danced poem" would gain greatly in effect with the dancers and the stage decorations before one's eyes. Last night it seemed chiefly notable for the glittering sumptuousness of the instrumental dress. The music itself is surprisingly flowing, even a little old-fashioned, for the composer of "Ariane et Barbe-Bleue" in 1910. However, it was good to hear it, both for the unfamiliarity of it and for the stirring performance. But the real feature of the concert proper was Debussy's wondrous "Ibéria" as led with sympathy and imagination by Mr. Monteux.

PITTS SANBORN.

SUN

ss: New York City.

The Week End's Music.

This Saturday brings forth much orchestral music. The Boston Symphony will give its second concert—the first of the Saturday afternoons—at Carnegie Hall, for which programme Mr. Monteux has selected the Seventh Symphony as the great piece. Before that will come Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 5, D major, for string orchestra; Loeffler's Poeme, "La Bonne Chanson," and D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar," op. 42, which is the musical [illegible] of all historic [illegible]

NEWS

:: Baltimore, Md.

NOV 4 - 1918

BALTIMORE'S season of orchestral concerts, which is decidedly rich in promise, will open, so to speak, tout de suite.

From the standpoint of the musician the phrase, "the tooter the sweeter," which they say the American lads at the front are using as one means of adapting themselves to the French language, is certainly applicable. In fact, there have been so many postponements that one hardly dare assume the risk of tying oneself down to any fixed date.

But as things now stand, the prospects are bright for the resumption of the regular round of musical events, and there is every reason to believe that the different concerts and recitals will take place as scheduled.

The week's list is an alluring one. On Wednesday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra will fill its first local engagement since the United States entered the war; on Thursday night the postponed concert by the Paris Symphony Orchestra will take place, and the next night the Casals recital, also deferred, will be given—all at the Lyric. Friday afternoon will mark the Baltimore debut of Alfred Butler, the new pianist at the Peabody Conservatory.

Boston Symphony.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra has lost nothing of its finesse and its musical prestige by reason of the departure of Herr Muck and the extensive reorganization of the musicians by which aliens were eliminated was quite apparent by the critical reports of its first concert of the season.

It would seem that the predominating nationality of the players is now French, rather than German which, Heaven knows, is an infinitely preferable condition.

Those who have the musical interests of the United States at heart—and they should be more at heart now than ever before—have cause to be thankful that the difficulties into which the Boston Symphony was plunged by the Muck debouement did not bring about the disintegration of the orchestra that for a time seemed imminent.

"Fortunately," a Boston writer says, "it has not only survived the storm that raged about it but it has emerged stronger and finer than it has ever been in the past. It has a new management, a new conductor and many changes have been made affecting 35 per cent. of the personnel. But what has endured is the splendid tradition and fine discipline established by 77 years of honest and sincere artistic effort."

The Wednesday night program at the Lyric is a beautiful one, with Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor as the principal number. This is a work that is inspired from start to finish, that carries the soul high above the strife, the suffering and disappointment that afflict humanity. Franck was always more or less of a mystic and his compositions abound in spiritual significance. None are more profund, more elevating, than the D-minor Symphony.

Florence Easton, the soloist, will sing two widely contrasted numbers—the "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Figaro," and the Recitative et Aria de Lia, from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." Pierre Monteux, temporary director, will conduct.

Tricolor Day.

In honor of the visit of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, next Thursday will be known as Tricolor Day. The occasion will be one of genuine musical and fashionable brilliance and it will have in addition an element of patriotism that will further tend to make it distinctive.

The list of patrons and patronesses for the concert reads like a roster of the fashionable life of the city, and if any names are missed they can most likely be found by glancing over the various committees that are assisting Miss Elizabeth Ellen Starr, chairman of the executive committee, and her associates in the arrangements that have been made to assure the success of the concert.

I have referred several times to the work Miss Starr has done in planning for an appropriately imposing reception for the Paris Symphony, the sort of a reception which, in view of the official nature of its appearances in American cities, is due it.

I am happy to take advantage of another opportunity of speaking a word in her praise. I do not think there is anybody else in the city who could have handled this particular undertaking more effectively, more untiringly or with greater enthusiasm.

om AMERICAN

dress: New York City.

NOV

te

884

Boston Symphony with Its New Conductor at Carnegie Hall

By MAX SMITH.

IN the midst of the wildest turmoil this city has experienced in many a day, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reorganized and under the direction of a new conductor, quietly slipped into Carnegie Hall last night and took an audience of dignified music lovers by storm.

